A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

A testator directed his debts to be paid out of his real and personal estate; and he afterwards provided that if his personal estate should fall short in paying his debts, then he empowered his executors to enter into the receipt of the rents of his freeholds, until the same should be wholly paid off. The personal estate was sufficient for payment of the debts. Held, nevertheless, that a trust had been created for payment of the debts out of the realty, so as to prevent the operation of the Statute of Limitations, and that the real estate remained liable to pay a simple contract debt which had been left unpaid after distribution of the residuary personal estate.

The testator, James Newton, together with the Defendants John Oulton and James Newton Garside, became jointly and severally indebted to the Plaintiff in the sum of £1000 upon a promissory note, payable on demand, and dated the 21st of May 1825. This note was given for the same amount, then due from James Newton to the Plaintiff upon his sole promissory note.

On the 8th of September 1825 James Newton the testator made his will, duly attested as follows:—"I will, order, and direct that all my just debts, funeral expenses, and the charge of the probate and execution of this my last will and testament, be fully paid and discharged by my executors and executrix hereinafter named, out of my real personal estate and effects, [2] as soon as conveniently may be after my decease;" and after making certain devises, he proceeded as follows:—"Provided always nevertheless, and it is my will and mind, that if my said personal estate and effects shall happen to fall short of paying and discharging all my just and lawful debts, funeral, and testamentary expenses; then and in such case, I will, order, and direct, and hereby authorise and empower my said executors and executrix to enter into the receipt of the rents and profits of all my before-mentioned freehold and leasehold messuages, cottages, buildings, lands, tenements, hereditaments, and premises, until thereby and therewith the same shall be wholly paid off and discharged according to the intent and meaning of this my will."

The testator died in January 1826, and his will was proved by James Oulton, Henry Wright, James Garside, and Sally Garside, his executors, and executrix, who paid all his debts, except that claimed by the Plaintiff, and divided the residue of the personal estate, which was stated to amount to £3849, amongst the residuary legatees.

After the testator's death, Oulton paid the interest on the note down to 1835, the particulars of which he entered in his account book, in the manner stated in the judgment of the Master of the Rolls.

In October 1835 the Plaintiff filed this bill, on behalf of himself and all the other creditors of James Newton, against the executors and the persons interested in the testator's real estate, for payment of the debts out of the real and personal estate. Oulton and Garside had both become bankrupts.

The defences set up were, first, that at the time of giving the joint promissory note in 1825, the Plaintiff, by arrangement, agreed to accept the Defendants Oulton [3] and Garside as his principal debtors; that time had afterwards been given to the principal, and that thereby the estate of the surety had been released.

Secondly, the Statute of Limitations.

And, thirdly, that the personal estate having been found sufficient, the residue had been divided after advertisements for creditors; that, consequently, there was no liability as regarded the real estate, and no trust so as to take the case out of the statute.

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. S. Sharpe, for the Plaintiff, contended, first, that the note being payable on demand, time did not run until payment had been demanded; secondly, that the payment of interest by Oulton took the case out of the Statute of Limitations, he being one of the co-makers of the promissory note and jointly bound thereby, and being also executor of the testator; and thirdly, they argued that the Statute of Limitations did not operate, as the will of the testator contained a trust for payment of his debts.

Sir C. Wetherell, Mr. H. Parker, Mr. Teed, Mr. Moore, Mr. Bird, Mr. Kindersley, Mr. Milne, and Mr. Rogers, for several Defendants, argued, that by the will of the testator his real estate had only been charged in the event "of his personal estate and effects happening to fall short." That this event had not occurred; and that, therefore, the real estate was not liable. That in Dike v. Ricks (Cro. Car. 335), where a power of sale was given in case of the insufficiency of the goods, &c., of the testator to satisfy his debts, a plea of purchase from the executrix was held bad, because it did not state the value of the assets and of the testator's debts, so as to shew that the executrix had cause of sale. [4] That the personal estate being once sufficient, the real estate was not rendered liable by any subsequent deficiency; Culpepper v. Austin (2 Ch. Ca. 221), Oldfield v. Oldfield (1 Vernon, 336). That the Plaintiff having permitted the estate to be distributed without making any claim, and it having been done without precipitation, the executors were not now liable to the Plaintiff; Higgins v. Crawford (2 Ves. jun. 572), The Governor and Company of Chelsea Waterworks v. Cooper (1 Esp. 275).

They further argued, that the claim against the testator's estate had been barred by the Statute of Limitations, for the joint liability being severed by his death, no subsequent payment of interest by the co-makers of the note could prevent the operation of that statute; Atkins v. Tredgold (2 Barn. & C. 23), Slater v. Lawson (1 Barn. & Adol. 396; and 9 G. 4, c. 14). That as to the personal estate, no trust for payment of debts could be created, Jones v. Scott (1 Russ. & M. 255; reversed, 4 Cl. & Fin. 382); and that as the personal estate had been originally sufficient, no trust had attached on the realty. It was also argued, that the specific devised estates were not liable, Spong v. Spong (3 Bli. (N. S.) 84); and that there could be no sale of the real estate, but that payment, if at all, must be made by means of the rents and profits, Lingard v. The Earl of Derby (1 B. C. C. 310).

Mr. Pemberton, in reply, admitted that, on a note payable on demand, the Statute of Limitations runs from the date of the note. (See Norton v. Ellam, 2 Mee & W. 461).

He cited Brailhwaite v. Britain (1 Keen, 206), Winter v. Innes (4 Myl. & Cr. 101), Thorpe v. Jackson (2 Y. & Col. 553), to shew the continuance of the [5] liability of the estate of the deceased partner, so long as the survivor continued liable; and Hughes v. Wynne (Turn. & R. 307), to shew that where real estates are devised in trust for the payments of debts in aid of the personal estate, the Statute of Limitations does not run in equity after the death of the testator. Sir Thomas Plumer there observing, "it is not to be inferred that a man has no debt, because he does not go to law to enforce payment when he has a trustee to pay him."

June 29. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. Having read the pleadings and considering the evidence in this case, I am of opinion that at the time of the testator's death, the Defendants, John Oulton and James Newton

Garside, together with the testator, were jointly and severally indebted to the Plaintiff in the sum of £1000, which was due from them upon a promissory note dated the 21st of May 1825, and that the testator having died in the month of January 1826, the interest of the sum of £1000 was from time to time from and after the testator's death paid to the Plaintiff by the Defendant, John Oulton.

It is admitted that previously to the time when the promissory note of 1825 was made, the testator was separately indebted to the Plaintiff in the sum of £1000, the payment of which, with interest, was secured by a former promissory note, which was given for valuable consideration, and which was cancelled on the delivery of the note of May 1825.

It is alleged on the part of the Defendants that at the time when the promissory note of 1825 was given, the Plaintiff agreed to accept the Defendants Oulton and James Newton Garside as his principal debtors, and to [6] consider Newton, the testator, who up to that time had been the sole debtor, as only a surety for Oulton and Garside, and that after the death of Newton, the Plaintiff dealt with Oulton and Garside as the only parties who were indebted to him on the note, and received the interest from Oulton on the behalf of himself and Garside, and that by this course of dealing, the Plaintiff must be considered either to have voluntarily abandoned all claim against the testator's estate, or to be barred by the Statute of Limitations.

It seems that Oulton, making the payment, took credit for the amount in account between himself and the firm of Oulton & Garside, but there is no evidence to shew, as for or against the Plaintiff, whether the money was received by him from Oulton as one of the executors, or as a partner of the firm of Oulton & Garside, or otherwise. The only facts which I conceive to be proved are, that the testator, at the time of his death, was one of the three persons indebted on the note, and that the interest which accrued due on the note was from time to time paid on the note by Oulton, who was one of the parties liable to pay the note, and one of the executors of a deceased party, who was also liable to pay the note.

The answers admit, or do not deny, the payment of the interest by Oulton, but as the answers were not read in evidence, and the proof from the indorsement cannot be brought within six years from the filing of the bill, the only evidence as to the more recent payments is found in Oulton's book, in which an account is kept as between him and the firm of Oulton & Garside. This book, though at first objected to as no evidence, was ultimately relied on by the Defendants, as shewing that the payments were made by Oulton on behalf of the firm of Oulton & Garside, but this variation, supposing it [7] to be made out, does not appear to me to be important; whether the interest was paid by Oulton, one of the executors and one of the parties liable on the note, or by Oulton & Garside, two of the executors and two of the parties liable on the note, does not seem to be material. The fact which, in one view taken of this case, is considered to be important is, that there is nothing to shew that the Plaintiff received the interest from either Oulton or Oulton & Garside, in any way either to prejudice or keep alive his claim against the testator's estate; and laying aside the book of account, the question raised is, whether, under these circumstances, there being no proof that the Plaintiff received the interest from Oulton or from Oulton & Garside, in his or their characters as representing Newton, the Statute of Limitations operates to bar the claim against the estate of Newton.

In the cases of Atkins v. Tredgold (2 B. & Cr. 23), and Slater v. Lawson (1 B. & Adol. 396), it was determined that at law, when the joint contract was severed by the death of one party, nothing can be done by the personal representative of the deceased party to take the debt out of the statute as against the survivor. How far the principle on which those cases were decided can be applied to the right which a creditor has in equity against the estate of a deceased party, and how far the equitable right which a creditor of joint and several debtors, may have to avail himself of the equities subsisting between the debtors, may be affected by agreements amongst the debtors themselves, may on a proper occasion have to be considered; but on the present occasion, the question does not arise if there be a trust for the payment of the testator's debts; and on considering the will of Newton, I [8] am of opinion that his debts are charged on the real estates, and consequently that there is a trust for the payment of his debts. It was argued that because the testator, after making the charge or creating the trust, has in a subsequent part of his will directed that if the personal estate should fall short of paying his debts, the executors should enter into the receipt of the rents of his real estate, and therewith pay the debts, he has shewn an intention to charge the real estate only in the event of the personal estate proving deficient; but the first general charge does not appear to me to be varied by the subsequent direction to apply the personal and real estate for the same purpose in a particular order; and I do not think that, according to this will, there is no trust, because the personal estate was sufficient; a trust was created, it became the duty of the trustees to pay the debts, and if it were correct to say, as was said in Hughes v. Wynne, "it is not to be inferred that a man has no debt because he does not go to law to enforce payment when he has trustees to pay him;" it may be said with more force in this case, that there can be no such inference when a creditor receives payment of interest from the same person who is trustee, because that person is himself a debtor, and the creditor does not insist upon his calling himself a trustee at the times when the interest is paid.

The debt being proved, and there being a trust for payment of it, and no proof whatever that the Plaintiff ever accepted Oulton and Garside, as his sole debtors, or waived his claim against the testator's estate, I am of opinion that the Plaintiff is entitled to be paid out of the testator's estate.

[9] SUTTON v. DOGGETT. July 21, 1840.

[S. C. 9 L. J. Ch. 335; 4 Jur. 959. Referred to In re M'Rae, 1886, 32 Ch. D. 614. Principle applied to debenture-holder's action, In re New Zealand Midland Railway Company [1901], 2 Ch. 357.]

In a creditor's suit, the assets being sufficient to pay the debts, but insufficient to pay the debts and the costs of suit taxed as between party and party: the Court ordered the Plaintiff's extra costs as between solicitor and client to be paid out of the fund.

This was a creditor's suit instituted by a party on behalf of himself and all the other creditors of the testator.

Upon a former hearing of the cause, the costs of all parties were ordered to be taxed in the ordinary way as between party and party, and the assets, when realised, were ordered to be applied in payment of the debts reported due, and the costs of suit.

The cause coming on for further directions, it was stated that the estate, though sufficient to pay the debts, was insufficient to pay the debts and the former and subsequent costs of suit taxed as between party and party.

Mr. Blunt now asked that the subsequent costs might be taxed as between party and party, and if it should be found that the fund would be insufficient for the payment of the debts, and such costs, then that the Plaintiff might have his extra costs as between solicitor and client paid out of the assets.

Mr. Girdlestone, contra.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale] thought the order asked reasonable, as it would be merely paying the extra costs out of the creditors' own fund.

Tootal v. Spicer (4 Sim. 510), Rowlands v. Tucker (1 Russ. & M. 635), Hood v. Wilson (2 Russ. & M. 687), Barker v. Wardle (2 My. & K. 818), Brodie v. Bolton (3 My. & K. 168), Stanton v. Hatfield (1 Keen, 358).

[10] SMITH v. PALMER. July 18, 1840.

Guardian ad litem to an infant Defendant resident out of the jurisdiction, appointed on motion upon proof of respectability, and that she had no interest adverse to that of the infant.

Mr. Pemberton moved that M. P. might be appointed guardian ad litem to some infants resident in Scotland; the application was made by motion in order to save the expence of a commission. He stated that such orders had been made by the Vice-Chancellor in unreported cases of Cropper v. Crosby, and Dawson v. Barnes.

There was an affidavit that M. P. was a fit and proper person.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale] said he would make the order upon being satisfied by affidavit of the respectability of the proposed guardian, and that she had no interest adverse to that of the infant Defendants.

[10] SMITH v. BIRCH. March 31, April 3, July 3, 1840.

[S. C. 9 L. J. Ch. 349; 4 Jur. 670. See Tomlin v. Tomlin, 1841, 1 Hare, 248.]

A bill was filed by a creditor, claiming in respect of an admitted breach of trust, against B. and the representatives of S., deceased; and it prayed that the accounts might be taken, and the real estate of S. sold and applied in paying the amount due to the Plaintiff, and the other debts. A sum of money was paid into Court in this suit, and a decree was made against the assets of S. only, and accounts and enquiries were directed. A creditor's suit was subsequently instituted against the representatives of S., and the common decree made. The Plaintiffs in the first suit claimed the fund in Court, in priority of the creditors in the second. Held, however, that after payment of the costs of the first suit, it ought to be applied in a due course of administration towards payment of all the creditors of S.

In this cause the question was, whether the Plaintiffs in this case of Smith v. Birch were entitled to have the fund in Court applied in satisfaction of their demand, [11] in exclusion of the other creditors of the testator claiming in another and subsequent suit of Keene v. Birch, under the following circumstances.

John Pegg, by his will, dated the 10th of July 1804, gave the interest of one-fifth part of his residuary personal estate to the Plaintiff Elizabeth Smith for her life, and after her decease gave the same fifth part of his estate to her three children, Saville Smith, Honora Smith, and Charlotte White, in equal shares.

Edmund John Birch and Edward Smith, two of the executors named in the will, possessed themselves of the personal estate, and having neglected fully to account for the same, a bill to compel them to account was filed in the year 1826, and sometime afterwards Edmund John Birch and Edward Smith having admitted assets, it was agreed between the Plaintiff Elizabeth Smith and her children, and the executors, that the sum of £4600 should be fixed as the full amount of the share of the testator's estate to which the Plaintiff Elizabeth Smith and her children were entitled, and that the said Edmund John Birch and Edward Smith should account for the same, and should pay £1533, 6s. 8d., being one-third part thereof, to Mary White, the legal personal representative of Charlotte White (Elizabeth Smith having relinquished her life interest), and should appropriate, set apart, and pay £3066, 13s. 4d., the remaining two-third parts of the said sum of £4600, and invest the same on mortgage or other security for the benefit of Elizabeth Smith for her life, and of her son, and daughter Honora, or those claiming under them after her death, and that the bill then pending should be dismissed.

The £1533, 6s. 8d. was paid to Mary White, and the bill was dismissed; the £3066, 13s. 4d., however, was [12] not invested, but remained due from Edmund John Birch and Edward Smith; and on the 5th of November 1829 Edmund John Birch died, having first made a will, whereby he gave the residue of his real and personal estate to William Moore and Edmund John Birch the son, on trust to sell the same and to pay his debts, and subject thereto on trust for his children. The will was proved by Edmund John Birch the son alone, and the bill of Smith v. Birch, was filed, in 1830, for the purpose of compelling payment of the sum of £3066, 13s. 4d. by the legal personal representative of Edmund John Birch, the father, and by Edward Smith; and the bill prayed that an account might, if necessary, be taken of the assets, of Edmund John Birch the father, possessed by Edmund John Birch the son, and, if necessary, that the real estates of Edmund John Birch the father, and the proceeds and rents and profits thereof, might be duly applied in payment of the amount due to the Plaintiffs, and his other debts.

The Defendant Edmund John Birch the son, stated by his answer that a sum of £5000 was due on bond from the estate of Edmund John Birch the father, and in the progress of the cause, before it was brought on to be heard, two sums, one of £650 and the other of £1500, being parts of the personal estate of Edmund John Birch the father, were brought into Court under orders for that purpose made on the 20th of July 1831, and the 7th of July 1832.

By the decree, which was made on the 10th of November 1832, after directing an inquiry whether the cestui que trust assented to or acquiesced in the trust funds remaining in the hands of Edmund John Birch the son, it was declared that the estate of the said Edmund John Birch the father was liable to make good the sum [13] of £3066, 13s. 4d., together with the interest due in respect thereof, and it was referred to the Master to compute the interest: and if the Defendant Edmund John Birch should not admit assets sufficient to answer the £3066, 13s. 4d. and interest, it was ordered that an account should be taken of the personal estate of the father come to the hands of the son; and in case the personal estate should not be sufficient, it was ordered that the real estate should be sold, and that the money arising from the sale should be paid into the bank, and all further directions were reserved.

Whilst the proceedings under this decree were pending in the Master's office, the bill in a cause entitled Keene v. Birch was filed (in March 1833) by simple contract creditors of Edmund John Birch the father, for the recovery of what was due to them out of his assets, and on the 14th of June 1833 the usual decree for an account and due application of the assets in a creditors' suit was pronounced, and under that decree various proceedings took place, and a debt was proved by a bond creditor.

Edmund John Birch the son having died, a bill of revivor and supplement was filed, and on the 14th of June 1836 a decree was made in the supplemental suit; the accounts were directed to be carried on against the legal personal representatives of Edmund John Birch the son, and the Master was to be at liberty to adopt any of the proceedings in the cause of Keene v. Birch, and an account was also to be taken of the estate of Edmund John Birch the son, possessed by his representative.

The Master's report was dated the 8th of January 1839, and thereby it appeared that the balance due [14] from the estate of Edmund John Birch, on account of his father's personal estate, was £183, 12s. 9½d. but that a claim (not allowed), was made for £203, 9s. 6d. for sums paid in satisfaction of simple contract debts; that a balance of £205 was due from the estate of Edmund John Birch the son, in respect of his receipts and payments on account of the real estate of his father; that a balance of £1493, 4s. was due from the legal personal representative of Edmund John Birch the son, on account of his personal estate; and a balance of £34, 19s. 9d. from Thomas Birch on account of the real estate of Edmund John Birch the son; and the Master stated that, in pursuance of the decrees in this cause and in Keene v. Birch, the real estates of Edmund John Birch the father had been sold for the several sums stated in his report.

In this state of things, it was claimed by the Plaintiffs in this cause that the two sums of £650 and £1500, which had been paid into Court, in this cause, ought to be applied exclusively towards satisfaction of their demand; whilst the Plaintiffs in Keene v. Birch, who attended by their counsel in the cause of Smith v. Birch, and argued the point, contended that these sums were general assets to be applied towards satisfaction of all the debts of Edmund John Birch the father, in a due course of administration.

Mr. Bethell and Mr. Goodeve, for the Plaintiffs in Smith v. Birch, contended that the sums of £650 and £1500, being personal estate and legal assets, and having been taken out of the hands of the executor and brought into Court at the instance of creditors claiming payment, and who ultimately established their right, were subject only to claims of a superior degree; and further, that as the decree in this cause had declared the [15] liability of the estate of Edmund John Birch the father to pay a fixed sum, it ought to be considered as a final decree, giving to the Plaintiffs in this cause a priority over the Plaintiffs in the creditors' suit, who took only under a decree for accounts.

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. L. Wigram, in the same interest.

Mr. James Russell, for the Plaintiff in Keene v. Birch.

Mr. Kindersley and Mr. Prior, for the executor.

Mr. Bethell, in reply.

[16] July 3. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. From the course of proceeding and from the bill and decree it appears that the object of the Plaintiffs in this cause was to establish their demand against, and obtain, payment from Edward Smith and the assets of Edmund John Birch the father.

At the time of the hearing, the demand against Edward Smith was not established ; but the Plaintiffs succeeded in obtaining a declaration that the estate of Edmund John Birch the father was liable to the payment of the sum of £3066, 13s. 4d., which he had agreed to pay, and they had agreed to accept, as their share of the estate of Pegg. The sum had been agreed upon, and the computation of interest was all that was wanted to ascertain the exact amount for which the estate of Birch was liable, and this was directed by the decree ; but the decree was so far from being final, that inquiries were thereby directed for the purpose of enabling the Court to determine whether Edward Smith was not liable with the estate of Edmund John Birch the father, to pay the claim ; and in the event of the Defendant not admitting assets, an account was directed of the personal estate ; and if that should prove deficient, an account and sale of the real estate was directed.

No doubt the accounts and sale were obtained by the Plaintiffs, and were directed for the purpose of ascertaining and realising assets wherewith to pay the Plaintiffs' demand ; and they contend that the object was to obtain payment of their demand in preference to all others ; but on this subject the decree is silent—nothing is said of the application of the assets, except that the money arising from the sale of the real estate is to be brought into Court, and to be subject to the fur-[17]-ther order of the Court. I am of opinion that this decree is not to be considered as a final decree, giving to the Plaintiffs in this cause an exclusive right to any part of the assets. The Court must, no doubt, have contemplated an application of the assets in a due and legal course of administration, and no directions being contained in the decree, it is necessary to recur to the nature of the suit, and the rights of the parties independently of the decree ; and it appears that the prayer of the bill does not seek for any priority over other claimants in the distribution of assets ; it asks for payment of the demand, and, if necessary, for an account of the personal estate ; and, if necessary, that the real estates, and the proceeds and rents and profits thereof, might be duly applied in payment of the amount due to the Plaintiffs, and the other debts of the testator ; so that the form of the suit is such, that the Court is asked to apply the assets in payment of what is due to others as well as to the Plaintiffs ; and then comes the question, whether the Plaintiffs, having in this suit and with notice of a bond debt obtained payment into Court of parts of the personal estate, are entitled to have those parts applied exclusively for their benefit ; and as to this, there may be cases in which the Plaintiff suing for himself alone, and getting into Court sums of money upon which no other person can have any claim, may be entitled to consider what is so brought as applicable exclusively to the satisfaction of his claim ; but I think that payment into Court of assets, which, in the result of the proceedings, may be applicable to the payment of the Plaintiff and other persons, cannot be considered as an appropriation, or as giving an exclusive right to the Plaintiff in priority to claims of higher or even of equal rank ; I am, therefore, of opinion that in this case the Plaintiffs are not entitled to have the sum in Court applied exclusively to their own benefit.

[18] I think, however, that the costs of this cause may properly be paid out of the fund brought into Court ; and it appears to me that the remainder of the fund ought to be subject to the decree which may be made in Keene v. Birch, in which suit the Plaintiffs in this cause ought to apply for such benefit as they may be entitled to in competition with other creditors.

Order the taxation and payment of the costs, and declare that the residue of the fund is to be considered as assets to be applied, in a due course of administration, for payment of the debts of Edmund John Birch.

[18] WORMALD v. DE LISLE. July 20, 1840.

General demurrer allowed to a bill on the ground of the vagueness and uncertainty of its statements.

This bill, which was filed by the assignees of a bankrupt, alleged that, previous to the bankruptcy, "certain dealings and transactions took place between the bankrupt and Defendant," and that, by virtue of "certain agreements" for leases, the bankrupt was possessed of leasehold houses which the bill specified; that in the course of such transactions, the Defendant from time to time made "certain loans" to the bankrupt; and the bankrupt, "as it was alleged by the Defendant," made "some lease" or assignment of the property to the Defendant of the leasehold premises, but that the Plaintiffs were unable to discover, save as thereafter mentioned, on what terms, and that the Defendant had entered into the receipt of the rents; that the Plaintiffs were unable to discover with sufficient certainty the amount of the loans made, but the Defendant pretended he had bought the premises under an agreement, to grant the [19] bankrupt an under-lease at such a rent as should pay the Defendant 8 per cent. on the amount paid by him, but at other times the Defendant disputed the agreement; that the amount received by the Defendant for rent greatly exceeded 8 per cent.; the bill prayed a discovery, and that the rights of the Plaintiffs might be ascertained and declared:—for an account of the dealings and transactions between the Plaintiffs and the Defendant: for a declaration that any assignment of the premises might stand as a security for legal advances, and that the Plaintiffs might be let in to redeem, with an alternative prayer, that if it should appear that the premises were demised to the Defendant on the terms of his granting an under-lease, then that it might be decreed.

To this bill the Defendant filed a general demurrer for want of equity, on the ground that the Plaintiffs had not by the bill stated any certain case upon which a Court of Equity would grant any relief.

Mr. Hallett, in the absence of Mr. Pemberton, in support of the demurrer.

Mr. Kindersley and Mr. Rogers, contra.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale] intimated, that he did not see how a bill, the statements of which were so vague and uncertain, could be supported. The demurrer was allowed.

[20] PAGE v. WAY. July 3, 1840.

Settlement of husband's estate on his marriage, interest to pay the rents, &c., "unto or for the maintenance and support of the husband, wife, and children, or otherwise, if the trustees should think proper to permit the same to be received by the husband during his life, without power to charge, &c.," on the bankruptcy of the husband. Held, that a trust had been created for the maintenance and support of the wife and children out of the property during the husband's life.

By the settlement made on the marriage of Mr. Jones with his wife, a part of his freehold and personal property was conveyed to trustees upon trust to receive the rents and profits, "and pay and apply the same when received, unto or for the maintenance and support of the said F. Jones, his wife and children (if any); or otherwise, if they should so think proper, permit the same rents, &c., to be received by the said F. Jones during the term of his natural life; but so nevertheless, that he should not have any power to assign, mortgage, or charge the same, or to anticipate the growing payments thereof;" and after his decease to apply the rents, &c., towards the maintenance of the wife and children (if any), or, if the trustees thought proper, to pay them to the wife for life without power of anticipation, with remainder to the children, and in default to the husband absolutely.

Mr. Jones became a bankrupt in 1837, and his assignees by this suit claimed the whole income of the trust property. There was no issue of the marriage.

Mr. G. Richards and Mr. Moultrie, for the Plaintiffs, contended that, in effect, a life interest had been given to the husband, which passed to his assignees.

Robinson v. Tickell (8 Ves. 142), Hammond v. Neame (1 Swan. 35), Berkeley v. Swinburn (6 Sim. 613), Robinson v. Waddelov (8 Sim. 184), and see Rippon v. Norton (2 Beavan, 63).

[21] Mr. Kindersley and Mr. Keene, for the wife; and Mr. Piggott, for the trustees, were not heard by

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale], who said: there can be no doubt of the intention of this settlement, that the wife should be supported out of the property. The words themselves admit of no reasonable doubt, for the trustees are to receive and apply the income "unto and for the maintenance and support of Jones, his wife and children (if any), or otherwise, if they think proper, permit the same rents, &c., to be received by Jones during the term of his natural life."

I am of opinion, that so long as the wife and children were maintained by Jones, the trustees had a discretion to give him the whole income, but that it was their duty to see that the wife and children were maintained. The assignees take everything subject to what is proper to be allowed for the maintenance of the wife and children, and it must be referred to the Master to settle a proper allowance.

[22] MELLISH v. BROOKS. Feb. 17, 20, July 8, 1840.

Turnpike tolls are not within the Statute of Limitations of the 3 & 4 W. 4, c. 27, and consequently more than six years' arrears of interest may be recovered on a mortgage of turnpike tolls, notwithstanding the forty-second section of that Act.

The trustees of a turnpike road borrowed a sum of money from A. B. on the security of the tolls, and they assigned to him such proportion of the tolls as the sum advanced bore to the whole principal money advanced on the credit of the tolls. Held, that the other mortgagees of the tolls were necessary parties to a suit, by A. B. against the trustees, to obtain payment of arrears of interest out of the tolls to be received.

By the Great Grimsby Road Act, passed in fifth year of King George the Third, the trustees were empowered to borrow money at legal interest on the credit of the tolls, and to mortgage or assign over the tolls as security for the sums so borrowed and the interest thereof. On the 28th of June 1782, Joseph Mellish having lent to the trustees £600, they by deed transferred and assigned to him such share and proportion of all and every the tolls granted by the Act, as the sum of £600 did and should bear to the whole principal money advanced, and then remaining due on the credit of the tolls by virtue of the Act, to hold to Mellish for the remainder of the twenty-one years granted by the Act, and all such other time as the tolls could be collected, with a proviso for making the appointment void on payment of the £600 and interest.

The provisions of the Act were continued or enlarged by subsequent Acts, and by an Act passed in the ninth year of King George the Fourth (c. 68), the new term and the tolls thereby granted were made liable to the payment of all monies theretofore borrowed, and then due and owing on the credit, or on account of the former Acts, and all interest due and to grow due thereon.

For many years after the date of the security, sums of money, occasionally less than the amount of the legal interest, were paid to Joseph Mellish in his lifetime, and after his death to his representatives, the last of which payments took place in October 1801. The [23] trustees, however, had subsequent, and down to the year 1834, continued to make general orders on the treasurer for payment of the interest due to the several mortgagees of the tolls in the list, of whom the Plaintiff who represented the original mortgagee Mr. Mellish, was included; the portion belonging to the Plaintiff had never been received by him, but had remained in the hands of the treasurer and had been misapplied by him.

In April 1832, the clerk to the commissioners wrote to the Plaintiff stating, that much uncertainty having crept into their affairs, as to the persons legally entitled to the mortgage securities, and the Plaintiff appearing in the books to be a claimant, he was directed to request him to produce the securities, as the trustees hoped to make a further reduction of the principal monies.

This letter gave rise to a discussion between the Plaintiff and the commissioners, as to the amount legally due to the Plaintiff, the former contending that he was entitled to the whole arrears of interest, and the latter insisting that the Plaintiff was entitled to the principal and to interest from 1834 only, which amounted to £210. This latter sum they tendered previous to the institution of the suit.

The Plaintiff filed this bill in 1836, against the trustee of the Act alone for payment of the whole arrears of interest out of the monies received, or to be received under the Acts of Parliament, and for a receiver.

The Defendant did not object to pay the £210 already tendered for interest, which they alleged would place the Plaintiff in the same situation, and on the same terms and footing as the other mortgagees of the tolls, but insisted that the other monies, having been [24] left in the hands of the treasurer, and appropriated to the payment of the Plaintiff, the Defendants were not now bound again to pay the same; they objected that the Plaintiff, by his laches, had deprived himself of his remedy, and insisted on the benefit of the Statute of Limitations. The first objection was, however, abandoned at the hearing.

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Loftus Lowndes, for the Plaintiff, contended that the Statute of Limitations, 3 & 4 W. 4, c. 27, did not apply to turnpike tolls; that although the forty-second section enacted that no arrears of interest in respect of any sum charged upon any land or rent should be recovered by suit, but within six years after the same should become due, yet by the first section of the Act, the meaning of the word land was limited "to all manors, messuages, and all other corporeal hereditaments whatsoever, and also to tithes (other than tithes belonging to a spiritual or eleemosynary corporation sole), and also to any share, estate, or interest in them;" that consequently tolls which were incorporeal hereditaments were not included in the Act, and that the security being by deed was not barred by this or any other statute. The only other way of barring the demand would be by presumption, but here the amount was admitted to be due; they cited Doe v. Booth (2 Bos. & P. 219), Fairtitle v. Gilbert (2 Term Rep. 169), Dumville v. Ashbrooke (3 Russ. 98, n.), Knapp v. Williams (4 Ves. 430, n.).

Mr. C. P. Cooper and Mr. Dixon, contra, contended that the Plaintiff ought to have proceeded at law under the General Turnpike Act, 3 G. 4, c. 126, ss. 47, 48, 49. That the recent Statute of Limitations included interest due on land; that turnpike roads were in-[25]cluded in that term, and turnpike tolls had always been held to be an interest in land under the Mortmain Act. That the claim, therefore, was barred, or at least payment ought to be now presumed. Bridges v. Mitchell (Bunb. 217), Foster v. Hodgson (19 Ves. 180), Christophers v. Sparks (2 Jac. & W. 223).

That as the Plaintiff was only to take the tolls pari passu with the other mortgagees of the tolls, they were necessary parties, and not being before the Court, the suit was defective and could not proceed.

Mr. L. Lowndes, in reply.

July 8. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. This bill is filed by the legal personal representatives of Joseph Mellish deceased, to recover what is alleged to be due for principal and interest on a turnpike road security for the sum of £600 which was lent in the year 1782. The trustees of the road, admitting the principal and some interest to be due, in the month of November 1834, paid off the sum of £150 part of the principal, and tendered payment of £210 in satisfaction of the arrears of interest then due; the Plaintiff, alleging that more than that sum was due for interest, refused to accept it in satisfaction, and in February 1836 filed the present bill.

The Defendant does not by his answer deny the Plaintiff's right to receive the remainder of his principal money, and he again offers to pay the sum of £210 before tendered, for interest, but he insists that the Plaintiff is entitled to no more, on the ground as stated in the answer, that on payment of that sum the Plaintiff would be placed on the same terms and footing [26] as the other persons who have advanced money on the security of the same tolls; and he also insists on the benefit of the Statute of Limitations, and that thereby, and by his own laches, the Plaintiff is barred from prosecuting any claim for a greater amount of interest than has been tendered to him.

These being the defences in the answer, the Defendant has by his counsel at the Bar insisted, that having regard to the nature of the security, the Plaintiff is not entitled to any relief in equity, or at least to any such relief as is sought by this bill, in the absence of all other parties having claims upon the tolls.

It would seem, that for many years after the date of the security, sums of money, occasionally less than the amount of legal interest, were paid to Joseph Mellish in his lifetime, and after his death to his representatives, but for a considerable time before the month of April 1832 no payment had been made; and there being, as was alleged, much uncertainty in the affairs of the trust, the trustees called on the Plaintiff to produce the securities he held. This communication gave occasion to the discussion which ultimately led to this suit, the Plaintiff insisting that he is entitled to all the arrears of interest which have accrued due and remain unpaid for any time, however remote, and the trustees insisting that the Plaintiff was not entitled to ask for more than the other mortgagees had received, or for a greater arrear than was tendered to him.

In the correspondence between the parties, it seems, to have been considered by the trustees, that their orders upon their treasurer to pay what was due to the mortgagees ought to be deemed an appropriation binding upon the mortgagees, but in the argument it was properly admitted that this could not be sustained, and [27] that in fact the interest had not been fully paid, and the defence was rested upon the form of the suit and upon the Statute of Limitations (3 & 4 W. 4, c. 27).

As to the form of the suit, it is to be observed, that the tolls which are collected under the Acts, are the security to which the Plaintiff and all other persons who have lent money on the credit of the Acts are entitled; that the Plaintiff is one of several, and is entitled to the benefit of only a share of the tolls, namely, a share bearing such proportion to the whole as the amount due to him bears to the aggregate amount of all the other sums borrowed on the credit of the tolls, and the question is, whether the Plaintiff, in the absence of the other mortgagees, can sue alone for his share. He asks to be paid what is due to him out of the monies received or to be received under the Acts of Parliament, and that a receiver of the same may be appointed; but the other mortgagees are interested in those monies, and the Plaintiff cannot be paid in full without diminishing the fund out of which they are entitled to be paid, and under these circumstances, I am of opinion, that in this form of suit the Plaintiff is not entitled to the general relief which he prays, or to more than the Defendants have by their answer offered to give him; the objection, however, is such that it might have been taken by demurrer, and it does in fact amount to little more than an objection for want of parties; and under the circumstances I have thought it right to consider whether the Plaintiff's claim to more than six years' arrear of interest is barred by the Statute of Limitations.

The Plaintiff holds as a security for the sum due to him a share of the tolls of a turnpike road, and the [28] question is, whether such tolls can come within the meaning of the word land as defined by the Act of 3 & 4 W. 4, c. 27; if they do, then the security of the Plaintiff, and the money due thereon, are within the provisions of the fortieth and forty-second clauses of the Act, and the Plaintiff is only entitled to recover arrears of interest for six years; but if such tolls do not fall within the meaning of the word land as defined in the statute, the Plaintiff may recover what is due, notwithstanding the length of time which has elapsed.

Now by the first section of the Act, it is directed that the word land shall extend to manors, messuages, and all other corporeal hereditaments whatsoever, and also to tithes (other than tithes belonging to a spiritual or eleemosynary corporation sole); and also to any share, estate, or interest in them or any of them; and it does not appear to me that the word land, either in its usual and proper meaning independently of the Act, or according to the extended meaning directed by the Act, can be held to mean the tolls payable for the use made of a turnpike road; and I therefore conceive that the Plaintiff's demand is not barred by the statute.

The case, therefore, appears to me to be 'in this situation, that the Plaintiff has asked and may be entitled to more than can be given to him in the present state of the record; but the Defendant in his answer states that the Plaintiff has been tendered the whole amount of interest now due to him as mortgagee; and that the Defendant is willing, and offers to pay him the sum so tendered. The sum thus referred to is £210, being much less than the Plaintiff claims.

Under these circumstances and upon this admission, I think that the Plaintiff is entitled to a decree for pay-[29]-ment of the £210, as for the arrears of interest due on the 24th of November 1834, but on the present state of the record nothing more can be done.

The Plaintiff may take a decree for £210 without costs, or have his bill dismissed with costs, without prejudice to his filing a new bill. (NOTE.—The Plaintiff elected to take the limited decree.)

[29] THE ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. THE COOPERS' COMPANY. May 7, June 18, 1840.

[S. C. 4 Jur. 572. See Commissioners of Donations v. De Clifford, 1841, 1 Dr. & War. 255; Attorney-General v. Merchants Venturers' Society, 1842, 5 Beav. 356; Mayor of Beverley v. Attorney-General, 1857, 6 H. L. C. 324; 10 E. R. 1321; Attorney-General v. Wax Chandlers' Company, 1870-73, L. R. 5 Ch. 511; L. R. 6 H. L. 12.]

Where a testator clearly declares an intention of devoting the whole income of a property to charitable purposes, then, although he does not, in specifically directing the application of portions of it, exhaust the whole income, still the general intention that the whole shall be applied to charitable purposes will prevail; and on the other hand, although he does not make any such general declaration of devoting the whole to charity, but gives each and every portion of the whole income at the time to some charitable purpose, and by that means exhausts the whole, then if the income should afterwards increase, the increase will also be applicable to the charitable purposes.

A testator devised a house to the Coopers' Company, upon condition, and to the use, intent, and purposes of maintaining, augmenting, and supporting a school at R., lately erected, and the same rent which he represented to be £11, should be bestowed in manner following. He then gave different sums to different objects, amounting in the whole to £8, and amongst them 5s. to the Coopers' Company, and then gave £3, which he represented as that which remained ungiven, to the Coopers' Company, to put in their common box, towards the repair of the house when need be; and if the house should fall into decay by sudden misfortune, whereby no rent should be made, then the legacies to stay until it should be made tenantable, which he trusted the company would do within two years, and when tenantable, the company to go on with his will, "to avoid the penalty and danger which followeth." He then gave the house over beneficially to the Grocers' Company if the Coopers' did not bestow the £8 as he willed them to do. The rents increased to £75.

Held, that all the objects of the testator's bounty were entitled to participate in the increased rents, and that the Coopers' Company took the three-elevenths beneficially, subject to the repairs.

This was an information filed by the Attorney-General upon the certificate of the Charity Commissioners, and it prayed a declaration that the property [30] mentioned in the information was held by the Coopers' Company for charitable purposes only, and not for their own use and benefit, and that the whole of the rents ought to be applied to the several charitable purposes in the will of the testator directed, and to the repair of the said premises, and for an account of the rents and a scheme for the future regulation of the charity.

The testator Henry Coker by his will, dated in 1573, gave the whole rents of his house called the Ship to his wife for life, and proceeded in these terms; and "after her decease, then I will the said houses unto the master wardens of the Company of the Coopers, and they to put it to the same use as hereafter followeth; that is, I will the said houses called the Ship, wherein now dwelleth Robert Wythens and Godfrey Wilson unto the master wardens of the Company of Coopers, after the decease of my wife, upon this condition, and to this use, intent, and purpose, that is to the maintenance, augmentation, and upholding of the schoolhouse of Ratcliff, late erected by Nicholas Gibson, grocer, and the same rent of the aforesaid houses called the Ship, which is now rented at £11 by the year, the which money and rent my mind and will is, now as then and then as now, shall be bestowed in manner and form following;" he then proceeded to give £8 out of the £11 in small sums and in different ways, and amongst them 5s. yearly out of the rents to the master wardens of the Coopers' Company, to be equally divided among them; he afterwards recapitulated the preceding gifts in the following terms: "The sum of all the money which I do will yearly to be given by the master wardens of the Company of Coopers out of the rent that cometh out of the houses called the Ship aforesaid, that is to the schoolmaster of Ratcliff £3, 6s. 8d. To the usher £1, 13s. 4d., to the master wardens of the Company of Grocers 40s., for a sermon 6s., [31] to the parson at St. Michael's 12d., to the churchwardens 2s., to the clerk and beadle of the Grocers 2s., to the clerk and beadle of the Coopers 2s.; to a carpenter appointed by the master wardens of the Grocers 2s., and to the master wardens of the Coopers 5s. The sum of all is £8, so that there remain ungiven of the whole rent of the same houses £3. The which £3 I give unto the master wardens of the Company of Coopers to put into their common box of the said company towards the reparations of the aforesaid houses when need shall be, and further my very mind and will is, as now as then and then as now, that if the said houses given to the master wardens of the Company of Coopers shall so far fall into decay by sudden misfortune (as God defend), whereby no rent may be made of them to perform my legacies by them to be done, then my very will and mind is, now as then and then as now, that the legacies when such chance shall fall (as God defend), shall stay until such time as they may be made tenantable, which I trust they will do with speed at the furthest within two years and no further prolonged, then the said housing being made tenantable, my very will and mind is, that the master wardens of the Company of Coopers shall go forward with this my will as I first made and set order in the same as my sure trust is in them, as they will avoid the danger and penalty that followeth; that is my mind and will is, as now as then and then as now, that if the master wardens of the Company of Coopers do not bestow the £8 in manner and form, in part or in all, as I willed them to do in this my will, and suffereth and neglecteth my legacies to be done in part, or in all by the space of one whole year after the first view and warning given unto them to be done, and leaveth it undone and no reasonable cause to the contrary, that then my very will and mind is, as now as [32] then and then as now, that the master wardens of the Company of Grocers shall enter upon said houses and ground called the Ship; and they to repulse and put out forth the master wardens of the Company of Coopers for ever; and the master wardens of the Company of Grocers to enjoy them, and have them for ever, and do with it as shall seem good to them, and to do and use them as they do with any lands belonging unto them."

The rents of the property had increased and now amounted to £75 a year, and the questions were first, whether after paying the specific sums given to the other charitable objects to the extent of £8 a year, the company were or not entitled to the surplus beneficially; and secondly, whether after providing for the repairs, the company were entitled beneficially to the surplus or took it subject to the charitable trusts.

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Blunt, in support of the information, contended that the intention of the testator was to devote the whole income to charity, and consequently that the whole increased rents were applicable to that purpose; that the Coopers' Company took nothing beneficially; and that, at all events, each charity was entitled to a proportionate increase of the sums named in the will; The Attorney-General v. The Mercers' Company (2 Bli. N. S. 178).

Mr. C. P. Cooper, Mr. Hubback, and Mr. Norie, contra, contended that the several payments comprising the £8 annually were fixed payments, which were not to receive any increase on an improvement taking place in the rental; and that the company, upon keeping the [33] property in repair, were entitled beneficially to the whole surplus. That the use of the word legacies, the direction to put into the common box, and the clause of forfeiture all shewed that the company took beneficially; in The Attorney-General v. The Cordwainers' Company (3 Myl. & K. 534) a similar condition of forfeiture was held to entitle the company beneficially.

The following cases were cited or referred to in argument:—Thetford School case (Coke Rep. 8, 130 b.), Danvers v. Manning (2 B. C. C. 18), The Attorney-General v. Corporation of Bristol (3 Mad. 319; and 2 Jac. & W. 294), The Attorney-General v. Brazen Nose College (2 Cl. & F. 295), The Attorney-General v. Catherine Hall (Jacob, 381), Attorney-General v. Smythies (2 Russ. & My. 717), The Attorney-General v. The Skinners' Company (5 Sim. 596), Shepherd v. The Mayor of Bristol (3 Mad. 320), Jordon's Charity (5 Sim. 571; and 1 Myl. & K. 416), Attorney-General v. Johnson (Ambler, 190), and as to the effect of long usage, Attorney-General v. Caius College (2 Keen, 150).

Mr. Bacon, for the Grocers' Company, submitted to the decree of the Court.

Mr. Pemberton, in reply.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale] (at the conclusion of the argument observed), there is no dispute as to the principles on which the Court acts in cases of this kind, and which have, I conceive, been very properly and [34] accurately stated at the Bar; that if the testator clearly declares an intention of devoting the whole income of a property to charitable purposes, then, although he does not, in specifically directing the application of portions of it, exhaust the whole income, still the general intention that the whole shall be applied to charitable purposes will prevail; and on the other hand, although he does not make any such general declaration of devoting the whole to charity, but gives each and every portion of the whole income at the time, to some charitable purposes, and by that means exhausts the whole, then, if the income should afterwards increase, the increase will also be applicable to charitable purposes. Those are general rules which have been adopted.

With respect to the clause, which has been very much relied on in this case, as to the pain, danger, and penalty which was to follow, if the Coopers' Company neglected to do the repairs, or to make the payments, namely that then the master wardens of the Company of Grocers were to enter and expel them, it must be observed, that although a pain and penalty, by the terms of it, certainly implies some loss to the party who suffers it, and may be the loss of a beneficial interest as seems to have been decided by Sir John Leach in the case of the Cordwainers' Company, yet this testator might very probably have considered it a pain and penalty to take from the company the management of this property; whether I ought so to consider it, must, I think, depend on a very careful examination of the case of Cordwainers' Company.

I confess the case is very far from being free from doubt: and I shall give my opinion upon it in a day or two.

[35] June 18. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS. This information prays a declaration that the property in question is vested in the company, and held by them for charitable purposes only.

Upon a consideration of the will of the testator, Henry Cloker, it appears to me that a declaration to that effect cannot be made, and that the Defendants are entitled to a beneficial interest in the property; for, although the testator has said that he devised the property to the Coopers' Company, "upon this condition, and to this use, intent, and purpose, that is, the maintenance, augmentation, and upholding of the school at Ratcliff;" yet he has afterwards directed the temporary application of a portion of the rent to a different purpose, and has shewn an intention to connect the performance of the trust with the pecuniary interest of the persons who were to perform them; and having given £3, which he describes as what remains ungiven of the whole rent of the property, to the Coopers' Company, to put into the common box of the company, towards the reparations of the property when need should be, he has imposed a penalty or forfeiture on the company in default of their applying the other parts of the rent as he had willed. Under these circumstances I think that the company took a beneficial interest in the property; and considering that at the date of the will the whole rent was £11, and observing the mode in which the testator has divided the whole sum, and given specific sums for specific purposes, which, together, constitute the whole sum, I think that he must be considered to have meant an apportionment of the whole; and it therefore appears to me that the Defendants, although entitled to a beneficial interest, are not entitled to an indefinite or unascertained residue, but only to three-[36]-elevenths of the whole residue subject to the repairs, and that they are trustees of the remaining eight-elevenths for the charity.

Affirmed, August 4th, 1841.

Parties having an equitable estate only, agreed to grant a lease to A. B., which was to contain special covenants both on the part of the lessors and lessee. The intended lessors died before the lease had been granted, and their interest became vested in bankrupt assignees and an heir at law, against whom a decree for specific performance was made. Held, that receiving the benefit of the lessee's special covenants the assignees and heir were themselves bound, to the extent of their interest in the property, to enter into the special covenants which the original intended lessors had contracted to enter into.

In this case, the Plaintiff had been declared entitled to the specific performance of an agreement for a lease against parties claiming under the intended lessors, and who respectively filled the characters of heir and bankrupt assignees, and the question was, whether such assignees and heir were bound to enter into any other covenants with the lessee, than the usual trustee covenant that they had not incumbered.

The circumstances under which the question arose were as follows. (See the case as reported in 4 Russ. 6; 2 Russ. & M. 214; and 4 Clark & Fin. 399.)

In June 1806, Thomas Willows was entitled in fee to Saville House and its appurtenants, in Leicester Square, subject to a conveyance thereof previously made to Robinson and Townes for securing the repayment of £6000 to Thomas Wright, and subject to such payment [37] on trust to convey the same to Thomas Willows and his heirs.

In the month of June 1806, the mortgage was paid off as to £3000, one moiety thereof by Miss Linwood, and as to the other moiety by John Broom and Herbert Broom; and by deeds dated the 26th and 27th days of June 1806, the legal estate was conveyed by Robinson and Townes to Richard Samuel White and Richard Rosser, who became the trustees thereof to secure the payment of £3000 and interest to Miss Linwood, the sum of £1500 to John Broom, and the further sum of £1500 to Herbert Broom; the equity of redemption remained vested in Thomas Willows in fee.

At this time an agreement was made between Thomas Willows, the mortgagor, and Miss Linwood and the two Brooms, his mortgagees, that Miss Linwood should occupy a portion of the property as an exhibition room, and that another portion of the property should be demised to and occupied by the Brooms as carpet dealers; and many alterations of the premises being required, the Plaintiff was requested and he agreed to perform the various works, on terms which were expressed in certain articles of agreement, dated the 27th of June 1806; and by these articles, and in consideration of Page's covenants and agreements, Willows, Miss Linwood, and the Brooms, with the approbation of White and Rosser the trustees, agreed with Page that they would, as soon as the buildings therein mentioned should be erected, execute to Page a lease of a part of the property, subject to the reservations therein mentioned, to hold for forty-nine years from the 29th of September then next at a rent of 40s. payable to White and Rosser; and it was agreed that the lease should contain covenants on the part of Willows for quiet en-[38]-joyment and insurance; and that the top of the roof of any buildings, to be built opposite to the lights of the building to be erected as therein mentioned, should not be raised higher than ten feet below the top of the ceiling of such last-mentioned buildings; and that no erection or roof should, during the term, be erected that should approach nearer than twenty feet to the building thereby agreed to be erected. The agreement provided several other special covenants to be entered into by Willows for the purpose of securing to the other parties the accommodation and advantages which they required, and Page agreed to execute the works therein mentioned on the terms set forth; and by the same agreement, Page agreed that when the lease to him should be executed, he would grant to Miss Linwood a lease of the rooms and apartment which she was to have, for forty-eight years and three-quarters, wanting ten days, from the 25th of December then next, at the yearly rent of £250, and subject to the stipulations therein mentioned; and that he would grant to Willows a lease of the other part of the premises at the rent of £200.

A lease of a part of the premises was afterwards granted to the two Brooms for forty-nine years and a half, from the 27th of June 1806, at a rent of £375, payable to White and Rosser till the mortgage of £6000 should be paid off, and afterwards to Willows. By another deed of the 20th of September 1806, White and Rosser were appointed receivers of the rents of the premises, on trust to pay taxes, the interest of the mortgage of £6000, and the interest on other incumbrances, and the costs of the trustees, and to apply any surplus in reduction of the mortgages.

[39] Mr. Page executed the works which he agreed to execute, with variations required by the parties and by the agreement of the 27th of June 1806: and certain indentures dated the 30th of September 1806 and 26th of November 1807 were executed, whereby the premises were charged with an annuity of £400 by means of directions given by Willows to White and Rosser to pay the same to the Plaintiff, and in the year 1808 Mr. Page became entitled to a still further security.

One part of the premises being under lease to the two Brooms, was in their possession till they took one Harris into partnership with them, and from that time the two Brooms and Harris were in possession. Another part of the premises was intended to be leased by the Plaintiff to Miss Linwood, at a rent of £250 for the same, and after the month of November 1808 a further part of the premises was occupied by her. The remainder of the premises was intended to be leased by the Plaintiff to Willows, at the rent of £200 per annum. Willows was in possession till June 1808, when he delivered possession to the two Brooms and Harris.

Mr. Page having completed all the works, in 1809 the drafts of the several leases required for the execution of the subsisting agreements were prepared and agreed to.

By the draft of the intended lease to Page, Richard Samuel White and Richard Rosser, Thomas Willows, Mary Linwood, John Broom and Herbert Broom were made parties of the one part, and Page, the intended lessee, was the only party of the other part; and it was proposed to be witnessed that a lease of the premises other than those demised by the Brooms, was granted to the Plaintiff for forty-eight years, from the 29th of Sep-[40]-tember 1807, at the rent of 40s., and subject to the several covenants therein mentioned to be on his part performed, and covenants were inserted by White and Rosser that they had done no act to incumber, and by Willows that he and White and Rosser, or one of them, would pay all rates and taxes, except as therein mentioned; and also that he and White and Rosser would repair the main walls and roofs, and also that he would insure the buildings, and rebuild the same if burnt; and further, that the top or highest line of the roof of any buildings which might thereafter be built opposite to the lights of the buildings thereby demised should not be raised higher than to a line of ten feet below the top of the ceiling of the demised buildings and rooms, and that no wall or building should be made by Willows on the ground so as to rise or approach nearer to the walls of the demised buildings than at the distance of twenty feet from the same, without the special licence of Page, and Willows was to enter into other covenants respecting the occupation of the premises and the right of way. The draft also provided covenants by Willows, Miss Linwood, and the Brooms for quiet enjoyment, further assurance and the production of deeds.

Though the draft of the lease was approved, the lease was not executed.

Thomas Willows died intestate in the year 1813, leaving John Willows his heir; and in 1814 John Willows sold the equity of redemption to John Broom, Herbert Broom, and John Harris, and by indentures, dated the 30th and 31st days of December 1814, for the considerations therein mentioned, the equity of redemption was conveyed to Davy, in trust for John Broom, Herbert Broom, and John Harris, as tenants in common, [41] subject to all mortgages, and to all leases and agreements for leases made by Thomas Willows, and then subsisting.

In April 1815 Herbert Broom died intestate, leaving his son Herbert his heir, and his widow Rebecca Broom became his legal personal representative.

In May 1817 the trustee White died, leaving Rosser his co-trustee him surviving; and in 1818 the Plaintiff filed his bill for a specific performance of the agreements which he had entered into.

In October 1820 Harris conveyed his one-third part of the equity of redemption to John Broom.

By the decree, which was pronounced on the 26th of November 1827, it was declared that the Plaintiff was entitled to have the lease to him, the two several leases from him, and the under-lease from Mary Linwood to him executed by all proper parties, according to the drafts prepared by White, Mr. Willows's solicitor, in 1809, with this difference, that the lease thereby proposed to have been made by the Plaintiff to Thomas Willows was to be made to John Broom, Herbert Broom, and John Harris, or those who represented them, and with this difference also, that if the mortgage to the Brooms should appear to be satisfied, the Plaintiff was entitled to have the lease granted to him for the additional term of fifty years, at the rent of 40s. per annum.

On the 30th of June 1830 John Broom became bankrupt, and the Defendants Ganderton, Pittman, and Slatter were the assignees of his estate and effects; and by the various events which had occurred, the equity of redemption and the right to an under-lease which [42] when the draft of the lease was prepared were vested in Thomas Willows, had now become vested, as to two-thirds parts thereof, in the assignees of John Broom, and as to the other one-third part thereof, in the representatives of Herbert Broom.

By a decretal order, dated the 25th of July 1833, it was referred back to the Master to settle and approve of the lease to the Plaintiff, which by the decree he was declared entitled to have executed to him; and in settling the lease the Master was to have regard to the circumstances and events which had taken place since the time when the drafts were prepared by Mr. White, and the relations in which the parties stood.

In pursuance of this order the Master by his report, dated the 23d of April 1839, approved the draft of a lease which did not contain any of the special covenants which the draft of 1809 proposed that Thomas Willows should enter into. The parties were Richard Rosser, the survivor of the trustees named in the indenture of the 27th of June 1806 of the first part; Thomas Davy, the trustee named in the indenture of the 31st of December 1814 of the second part; Thomas Ganderton, Joseph Pittman, and Thomas Slatter, the assignees of John Broom, of the third part; Herbert Broom, the heir at law of Herbert Broom deceased, of the fourth part; Rebecca Broom, the administratrix of Herbert Broom deceased, of the fifth part; Mary Linwood of the sixth part; and the Plaintiff Samuel Page of the seventh part; and in this draft lease Page the Plaintiff had entered into all the requisite covenants in conformity with the agreement; but the only covenant on the part of the assignees of John Broom and the heir and administratrix of Herbert Broom was the usual trustee covenant that they had not incumbered.

[43] The Plaintiff took exceptions to the Master's report, approving of this draft lease, insisted in effect that it ought to contain covenants on the part of the assignees and heir, to the extent of the interest in the premises, to the same effect as if the lease had been executed by Willows; namely, that they should enter into covenants, limited as above stated, for payment of taxes, to repair main walls, to insure the premises, to rebuild in case of fire, not to build higher than the limited line, for quiet enjoyment, and further assurance, &c.

The exceptions now came on for argument.

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. S. Sharpe, in support of the exceptions, contended that the assignees and heir, who were to have the benefit of Page's covenants, were bound on their parts to enter into the limited covenants proposed, otherwise Page would receive as a security for his advances, which exceeded £13,000 in 1809, not a lease in the terms of the agreement, but one discharged of rates, taxes, insurance, and those protections for the beneficial enjoyment of the property which he had stipulated for.

That the parties claiming the benefit of the agreement entered into by Willows must bear the burthen, and that this was not the ordinary case of trustees, whose covenants were limited to their own defaults, but a case where parties were seeking the benefit of an agreement, and attempting, at the same time, to avoid incurring the obligation. That though the estate of Willows was equitable, yet the parties in possession, with notice of the covenants, would in equity be bound by them: The Duke of Bedford v. The British Museum (2 Sug. Vend. 361 (9th ed.), and 2 Myl. & K. 552).

[44] Mr. Teed and Mr. Glasse, for the assignees, and Mr. Kindersley, for Herbert Broom, the heir at law, admitted that the covenants now proposed were similar to those inserted in the draft lease of 1809, but limited to the estate and interest of the assignees and heir; they however argued that the Plaintiff was not now entitled to be placed in a better situation than he would have been if the lease had been actually executed in 1809. That in such case the covenants would have been in gross, and would not have run with the land, so as to bind the assignees, Willows the lessor not having the legal estate, which at that time was vested in White and Rosser, Webb v. Russell (3 Term Rep. 393), Whitton v. Peacock (2 Bing. N. C. 411); they argued that equity would not extend the legal liability on a covenant, Goddard v. Keate (1 Vern. 87); that assignees stood in a different position from ordinary persons, being trustees only for others, White v. Foljambe (11 Ves. 337), and that their liability ought to cease on their parting with the estate, Wilkins v. Fry (1 Mer. 265), or be limited to their continuance as assignees; Ex parte Stuart (2 Rose, 215). That if the bankrupt had incurred any liability the Plaintiff ought to come in, pari passu, with the other creditors, and had no equity to a preference over them; that the Court had in view this very point when it directed the Master to have regard to the change of circumstances, &c., and that the effect of making the assignees enter into such covenants as those proposed, would be to postpone the distribution of the bankrupt's estate until the expiration of the lease.

Mr. Pemberton, in reply.

[45] July 3. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. This case comes on upon exceptions to the Master's report, approving the draft of a lease to be granted to the Plaintiff by the Defendants, claiming under Thomas Willows deceased, by whom the lease was agreed to be granted; and the question is, what covenants the Plaintiff is entitled to have inserted in the lease, the Plaintiff contending that he is entitled to covenants more numerous and important than those which have been inserted in the draft of the lease approved by the Master.

The facts of this case are very long and complicated, and the time necessarily employed in obtaining a correct knowledge of them, tends, on every occasion, to increase the delays which have unfortunately occurred in this suit. (His Lordship recapitulated the facts, and proceeded.)

The Plaintiff makes no complaint of the covenants which, according to this draft, are proposed to be entered into by himself, or by the trustees Rosser and Davy, or by Miss Linwood; but the draft proposes that Herbert Broom, the heir of Herbert Broom deceased, and Ganderton, Pittman, and Slatter, the assignees of John Broom, should only covenant that they respectively have done no act to incumber, and it is therefore proposed, that the Plaintiff, who has done all in his power to perform the agreement on his part, and who is bound in further performance thereof to execute leases to Miss Linwood, and to those who claim under Thomas Willows, should under the circumstances which have taken place, altogether lose the benefit of the several special covenants which, by the draft of 1809, it was proposed and agreed that Thomas Willows should enter into.

[46] The Plaintiff insists that this is not the common case of heir or assignees being called upon formally to give effect to the agreements or covenants of persons under whom they claim, but the case of mortgagors and landlords, or lessors, seeking for themselves or the estates they respectively represent, the benefit of the agreements entered into by the mortgagees and lessees, in consideration of which the persons under whom they claim entered into the agreement on their parts. Those claiming under Willows ask for the benefit for which he stipulated, and it is argued that they must, to the extent of the estate they have received, sustain the burden. They claim the reversion of the lease which Page is to receive, and the rent which Page is to pay, and Page thereupon insists that, to the extent of that reversionary interest which they derive from Willows, they must secure to him, the Plaintiff, those benefits which were intended to be secured to him by the covenants of Willows.

The equity of redemption and the reversionary interest in the property to be comprised in the lease, as to two-third parts, is vested in the assignees of John Broom, and as to the remaining third, in the representatives of Herbert Broom.

The bill is filed by the mortgagee and proposed lessee against the mortgagor and proposed lessor.

Pending the suit, certain alienations and transmutations of interest have taken place, but the persons now claiming the interest of Willows have vested in them the right to all the beneficial interest which Willows was to receive, and claim the performance of all the duties which the Plaintiff Page was to perform towards Willows, and they cannot be allowed to exact from Page all [47] the benefit which Page was to secure to Willows, without giving to him (to the extent of the property they have derived from Willows), the benefit which Willows stipulated to give.

The principal argument urged by the Defendants is that they are not liable to more than they would have been liable to if Willows had actually executed a lease according to the draft of 1809, and that such covenants as are now required would not have run with the land; but I am of opinion that this argument cannot prevail; the Plaintiff has never been in the situation in which he would have been if the lease of 1809 had been executed at the proper time.

The Plaintiff executed the works, and entered into the agreement on his part, in consideration of the annuity and of the covenants which he was to receive from Mr. Willows. The benefits for which he stipulated have been suspended for a long series of years, and in the meantime the interest of Willows has become vested in persons who claim in a representative character, and claim for the estates they represent all the benefits which Willows stipulated to receive, and some of which are to be secured by the acts of Page; and it seems unreasonable to allow this claim, to which they are entitled, without imposing upon them, to the extent of the beneficial interest they receive, the same obligation to secure Page to which Willows himself was liable.

The several instruments executed by Willows were agreements to be performed: the benefit of those agreements is now sought, in the right of Willows, by those who are now entitled to the beneficial interest which belonged to Willows, and I conceive that the Court, in [48] directing that the Master, in settling the lease, should have regard to the circumstances and events which had taken place, and the relation in which the several parties stood, did not intend to deprive the Plaintiff of all the securities which he might have had from the covenants of Willows, but to give him the same advantages, so far as they could justly be had, against the persons to whom the beneficial interest of Willows had passed. I think, therefore, that the report is erroneous, and that it must be referred back to the Master to alter the draft of the lease by inserting proper covenants from the assignees of John Broom and the heir and personal representative of Herbert Broom, for the several purposes intended to be secured by the covenants of Thomas Willows; such covenants, however, to be limited to the beneficial interest to which the assignees and heir respectively are entitled in the premises.

[49] GREENLAW v. KING. July 4, 6, 1840.

[S. C. affirmed, 10 L. J. Ch. (N. S.), 129; 5 Jur. 18. Distinguished, Beaden v. King, 1852, 9 Hare, 521. See Guest v. Smythe, 1870, L. R. 5 Ch. 554 (n).]

An Act of Parliament empowered a rector, with the consent of the bishop who was patron of the living, to raise money by annuity for building a new rectory house, the plan and the accounts of which were to be approved of by the bishop. The bishop advanced the necessary money, and obtained a grant of an annuity, charged on the living. Held, though there was no unfairness, that the transaction, on principle, could not stand.

A rector was empowered, by Act of Parliament, with the consent of the bishop, to raise money by way of annuity on lives, for the purpose of building a new rectory house, and to charge the same on the rectory. The bishop himself advanced the money: the annuity was granted, and was paid by the rector until his death; the sums thus paid amounted to the sum advanced with lawful interest. At the suit of the succeeding rector, the transaction was set aside on the ground of the equitable incapacity of the bishop to become the purchaser of the annuity. Held, that the Plaintiff had a right to avoid the annuity altogether, and that the Defendant was not entitled to have it ascertained, what was a proper annuity to have been granted, and to charge the succeeding rector with his proportion thereof.

The object of this bill was to set aside an annuity granted to a trustee for a former Bishop of Rochester, and secured, under the powers contained in a Private Act of Parliament, on the rectory of St. Mary, Woolwich; the ground on which it was impeached was, that the bishop filled a fiduciary character under the Act, and that it was, therefore, incompetent for him to contract for a charge upon the living.

In 1819 Hugh Frazer was the rector, and the bishop, in right of his See, was the patron of the rectory of St. Mary, Woolwich, and by an Act passed in the forty-ninth year of King George the Third (local and personal, c. 88), intituled "An Act to enable the rector of the parish and parish church of St. Mary, Woolwich, in the county of Kent, for the time being, to grant building leases of the glebe lands belonging to the said rectory, and to sell the present rectory house and garden, and to build a new rectory house," after reciting that great benefit would accrue to the said rectory, and great convenience to the inhabitants of the said town, if power was given to the rector for the time being, to grant a lease or leases of the said glebe lands for a term of years, sufficient to encourage [50] persons to build upon and improve the same, and that it would be beneficial if permission were given to sell the then rectory house and garden, and to build a new rectory house; it was enacted, that the rector for the time being, should have power, "by and with the consent of the Bishop of Rochester for the time being," to lease the glebe lands for any term not exceeding ninety-nine years, at the best improved rent; and the rectory house and garden were thereby vested in the Rev. G. A. Hatch and Alexander Fraser, discharged of all estates, &c., of the bishop and his successors, and of the rector and his successors; upon trust to sell and apply the produce towards building a new rectory house, of such dimensions and extent, and with such conveniences thereto as should be approved of by a plan, &c., under the hand and seal of the said Bishop of Rochester for the time being; and it was provided that such new rectory house should be built and finished to the satisfaction of the Bishop of Rochester for the time being, at a price not exceeding £3000; and if the monies arising from the sale should be insufficient for the purpose, the rector was authorized to take fines on granting leases, but so as such fines should not in the whole exceed £3000, and that the amount of every such fine should be approved of by the Bishop of Rochester for the time being.

The powers of the above Act were enlarged by a subsequent Act of the 52 G. 3, whereby, after reciting the sale of the rectory, the granting of building leases, and of the application of the produce (about £2100) in building the new rectory house, &c., and that there would still be wanting £2000 or thereabouts to carry the Act into execution, and that it would be advantageous to the present and future rectors if power was given to Hugh Fraser to borrow a sum of money by way of [51] annuity upon two lives, towards finishing the rectory, &c.; it was enacted, that it should be lawful for the rector for the time being by deed, &c., "by and with the consent of the Bishop of Rochester for the time being, to be signified by any writing under his hand and seal," to borrow any sum, not exceeding £2000, as might be necessary for completing the rectory house, &c., by the sale of one or more annuity or annuities, upon one or more life or lives, and to secure the payment of such annuity or annuities by a grant or charge upon the ground rents reserved under the leases already granted under the said Act of the 49 G. 3, or in case of the ground rents being insufficient, upon the rents and profits of the rectory.

The produce so to be raised was directed to be invested in Exchequer bills, in the names of the trustees, and by them to be from time to time applied in finishing the rectory, &c.

And it was thereby further enacted, that when and so soon as the new rectory house, garden and offices should have been finished and completed to the satisfaction of the Bishop of Rochester for the time being, a declaration or writing to that effect, under the hand and seal of the bishop should be a sufficient release and discharge to the trustees for all the monies which might have been applied by them, or by Hugh Fraser under their authority, for and towards finishing, &c., the new rectory house, &c., pursuant to an account thereof to be by them rendered and approved of under the hand and seal of the Bishop of Rochester for the time being; and that in case there should be any balance remaining, it should be lawful for the rector for the time being to lay out and expend the same, by and with the approbation of the Bishop of Rochester for the [52] time being, in permanent improvements upon the rectory. There was a general saving clause of the right of all persons, except the bishop and rectors.

On the passing of the last-mentioned Act, measures were adopted for raising £2000 thereunder. Advertisements were inserted in the London and local papers, for persons willing to contract for an annuity on one or two lives secured on the rectory. Many applications were made, but there were no offers at a less rate than about 10 per cent. A Mr. Hill afterwards offered to advance £2000 on annuity for two lives, and the life of the survivor at 9 per cent., and a deed being prepared for securing it, and sent to the bishop for his execution, he objected that the rate was too high, and declined executing the deed. What was thereupon done did not appear in evidence, but a letter from the bishop to the agent who was negotiating the loan was proved, which was as follows:—"As Mr. Broderip, the gentleman I spoke to here, will not take the annuity at less than 8½ per cent., I have come to the determination of taking it myself at that rate, provided that in the meantime you have not been able to procure the £2000 on lower terms. The two lives I propose to insert are those of my two sons, Walker King aged fourteen, and Edward Dawson King aged thirteen years. I conceive that being a party in the deed, I cannot hold the annuity in my own right, and therefore, I propose, that my eldest son Walker should be the third party in the deed, and hold the annuity for his sole benefit. I take it for granted, that his being a minor is not an obstacle to his thus holding it, but if it should, I propose my brother, John King, Esq., of Grosvenor Place, should hold the same for me; and give me a declaration of trust to that effect. I suppose there can be no objection to having an indorsement [53] made on the back of the deed, to the purport of the memorandum which I herein inclose."

The proposed indorsement stated the advertisements, and "that no offers were made for purchasing any annuity for the longest liver of two lives upon lower terms than nearly 10 per cent., except one at 9 per cent."

It was afterwards determined that a Mr. Venables should be the trustee for the bishop; and by an indenture of the 10th of January 1813, and made between the bishop of the first part; Mr. Fraser, the rector, of the second part; the two trustees under the Act of the third part; and Thomas Venables, the brother-in-law of the bishop, of the fourth part; it was witnessed, that pursuant to and in exercise of the power and authority to the said Lord Bishop of Rochester given by the said stated Act, he, the said Lord Bishop of Rochester, did thereby consent that the said Hugh Fraser should borrow the said sum of £2000 from the said Thomas Venables, for the purpose of the said Act, by the sale to him of an annuity of £170 for the lives of the said Walker King and Edward Dawson King, and the life of the survivor of them; and it was thereby also witnessed, that in consideration of £2000 paid to George Avery Hatch and Alexander Fraser, and in consideration of 10s. to him Hugh Fraser also paid by T. Venables, the said Hugh Fraser did grant, bargain, sell, and confirm unto T. Venables, his executors, administrators, and assigns, one annuity of £170, to be paid and payable for and during the lives of the said Walker King and Edward Dawson King, and the life of the survivor of them, and to be charged upon, and issuing and payable out of all and singular the rents reserved by the several building leases then already granted in pursuance of the said Act; and Hugh Fraser, [54] thereby also charged the ground rents, and also the rents and profits of the said rectory of the parish and parish church of Saint Mary, Woolwich, with the payment of the same annuity.

The £2000 was admitted to have been the money of the bishop; and by an indenture of the 28th of January 1813, made between Mr. Venables, of the one part, and the bishop of the other part, after reciting that the £2000 was the proper money of the bishop, and that the annuity of £170 had been granted to Mr. Venables in trust for the bishop, Mr. Venables declared that he would hold the annuity in trust for the bishop, his executors, administrators, and assigns.

By letters written to the bishop by his confidential solicitors in 1820, the invalidity of the transaction had been called to the attention of the former, and counsels' opinion had been taken thereon.

In 1823 the bishop, for natural love and affection, transferred the annuity to his son, the Defendant, the Rev. Walker King.

The bishop died in 1827; and the rector having died in 1837, the Plaintiff, who then became rector, filed this bill against the Rev. W. King and the representatives of Venables, insisting on the invalidity of the transaction, and praying that it might be set aside; and for a declaration "that all sums already paid on account of the annuity of £170 ought to be considered as applied in or towards satisfaction and discharge of the interest, and then of the principal of the said sum of £2000; and if it should appear on taking the accounts that the principal and interest had been discharged, then that the Plaintiff might be relieved from further paying the annuity."

[55] The principal Defendant, by his answer, admitted, "that the several payments made in respect of the said annuity would together amount to more than a sum of £2000, with lawful interest for the same, from the date of the grant of the said annuity."

There was conflicting evidence as to the rate at which an irredeemable annuity for two lives might have been procured at the time, but as the decision proceeded on other grounds, it is immaterial to state the evidence on this point.

Mr. Pemberton, Mr. Kindersley, and Mr. R. W. E. Forster, for the Plaintiff, contended that, under these Acts of Parliament, the Bishop of Rochester was placed in the position of a trustee to defend the rectory and the future incumbents from any improper or prejudicial dealing by the trustees or the then rector. That it had been clearly settled that a trustee, or any other person holding a fiduciary character, was incapacitated from purchasing the trust property, or dealing therewith for his own benefit: thus, the commissioners and assignees of a bankrupt, the solicitor to the commission, a confidential agent, the committee of a lunatic, the trustees of a charity and a guardian, had been held incapacitated from purchasing the property as to which they had an inconsistent duty. That this case was like Grover v. Hugell (3 Russ. 428), where a part of a glebe had been sold for the redemption of the land tax, and the rector had become the purchaser, it was held that the transaction was such as to prevent a good title being made. They contended also, that as the rectory had repaid the £2000 and interest, the annuity deed ought to be delivered up to be cancelled. They cited Ex parte [56] Bennett (10 Ves. 380), Attorney-General v. Dudley (G. Cooper, 146), Scott v. Davis (4 Mylne & Craig, 87).

Mr. G. Richards and Mr. Heberden, contra, argued, first, that the bishop was not a trustee under the Acts; that his assent, which was required, was for the protection of the See of Rochester and the patronage of the rectory alone, the protection of the future rectors being sufficiently provided for by the trustees and by the superintendence of the rector for the time being, who was the party most interested in obtaining money for the purposes of the Act on the best possible terms.

Secondly, that the bishop, though a trustee, might still deal in the manner he had done; for this was not a sale by a trustee to himself, but by a cestui que trust to his trustee; that the case was like that of Howard v. Duane (Turner & Russ. 81), where it was held, that trustees, having a power of sale with the consent of a tenant for life, might sell to the tenant for life. That here no fraud or concealment had been charged, and that the attempt to prove an undervalue had altogether failed.

Thirdly, they contended that the Plaintiff was barred by lapse of time.

And, fourthly, as to the extent of relief, they argued, that the Plaintiff was only entitled to a reference to the Master, to inquire what amount of annuity ought properly to have been granted, and that the payment of such annuity ought to be decreed for the future. That if Mr. Fraser had, by overpayments, discharged the £2000 and interest, still the present Plaintiff, who had the benefit of [57] the rectory house, was not entitled to take credit for the overpayments of Mr. Fraser, whose family, if any one, were entitled thereto. That the Act contemplated the successor of Mr. Fraser bearing his portion of the burthen for the benefit he received, and that it would be most unjust if he were allowed to get rid of the whole burthen, on the plea that his predecessor had paid too much. That as regarded Mr. Fraser, the grant of annuity was valid; he had concurred in it in every way; and that if it was to be avoided as against his successor, the relief must be limited to the extent to which the arrangement was prejudicial to such successor. That the principle of repaying the £2000 and interest was not equitable: for the Defendant had run all the risk of the lives falling in, and if the two lives had ceased, the annuity would also have ceased; that a party could not be allowed to stand by and take all the advantage which might accrue from the early ceasing of the annuity by the falling in of the lives, and after the peril was over, get rid of the annuity on payment of the principal and interest. That the risk had been run by the Defendant; and although he had not insured the lives, he had himself been the insurer. As to the rectory having repaid the advance, it was a mere fallacy, the amount having been paid by Mr. Fraser himself out of his own monies. They cited, as to the purchases by trustees (2 Sugden's Vendors, 119), Ayliffe v. Murray (2 Atk. 58), Ex parte Lacey (6 Ves. 625), Coles v. Trecothick (9 Ves. 247), Downes v. Grasebrook (3 Mer. 200), Hunter v. Atkins (3 Myl. & Keen, 113), Campbell v. Walker (5 Ves. 677); as to the effect of time, Morse v. Royal (12 Ves. 355), Hosenden v. Annesley (2 S. & Lef. 637), [58] Chalmer v. Bradley (1 Jac. & W. 51), Parkes v. White (11 Ves. 226), Gregory v. Gregory (G. Cooper, 201; Jacob, 631), and Champion v. Bigby (1 R. & Myl. 539, affirmed by Lord Cottenham in 1840).

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. It appears that, in 1809, it was thought desirable to build a new rectory house at Woolwich, and for that purpose it was proposed to sell the old house and, part of the glebe lands, to obtain a power of granting leases on fines, and to employ the amount thereby raised in building the new house. To effect this purpose an Act of Parliament was obtained in 1809, authorising certain things to be done, with the consent of the bishop of the diocese.

The monies raised under this Act being found insufficient for the purpose, a second Act was obtained in 1812, whereby authority was given to raise a further sum of £2000, by granting annuities on one or more life or lives. In this Act of Parliament again, several things were required to be done with the consent of the bishop, who, being the patron of the rectory, was a most important party to any proceedings affecting the living. The several offices which seem to have been imposed upon him by these Acts of Parliament, as far as they relate to the present question, were these:—It being highly necessary and important that a house should be erected suited to the rectory or to the value of the rectory, the plan of the house was to be approved of by him: in the next place the borrowing of the money by sale of annuities was also to be assented to by him: the money to be raised was to be placed in the hands of trustees appointed by the Act; but prior to their dis-charge there was to be a declaration of the bishop, that the house had been finished and completed to his satisfaction. The accounts were to be rendered by the trustees, and to be approved of by the bishop; and, moreover, any surplus raised by these means was to be applied, with the approbation of the bishop, in planting and in other purposes for the permanent improvement of the rectory. In all these several particulars, therefore, it is perfectly manifest that the bishop had a very important duty to perform. He was intrusted not only with the protection of the interest of the See in regard to its patronage, but also with the protection of the rectory and the interest of all future rectors. The annuity was to be granted by the then rector; but as the produce was to be applied for purposes which were to be useful to all succeeding rectors, a duty was imposed on the bishop, to see that the rector for the time being did not abuse the power which was thus vested in him.

In December 1812 the rector proposed to raise £2000 by the grant of an annuity of £180 for two lives. This proposal was communicated to the bishop, who, conceiving, as I think most properly, that it was his duty not to give a blind consent, but to exercise his judgment having regard to those interests which he was bound to protect, observed, that he thought 9 per cent. was too high a rate, and in consequence of his interference the negotiation then pending was broken off.

It is to be inferred from the correspondence, that the bishop thought he could probably be able to find some person who would require a less price, and I cannot help thinking that the necessary inference to be derived from his own letter is this—that by his own proper inquiries, and acting in a manner in the highest degree meritorious for the benefit of the rectory, he [60] had found a person who was willing to advance the £2000 for a less annuity than that which had been previously proposed by Mr. Fraser, the rector, under the advice of Mr. Hogg, the surveyor. I cannot imagine that the bishop, either at this time or ever throughout this transaction, had the least sinister object in view; so far from it, I believe he was then acting with a desire to promote the interest of the rectory, and if he had never interfered further, the transaction would no doubt have stood entirely clear; instead of any contrivance or fraud, or anything of that sort on his part, I think we have indications of his having been actuated by a very contrary spirit. Finding that Mr. Broderip, to whom he referred, did not think fit to advance the £2000 at a less rate than 8½ per cent., the bishop unfortunately imagined it would not be a bad thing for him to obtain the annuity at that price. But even then, so far from being actuated by any sordid or fraudulent motive, he openly and fairly states in his letter, that he had come to the determination of taking it at that rate himself, "provided that in the meantime the agent had not been able to procure the £2000 at a lower rate;" so that if it had been in the power of the rector or his agent, in the meantime, to procure the £2000 on lower terms, I have no doubt the bishop would immediately have given up the project he at that time entertained, and personally, would have had no more to do with this transaction. How a communication of that kind from the bishop might have affected Mr. Fraser, or those who were advising him, is a matter of very different consideration; for if they found that this was a thing agreeable to the bishop, they might certainly have discontinued all exertions for procuring another person to accept the annuity at a lower price, and would, perhaps, have felt very much inclined to gratify the bishop on whom Mr. Fraser so much depended.

[61] The bishop seems to have been perfectly aware that there was a difficulty in the transaction—he was conscious, that being "a party to the deed" in another character, there existed a difficulty in making himself the grantee of the annuity, and he therefore proposed to have a trustee appointed. Mr. Venables was ultimately fixed upon for that purpose, and the transaction was then completed. Thus the bishop, in whom all these powers were vested, in whom this trust was reposed by the Act of Parliament, made himself, in the course of the transaction, an interested party.

Now I apprehend that the question here, is not whether there was fraud or no fraud, nor whether there was a contrivance to get an undue advantage or not; but the question is, whether this Court will permit a person standing in the fiduciary and confidential situation in which the bishop then was, to make himself an interested party in the very transaction which he was bound as trustee most vigilantly to superintend. What Lord Eldon said on this subject is calculated to make an impression on every mind; he says (speaking quite generally of trustees and persons in fiduciary situations), "If a trustee can buy in an honest case, he may in a case having that appearance, but which, from the infirmity of human testimony, may be grossly otherwise." (Ex parte Bennett, 10 Ves. 385.) The impossibility of detecting the conduct of parties placed in such situations, is the reason which imposes upon the Court a necessity, which I believe has always been acted on, of saying that such transactions shall not stand at all. You have not the means of finding out all the modes in which advantage can be taken; and, therefore, it is safer, and the interests of society require, that you should forbid such transactions altogether.

[62] It is undoubtedly a great satisfaction to observe, that in the course of these proceedings the bishop intended to do what was right; he however violated the rule of law, and at no very long period afterwards he was apprised of the difficulty in which he had placed himself—he was at that early period placed on his guard, and had then the opportunity of making provisions for the chance of the transaction being afterwards set aside.

It appears to me the bishop was making what he thought a proper and an advantageous arrangement for himself; but he had not the slightest idea of defrauding the rectory. I think it is but due to those who are now claiming under him to say, that such is the strong impression which I have on my mind, and that I do not think there is the smallest imputation which can rest on his memory;—no such charge is made by the bill, and the counsel for the Plaintiff have most carefully abstained from making any such imputation. The simple question, however, to which we are brought in this case is, whether such a transaction as this is, can, consistently with the rules of law, be allowed to stand. I am of opinion it cannot, because it is a clear violation of those rules which have been established for the defence of those whose interests and property have been committed to the protection of persons placed in a fiduciary situation; on that ground alone I think this case is to be determined.

It is said, that length of time is to operate as a bar; but I apprehend that time runs in this case only from the period when the present rector was appointed; the bishop was, in one sense, a trustee for the several rectors, he was to protect the interest of the rectory, not only for Mr. Fraser the incumbent at that particular time, but all future rectors; and if Mr. Fraser had either so [63] involved himself in the transaction that he could not set it aside, or if he was so interested or so well satisfied that he did not choose to set it aside, surely that is no reason whatever why the person who succeeded him should not be allowed to complain. The question is, what is now to be done. The bishop and those who claim under him have been repaid the £2000 and interest; that is admitted in the answer. Then who is injured? The bishop and those who claim under him have been repaid the money advanced, with interest, and although the annuity will now be determined to the disappointment of parties claiming under the bishop, yet this is the consequence of the transaction into which he entered, and those who claim under him must be bound by it. What the Plaintiff says is this—the rectory was benefited to the amount of £2000, and that has been repaid out of the income of the rectory—repaid it is true, out of the income of the rectory while in the enjoyment of Mr. Fraser; but what has the Defendant to do with that? The bishop and those claiming under him have been repaid, and the debt incurred by the rectory having been satisfied, the annuity ought to cease.

It being admitted in the answer that the £2000 and the interest have been repaid, I am of opinion, that the annuity deed ought to be delivered up to be cancelled.

[64] BARKER v. SMARK. July 18, 1840.

A vendor conveyed his estate to a purchaser, and took a bond for the purchase-money. He afterwards sued at law on the bond, and in equity insisting on his equitable lien. He was put to his election in which Court he would proceed.

The Defendant Smark purchased a moiety of certain property for the sum of £3000, which was conveyed to him in September 1829, in consideration of £3000 in the deed expressed to be paid.

The purchase-money was not however paid at the time, but a bond dated the 30th of June 1829 was given by Smark for the payment of the £3000 and interest.

On the 30th of May 1840, the Plaintiffs, who represented the vendor, filed their bill against Smark and others to have it declared that they had an equitable lien on the property for the payment of the £3000 and interest, and for an account and payment by means of a sale of the estate, or that a legal mortgage might be made to them by the Defendants.

On the 10th of June 1840, the Plaintiffs also commenced an action at law on the bond, for the recovery of the £3000 and interest.

On the 9th of July, the Defendant Smark, after putting in his answer, obtained ex parte, an order that the Plaintiffs should elect within eight days in which Court they would proceed. It was now moved on the part of the Plaintiffs, that this order might be discharged with costs.

Mr. Chandless, in support of the motion contended, that the order had been obtained on a false suggestion, namely, that the Plaintiff was prosecuting the Defendant [65] both at law and in equity for one and the same matter: whereas the Plaintiff was proceeding against the Defendant personally at law and against the estate in equity; on that ground, he contended, that the order for election ought to be discharged; Mills v. Fry (3 Ves. & B. 9). He argued that a mortgagee was entitled to avail himself of all his remedies at one and the same time: and that the decision of Greenwood v. Taylor (1 R. & Myl. 185) had been disapproved of in the recent case of Mason v. Bogg (2 Myl. & Craig, 443).

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Teed, contra, insisted on the regularity of the order to elect and distinguished this from the case of a legal mortgage.

Mr. Chandless, in reply.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS said, that although a mortgagee was entitled to pursue all his remedies concurrently, yet in this case where the vendor had taken a bond to secure the purchase-money, he could not be permitted to sue at law and in equity at the same time: that this order to elect would not prejudice the Plaintiff, for if he failed in one remedy he might resort to the other.

[66] LANE v. PAUL. June 17, July 21, 1840.

The Plaintiff's right to except to the Defendant's answer for insufficiency, is not waived by a motion for production of papers, founded on admissions in the answer. It is unnecessary in such a case to move "without prejudice to the Plaintiff's right to except."

It is not true as a general proposition that an insufficient answer is no answer.

On the 9th of May the Plaintiff gave notice of a motion for the production of documents admitted by the answer of the Defendants to be in their possession, but the notice contained no reservation of its being made "without prejudice to the Plaintiff's right of excepting to the answer."

On the 29th of May the motion was brought on, when an order made against one Defendant; exceptions to the answer for insufficiency were delivered on the same day.

On the 11th of June the same motion was made and discussed as to another Defendant, and on the same day the exceptions for insufficiency were referred to the Master.

A motion was now made on the part of the Defendant to discharge the order referring the exceptions on the ground of irregularity, it having been made after the motion to produce the documents, and after an order had been made on admissions contained in the answer.

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Kinglake, in support of the motion, contended, that by moving on admissions in the answer without any reservation of the right to except, the Plaintiff had affirmed the sufficiency of the answer; for an insufficient answer being considered no answer, the Plaintiff by adopting it for the purposes of the motion had assumed its sufficiency.

[67] That the practice was thus stated in Maddock's Chancery Practice (vol. ii. 3d ed. p. 422). "After an application to pay money into Court founded on an admission in the answer, the Plaintiff, it has been held, cannot except to the answer; a special motion in such cases should be made for payment of money into Court without prejudice to a reference for insufficiency; no direct authority was cited, but that was the opinion of the registrar which the Vice-Chancellor confirmed;" Rowe v. Anderson (May 15, 1819, MSS.).

Mr. Loftus Lowndes, contra, contended that the practice was otherwise. That if such a motion had the effect of preventing exceptions being afterwards taken, the Plaintiff could not prevent that result by stating in his own notice of motion that it was to be made "without prejudice," or in such a mode as not to produce the effect which, it was assumed, the Court attributed to it; in Phillips v. Stephenson (11 Price, 733), the Court refused to insert this qualification in the order; he referred also to a case of Davis v. Franklyn lately before the Lord Chancellor.

Mr. Pemberton, in reply.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS said he would take an opportunity of inquiring into the practice.

July 21. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. In this case the Plaintiff, having given notice of a motion for the production of documents, stated in the schedules to the answer, took exceptions to the answer, and caused the same to be delivered on the same day on which an order was made upon the motion; and he [68] afterwards obtained an order to refer the exceptions to the Master in the usual manner.

The notice of motion did not express, as is often done, that the motion was intended to be made without prejudice to the Plaintiff's right to except to the answer; and the Defendant, alleging that the motion was an acceptance of the answer or a waiver of the exceptions, now moves that the order referring the exceptions may be discharged for irregularity. Rowe v. Anderson, which was cited at the Bar, is the only decided case which has been found on the subject, and it is in favour of the motion; but it appears from a note of the late Mr. Walker that that case was decided upon a motion that a like order had been made by Lord Eldon in the case of Rowe v. Gudgeon, which seems to have been a mistake, the order in Rowe v. Gudgeon having been made by Sir Thomas Plumer, and being made in the common form for the production of papers without prejudice to the Plaintiff's right to except.

Under these circumstances Rowe v. Anderson cannot be considered as a conclusive authority; and it appears to me that the words "without prejudice" so frequently introduced into notices of motion made upon the answer before the time for excepting has expired, can only be considered as made from abundant caution, and cannot in the absence of direct decision be taken as conclusive evidence, that if the words were not introduced, the motion would be a waiver of the exceptions.

Though an answer which is found insufficient may be treated as no answer, as to the points on which it is so found, yet it is not true, as a general proposition, that an insufficient answer is no answer: an answer, insufficient in many points, may yet in other points be most [69] important to the Plaintiff, and sufficient to bind the most important interests of the Defendant.

I recollect no instance in which an order for production of papers or payment of money into Court has not been made without prejudice to the right of excepting when so asked, nor any instance in which it has been suggested, that the words "without prejudice," &c., when asked for, ought not to be inserted; and it appears to me, that if the Defendant by the answer admits sufficient to entitle the Plaintiff to a production of papers, it would be unjust to say, that the Plaintiff shall not have the production, without depriving himself of the time to except to other parts of the answer, which the general rules of the Court permit.

The answer, though sufficient for the motion, may be very insufficient in other respects; and supposing that upon the answer filed, there is a clear right to have money or papers brought into Court, and yet that it is not clear whether it would be for the Plaintiff's benefit to except to any other part of the answer, there seems no reason why during the time which the general rules of the Court allow for that purpose, he should be obliged either to delay his motion to obtain the order to which he is entitled, or to lose the time for further consideration upon the other parts of the answer; and it being understood that by the general rules the Plaintiff has a certain limited time to except to the answer, it does not appear that the Defendant can be injured by the omission of the words "without prejudice," &c., in the notice of motion for production of papers.

I am therefore of opinion that this motion must be refused, but considering the doubts which have existed on the practice, and the case of Rowe v. Anderson, it is refused without costs.

[70] FINCH v. BROWN. July 20, 1840.

The ordinary rule between mortgagor and mortgagee in possession is, that the Court will not direct an account with annual rests, if there was an arrear of interest due on the mortgage at the time of the mortgagee's taking possession.

A property was subject to a mortgage for £1000; A. B. agreed with the mortgagor for the purchase of a portion of this property, and entered into possession without paying his purchase-money. In 1813 A. B. bought up the whole mortgage for £1000, on which an arrear of interest of £101 was due. There was at the same time due from A. B., in respect of his purchase £365. Nothing further being paid by the mortgagor, A. B. in 1816 recovered possession of the property. The rents exceeded the amount of interest, and in 1823 the whole arrear of interest had been paid off. The Court refused to direct annual rests.

Mr. Finch being entitled to an estate in the county of Berks, the whole of which was subject to a mortgage for £1000, agreed to sell a portion of it, called the Short-Grove Close, to a Mr. Brown.

In September 1811 possession was taken by Mr. Brown of the part he had purchased, without however paying the purchase-money for it.

In January 1813 Mr. Brown obtained a transfer of the mortgage, which, as before observed, extended over the whole estate. At that time there was due on the mortgage for principal the sum of £1000, and for interest £101. On the other hand, there was due from Brown to Finch, for the amount of purchase-money of the Short-Grove Close, and for interest from the time he took possession, the sum of £365. On the balance, therefore, of accounts there was due from Finch to Brown in January 1813 the sum of £736.

No further interest appeared to have been paid on the mortgage, and Brown, in August 1816, recovered and retained possession of the mortgaged property. By means of the rents received by him, the whole arrear of interest was paid off by November 1823. After this time the annual interest amounted to about £30, while the average rental amounted to nearly £70 a year. [71] The sum of £518 was still due to 1835 on the balance of accounts, about £300 having been paid for repairs, &c., by the mortgagee.

The cause coming on for further directions on the Master's report, who had ascertained the particulars of the account,

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Coleridge contended, that under the circumstances, and the rents exceeding the interest from 1823, the accounts ought to be now taken with annual rests.

Mr. Tinney and Mr. E. Montagu, contra, cited Wilson v. Metcalfe (1 Russ. 530), Davis v. May (19 Ves. 383), and Latter v. Dashwood (6 Simons, 462).

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale] said he must consider that there was an arrear of interest due when the mortgagee took possession, and that the ordinary rule therefore applied, which was not to direct annual rests in such a case.

[72] MEHRTENS v. ANDREWS. July 15, 1839.

A testator, who died in 1767, directed his estate to be converted and invested, and he gave the same to his wife for life, remainder to his daughter, with remainder to the Plaintiffs. The executors neglected to convert some leaseholds, and permitted the successive tenants for life to enjoy the same until their expiration. After their deaths the Plaintiffs filed their bill against the representatives of the executors for a general account. The executors, who had no personal knowledge of the matter, represented the residue to consist of a sum in the funds; and they, by their answer, amongst other papers, admitted the leases to be in their possession. At the hearing the Plaintiffs waived the accounts, and took the money in the funds. They afterwards discovered the breach of trust in respect of the leaseholds, and filed a supplemental bill to obtain relief in respect thereof. The Court, notwithstanding the former decree, decided in their favour, but without costs.

Executors who, contrary to the trusts of the will, had permitted the tenant for life to enjoy leasehold property in specie, the title to which was bad, but of which no advantage was taken by the owners of the property, being responsible for the value of the lease at the testator's death: Held, that such value should be ascertained, having regard to the enjoyment actually had thereunder.

The testator J. G. Bass, being possessed, amongst other property, of two leaseholds, the first being held for a term of sixty-one years from Michaelmas 1753, at a rent of £20, and the second for a term of twenty-one years from Midsummer 1753, at a rent of £20, made his will, dated in 1761, whereby he gave to John Savage and James Savage all the residue of his estate and effects, upon the special trust that they should, as soon as might be after his decease, convert the same into money, and invest the same at interest on Government or other securities, and pay the interest to his wife for life, with remainder to his daughter Sarah Duppa for life, with remainder to her children, and in default, to his next of kin living at the death of Sarah Duppa.

(who, in the events which happened, proved to be the Plaintiffs in this cause), and he appointed John Savage and James Savage his executors.

In 1767 the testator died, and his will was proved by his executors. They realised the other residuary estate, and invested it in £7000 consols, but they did not sell the leasehold property; in the same year [73] (1767), the widow and the two executors demised the first-mentioned leasehold property for twenty-one years, determinable at the end of seven or fourteen years, at a rent of £135, 16s.; and in the same year the executors, for a nominal consideration, assigned the second-mentioned property for the residue of the term unexpired therein.

The first-mentioned property was afterwards let on lease by the widow and Sarah Duppa, and the whole rents were received by them during the continuance of the lease.

The widow died in 1789; the first-mentioned lease expired in 1814, and Mrs. Sarah Duppa having died in 1831 without issue, the ultimate limitation thereupon took effect in favour of the Plaintiffs, who were foreigners.

The Defendant Gibbs was the executor of Sarah Duppa, who was the surviving executrix of the surviving executor of the testator; and he thus represented both the original testator and Sarah Duppa. In 1832, and after the death of Sarah Duppa, the Plaintiffs filed their bill against Gibbs and others for a general account of the estate of the testator. Gibbs, who was a mere representative, and was very imperfectly acquainted with the affairs of the testator, stated by his answer, that the whole residue consisted of the money in the funds, but he admitted the leases, &c., relating to the leaseholds to be in his possession. The cause came on for hearing, when the Plaintiffs waived taking the accounts of the estate, and having on a reference been found to be the next of kin entitled under the testator's will, they, on the cause coming on for further directions obtained an order for dividing the funds amongst them.

[74] Having afterwards, as they stated, discovered the facts relating to the leaseholds, and alleging that they had been misled by the erroneous statement in the answer of Gibbs, they filed the second bill to recover the amount of the value of the leaseholds at the testator's death.

The leases were alleged by the Defendants to have been granted by a tenant in tail, who had power to lease for twenty-one years only, and who died without issue, and without having suffered a recovery.

The cause now came on for hearing, when

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Wright contended, that by the non-conversion of the property according to the specific directions in the will, a breach of trust had been committed, for which the Defendants were responsible; that the Plaintiffs had not been guilty of any laches; that time did not run until the death of the tenant for life, when the class to take became for the first time ascertained. That the waiver of accounts had been made by the Plaintiffs in ignorance of their rights, and ought not therefore to deprive them of the relief now sought by their supplemental bill.

Mr. Kindersley and Mr. Shadwell, for the Defendants, submitted, that the present suit ought not to be entertained after the Plaintiff's waiver of the accounts in the former suit. They also insisted, that the lease of 1753, having been granted by a tenant in tail who had the power to lease for twenty-one years only, and who died without having suffered a recovery, was therefore void as against those in remainder, and had expired in 1774, after which the parties had become mere tenants at will. They argued also that at this distance of time it ought [75] to be assumed that the tenants for life had become the purchasers of the leaseholds; that the Defendants were, at the utmost, liable only for the value of the leaseholds at the testator's death, having regard to the bad title; and that the Plaintiffs were barred by the lapse of time.

Mr. Pemberton, in reply. No length of time will bar a trust, and parties whose interests are contingent are not bound to assert their rights until such interests come into possession. The value of the leases must be ascertained with reference to the enjoyment had thereunder.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. This is one of those cases which one cannot contemplate without very great regret, for whatever may have been the conduct of the parties at the time when this transaction took place, still this suit, if successful, will have the effect of depriving innocent parties of that to which they had every reason to think themselves entitled, and who have had no reason to believe that their interests would be contested.

The direction in the will of the testator was distinct, it was therefore the duty of the executors and trustees to have obeyed that direction, and to have converted the leaseholds into money. That course, however, was not pursued, they permitted the successive tenants for life to enjoy the whole income, so that on their death the whole interest was gone, and nothing was reserved for those who became entitled in remainder.

It is attempted to answer this by saying that although the lease had been granted for sixty-one years, yet it was granted upon a bad title: that the lessor was [76] only tenant in tail, and had no right to grant a longer lease than that which a tenant in tail has the power to grant. It is not very material how that may be, for if the parties who became successively entitled to this property after the death of the tenant in tail did not think fit to dispute the lease, but allowed it to continue as if it were a legal and valid lease, and thereby permitted the persons who were to enjoy the benefit of it under the will to receive the whole profit, such persons were not entitled to retain the whole profit for their own benefit, but ought to have secured it for all the persons entitled under the testator's will, and amongst them for the contingent legatees. It is said, and perhaps truly, that if this property had been sold at the time, a very small sum would have been produced for the tenants for life and those in remainder, but, however that might have been, the property ought to have been secured for the persons in remainder; and if by the forbearance of those who were entitled to dispute the validity of the lease, profit was made by it, the whole of it ought not to have been received by the tenants for life alone, but all the persons entitled under the will were entitled to their proportion of the benefit of it.

It is then said, that the Plaintiffs are precluded by the length of time which has occurred since these transactions took place. The tenant for life died in 1831, upon which event the Plaintiffs' interest first vested absolutely, and this bill was filed in 1836. It is true that the Plaintiffs might immediately on the death of the testator have filed a bill to have their interests secured, but they were under no obligation to do so, and their neglect so to do did not authorise the trustees and executors to deal with their property in the way they have done; persons entitled in remainder or contingency only, are not to be precluded from relief be-[77]-cause they do not file their bill until after their interests have become vested in possession. I am therefore of opinion, that no such time elapsed between the death of the tenant for life in 1831 and the filing of this bill as to deprive these parties of relief.

With respect to the former suit, if there were anything whatever to shew, that the Plaintiffs at the time when they prosecuted that suit were in any degree aware of any right they might have with respect to the matter now complained of, I should certainly have thought their conduct such as would have prevented their commencing a fresh suit for the relief they now ask; but this does appear to me to be a discovery made since that time. It is clear that the decree in that cause is not so framed as to give to the parties the relief which they seek for in this cause; and I think, after some hesitation, and having had some doubt about the matter in the course of this proceeding, that I ought not to consider that decree as one which deprived the Plaintiffs of the relief they now ask, and which, independently of that decree, they would be most clearly entitled to. Though there has been some neglect, I think I am bound to give the Plaintiffs relief, but I ought not to give them the costs, on the contrary, having regard to the other suit, the costs of this suit, though for redress against a breach of trust, must come out of the sum recovered.

It remains to be considered to what extent the Defendants are liable. If the matter had been rightly conducted, the leases would have been sold on the testator's death: the produce would have been invested: the income would have been paid to the tenants for life, and the capital preserved for those entitled in remainder. What is to be ascertained is the value of the leases at the time [78] when they ought to have been sold. I should scarcely think it worth while to take any enquiry as to the one which was assigned for a nominal consideration; with respect to the other the real object is to ascertain what was its value to be sold at the time when it ought to have been sold, which I apprehend to be a year after the death of the testator. Now if I were to direct it simply in that way, the Defendant would of course say it was worth nothing to be sold, because there was a bad title. I cannot think that that would be right; what is to be ascertained is the value of the lease, having regard to the enjoyment which was actually had under it; it must then be ascertained how much stock could have been purchased with that amount, and that, I think, is what the Plaintiffs are entitled to.

[78] GILLETT v. PEPPERCORNE. July 25, 27, 1840.

A. employed B, a stockbroker, to purchase some Canal shares. B. apparently bought them from C, the ostensible owner, but who afterwards turned out to be a mere trustee for B. The Court, after a lapse of several years, and without entering into the question of the fairness of the price, Held that the transaction was void on grounds of public policy, and set it aside with costs.

The Defendant, a stockbroker, was largely interested in the South Lambeth Water works Company, of which he was also an active director. Having recommended the Plaintiff to make investments therein, the Plaintiff, in May 1826, December 1830, and January 1831 respectively, purchased through the Defendant twenty-five shares in the undertaking, and which shares were transferred to the Plaintiff by persons named Ewart, Cole, and Manning respectively, and from whom, apparently, the Defendant purchased such shares for the Plaintiff. It subsequently turned out that at the times of the sales these shares actually belonged to the [79] Defendant, and that they had shortly previous been transferred into the names of the apparent vendors, as trustees for him. Some of these shares had, after their purchase, been transferred by the Plaintiff to his sons by way of advancement; but they were retransferred the day previous to the institution of this suit. The Plaintiff, as he alleged, made this discovery in 1837, and in 1838 he filed this bill to set aside the transaction, on the ground that it was not competent to a stockbroker or agent employed to purchase, to sell his own shares to his principal in the name of another party; that the prices given were extravagant; that the Defendant had been guilty of fraudulent concealment of the real fact: and the bill prayed that the Defendant might return to him the purchase-money given for the shares, with interest at 5 per cent., the Plaintiff offering the retransfer the shares, and all the profits received by him.

The Defendant, by his answer, insisted that he had not acted as the broker of the Defendant, but merely as a friend; that the prices given were the fair market prices; that no fraud had been intended; and that the transfer had been made through the medium of a third party, in order to prevent the depression in the price of shares, which would have been created by a transfer by one so intimately connected with the company; he also relied on the Statute of Limitations.

There was no evidence of the prices charged being extravagant, or of any fraud having been intended, and it appeared also, that the Plaintiff was a large proprietor of shares purchased from other persons.

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Loftus Wigram, for the Plaintiff, argued that shares of this description, the number of which were limited, had no market price like the [80] public funds, and that therefore it was not possible accurately to ascertain their real value. That a party employed as agent to purchase on behalf of his principal was not permitted, by the rules of equity, to sell to his principal, unless he clearly informed his employer of the fact. That sales so made were altogether void in equity, and the transaction was liable to be set aside. That the principle had been settled by this Court and the House of Lords in the case of Brookman v. Rothschild (3 Simons, 153, 2 Dow & CL 188, 5 Bligh, 165, N. R.). That here there had been an improper concealment of the facts, which could only be accounted for by the party intending to do what was wrong; and that the Defendant was liable to refund the purchase-money, with interest, at 5 per cent.; Bick v. Motley (2 Myl. & K. 312), Bate v. Scales (12 Vesey, 402), and Munch v. Cockerell (9 Simons, 339).

Mr. C. P. Cooper, Mr. Bethell, and Mr. E. Montague, contra, contended that the Defendant had not acted as the Plaintiff's broker, but gratuitously as his friend; and that the advice he had given was bona fide, and had turned out to be sound. That the prices given for the shares did not exceed their market value, or what would have been given to a third party; that no loss had been sustained, and consequently that the allegations in the Plaintiff's bill failed. That the Plaintiff and his son, who had access to the company's books, must be taken to be cognizant of the facts; that the delay in commencing proceedings was a bar to relief; and that the retransfer by the son to enable the father to commence this suit was contrary to the Statutes of Champerty and Maintenance, Prosser v. Edmonds (1 Y. & Col. 481), and had this effect, that the Plaintiff now claimed not in his own right, but as representing his son, who had no right of suit. They argued also [81] that no fraud or intention to deceive existed; that the only reason for transferring through a third party was to prevent the injurious effect which would result in the price of shares in the market, if an active director were known to be parting with his interest in the concern; that the proceeding was common on the Stock Exchange, and was known by the name of an assignment by double transfer; they insisted also that the case differed from Brookman v. Rothschild, where there were a series of fictitious transactions, terminating in a loss.

Mr. Pemberton, in reply, contended that no time would bar relief in respect of a fraud; that where a fraud had been committed and concealed, the onus rested on the person committing it, of shewing when the veil had first been removed, and the party defrauded first made aware of his rights.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. Though this case has necessarily occupied considerable time, and has been argued with great ability, yet the question, as it seems to me, is a very simple and short one. I have not now to consider what was the value of the shares when bought by the Plaintiff, but I have simply to determine on the validity of the different transactions at the time when they took place. If they are to be established, both parties will remain in their present situation; but if otherwise, it must be the endeavour of the Court to restore them to the situation in which they would have been, if these transactions had never taken place.

It appears from the facts admitted, that the Plaintiff and Defendant in this case had been on terms of intimacy for a great length of time, and that the Plaintiff [82] had very frequently employed the Defendant as his stockbroker and agent. The Defendant was a director and the principal manager of the Vauxhall Waterworks Company. The Plaintiff began to have an interest in that company about April 1826; and about the same time, or in the beginning of the following month of May, the Plaintiff was desirous of increasing his interest in the company. The first transaction, which is impeached, was completed through the medium of the Defendant on the 8th of May; and it appears to me from the documents, that in that transaction, the Defendant did act as the agent of the Plaintiff; that transaction, on the face of it, was a purchase by the Defendant of ten shares, from a Mr. Ewart, the apparent owner, who conveyed those shares to the Plaintiff at a price amounting altogether, with the stamp, to the sum of £931; and it seems that on the 29th of April, a few days before, the Defendant had, for a nominal consideration, transferred to Mr. Ewart the same number of shares; and on the whole, it appears beyond doubt, that at the time when the Defendant was apparently acting as the agent of the Plaintiff in purchasing the shares for him from Mr. Ewart, he was, in fact, selling and causing to be transferred shares which were his own property.

The second transaction which is impeached took place in December 1830; upon that occasion it appears to me from the documents, without going further, that the Defendant was acting as the gratuitous agent of the Plaintiff; but the acting gratuitously makes no difference in my mind as to the result of this transaction. Mr. Benjamin Cole then transferred ten shares in this company to the Plaintiff. Now, so far as the Plaintiff could judge from the transaction, Mr. Cole appeared to transfer ten shares to him, or according to his nomination; and [83] Mr. Peppercorne appeared to be acting as the agent of the Plaintiff, procuring that transfer and affecting that purchase; while the fact was, that on that very day Mr. Cole had received ten shares from a person of the name of Davies, and on the same day Mr. Davies, for a nominal consideration, had received from the Defendant six shares in that company. It is further alleged by the bill, that at some considerable time previous, Mr. Davies had also received from the Defendant the other four shares for a nominal consideration ; but I do not consider that to be proved.

The third transaction which is impeached took place on the 20th of January 1831. Upon that occasion, also, it appears to me, that the Defendant was acting as the agent of the Plaintiff. The transaction, on the face of it, was a purchase from, and a transfer by Mr. Manning of five shares. The costs of those shares was £454, 17s. 6d. ; and in this case, as in the former, it seems that the Defendant had previously transferred those five shares to Mr. Manning for a nominal consideration. To the extent, therefore, of the twenty-one shares, it appears to me that the Defendant sold the shares which were belonging to himself to the Plaintiff, when, at the time, he was appearing to the Plaintiff to act as his agent, and to be purchasing them from somebody else. The single question in this case, I apprehend is, whether such a transaction can be supported.

It is said that this is every day's practice in the city. I certainly should be very sorry to have it proved to me that such a sort of dealing is usual ; for nothing can be more open to the commission of fraud than transactions of this nature. Where a man employs another as his agent, it is on the faith that such agent will act [84] in the matter purely and disinterestedly for the benefit of his employer, and assuredly not with the notion that the person whose assistance is required as agent, has himself in the very transaction, an interest directly opposed to that of his principal. It frequently, I believe, happens that the same person is agent for both parties, in which case he holds an even hand, and acts, in one sense, as arbitrator between them ; but if a person employed as agent on account of his skill and knowledge is to have, in the very same transaction, an interest directly opposite to that of his employer, it is evident that the relation between the parties then becomes of such a nature, as must inevitably lead to continued disappointment, if not to the continued practice of fraud.

I am of opinion that these transactions cannot be supported ; not only are they in themselves so extremely likely to lead to the commission of fraud, as to make them directly against the policy of the law ; but in those cases which have occasionally come to the knowledge of the Court, and which fortunately have not been frequent, it has invariably been found that fraud has been the result of such transactions. It is not necessary to shew that fraud was intended, or that loss afterwards took place in consequence of these transactions, because the Defendant, though he might have entertained no intention whatever of fraud, was placed in such a situation of trust with regard to the Plaintiff that the transaction cannot, in the contemplation of this Court, be considered valid.

Being for these reasons of opinion, that these transactions cannot stand, the next question is, whether anything has taken place to deprive the Plaintiff of the right of saying to Mr. Peppercorne, "Put me in the situation in which I was before ; whether these shares [85] were of greater value or not, I do not choose to be at the risk of selling the shares which now stand in my name : they have been transferred to me in a manner which the law does not warrant, and I desire to be placed in the situation in which I should have been, if the transaction had never taken place." First, with regard to the length of time ; there is nothing to shew that this was discovered before the year 1837 ; it is not sufficient to say that the Plaintiff, being a proprietor, might have gone to the books and made a search and found out all these matters, or that the son, being a director and having the books before him, might have made this search ; the knowledge, in my opinion, ought to have been brought home to the Plaintiff, and this has not been done.

With respect to the other point as to the transfer made previously to the institution of the suit, I do not think it makes any difference. The prayer of the bill, to the extent of the twenty-one shares, must, therefore, be granted : the Defendant ought to take back those shares, with all the dividends which have been paid upon them, and he ought to pay to the Plaintiff the purchase-money, with interest at the rate of 5 per cent., and the costs of this suit.

[See Kinnaird v. Trollope, 1889, 42 Ch. D. 617.]

A canal company conveyed, under their common seal, the canal, works and rates to a mortgagee, to hold, &c., until repayment of certain money borrowed and interest. There was no covenant to repay. Held, under the modern Statutes of Limitations, that although the mortgagee could recover the principal within twenty years, yet his remedy for arrears of interest was limited to six years.

The point in dispute was, whether a mortgagee was entitled to six years' or twenty years' arrears of interest. The Defendant, the mortgagee, was willing before suit to pay the principal and six years' interest, but made no tender. At the hearing the mortgagee succeeded on the point of interest. Held, that as there had been no tender, the mortgagee must pay the costs.

By the Act incorporating the Croydon Canal Company (41 G. 3), they were empowered to borrow money by mortgage according to a particular form.

In 1810 they borrowed £300 from L. Brickwood, which was secured by mortgage under their common seal, whereby the company bargained, &c., to Brickwood the canal and all the works, and all the rates payable by virtue of the Act, to hold, &c., until the said sum of £300, with interest at £5 per cent., should be repaid. There was no covenant to pay.

No interest had been paid subsequent to October 1819, and under an Act of the 5th W. 4, the Croydon Canal was sold to the Croydon Railway Company for £40,250, and it was enacted that the purchase-money and all other the monies belonging to the Croydon Canal Company, should, from time to time, be paid and applied, under the orders and directions of the committee for the time being of such company, in or towards the performing, observing, paying, answering and satisfying all the mortgage and other debts, contracts, engagements, damages and expenses, and all other claims, demands and liabilities whatsoever, to which the said canal company were or might be subject or liable, and which were or ought to be performed, observed, paid, answered, or satisfied by the same canal company, or [87] so far as the same monies would extend; and the surplus (if any) of the said purchase, compensation, and other monies, which might ultimately remain after answering the purposes aforesaid, should be paid and distributed, under the like orders and directions, to and amongst the proprietors, for the time being, of the shares in the said Croydon Canal Company.

This bill was filed in June 1839 by Hodges, the assignee of the estate of Brickwood, on behalf, &c., against the canal company, for an account of what was due on the mortgage, and for payment. The Defendants stated they were ready and willing, prior to the institution of the suit, to pay the Plaintiff his principal and six years' interest; and the question was, whether the Plaintiff was entitled, consistently with the recent Statutes of Limitations, to recover more than six years' arrear of interest.

By the 3 & 4 W. 4, c. 27, entitled "An Act for the Limitation of Actions and Suits relating to Real Property," &c., it is enacted by the fortieth section, that no suit shall be brought to recover any sum of money secured by any mortgage, &c., or otherwise charged upon any land, but within twenty years after the right shall have accrued, unless some part payment or acknowledgment shall have been made in the meantime. The forty-second section provides that no arrears of rent, or of interest in respect of any money charged upon or payable out of any land, &c., shall be recovered by action or suit but within six years after the same shall have become due; provided that where a prior mortgagee has been in possession within one year next before an action or suit brought by any subsequent mortgagee, the latter may recover interest for the whole time the former was in possession.

[88] By a subsequent Act of the 3 & 4 W. 4, c. 42, entitled "An Act for the further Amendment of the Law, and the Better Advancement of Justice," it is enacted by the third section, that all actions of debt for rent upon an indenture of demise, all actions of covenant or debt upon any bond or other specialty, shall be brought within twenty years after the cause of such action or suit but not after.

The cause now came on for hearing.

Mr. Piggott (in the absence of Mr. Pemberton), for the Plaintiff, contended that the 3 & 4 W. 4, c. 27, s. 42 was not applicable to this case, and that the Plaintiff was entitled to recover twenty years' arrear of interest under the 3 & 4 W. 4, c. 42, s. 3. That it would be absurd to allow a party to recover the principal after twenty years, and yet limit the remedy for interest to six years. That the point had been raised in Paget v. Foley (2 Bing. N. C. 679), where it was insisted that an action of covenant for rent in arrear could not be brought after six years; but the Court of Common Pleas held otherwise, and that the statute of the 3 & 4 W. 4, c. 42 governed the case.

That the mortgagee, but for the Railway Act, might have entered at any time within twenty years after the last payment (1 Vict. c. 28), and he would not have been dispossessed until full payment of all the arrears of interest. That the Railway Act was not intended to defeat the rights of the mortgagees, and although no entry could now be made, yet the Plaintiff's rights must be considered as extensive as if that Act had never passed.

[89] He also argued that the Railway Act created a trust for payment of the creditors of the canal company.

As to costs, that there having been no actual tender, the Plaintiff was entitled to his costs of suit; Gammon v. Stone (1 Ves. sen. 339), and that in Garforth v. Bradley (2 Ves. sen. 678), where there had been several tenders, yet the mortgagee was considered entitled to costs, except for his having been vexatious.

Mr. Kindersley and Mr. Chandlee, contra, contended that the terms of the 3 & 4 W. 4, c. 27 were express, and that the Plaintiff could not recover more than six years' arrear of interest. That there was no covenant or security on which to sue according to the second cited Act, but the security was on the land alone. That the second Act had reference only to actions on specialties where there was a personal liability. That the Railway Act did not alter or extend the rights of the creditors. As to the costs, they insisted that the Plaintiff had claimed too much, and the Defendants having always been ready to pay the principal and six years' interest, it must follow, that if the Plaintiff should fail as to the interest, which was the only point in difference, he ought to be ordered to pay the costs of the suit which had been occasioned by his insisting on more than he was entitled to.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. This bill is filed for the recovery of a mortgage secured on land, and not on rates alone; and the only question is, what arrears of interest can be recovered on the principal sum of £300. This must depend on the [90] different Statutes of Limitation. The 3 & 4 W. 4, c. 27, s. 42 enacts "That after the said 31st of December 1833," &c. Now I cannot doubt that this money is "charged upon or payable out of land or rent," and according to this clause, interest cannot be recovered for more than six years. I am then referred to another Act, the 3 & 4 W. 4, c. 42, the third section of which enacts "That all actions of debt," &c. In this case, there is no covenant or engagement to pay, there is simply a conveyance of the canal, &c. Is this then the species of action of covenant or of debt upon bond or other specialty referred to in the second Act? I think not, and that this case depends on the first Act; consequently no more than six years of interest can be recovered.

As to the costs, there was no tender or offer to pay until the bill was filed; the Defendants must, therefore, pay the costs. If there had been a tender of the principal and six years' interest, then the Plaintiff would have had to pay them. The result of this litigation is, that the Plaintiff loses his fourteen years' interest, and the Defendants the whole costs of the suit.

[91] ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. BRETTINGHAM. July 11, 13, 1840.

Ten acres of charity land were alienated by the trustees in consideration of £55, and a fixed rent charge of £6: Held, that it was incumbent on those claiming the benefit of the alienation to shew that the transaction was beneficial for the charity, and not having done so it was held invalid.

The Court does not consider it the duty of the Attorney-General to contend for his strict rights in charity informations; in cases of hardship it sanctions his acting with forbearance towards the parties; and will postpone its decision, to give the parties an opportunity of entering into an arrangement with the Attorney-General.

A piece of copyhold land of ten acres, without the walls of the City of Norwich, was held by trustees for the poor of the parish of St. Mary, under a will dated in 1561, which described it as ten acres of arable land. In April 1725 the trustees, in consideration of a yearly rent charge of £6 and £55 in money, agreed to surrender the property to Matthew Brettingham and his heirs, and out of the £6 he was to be at liberty to deduct 9s. 7d., which was a yearly rent due to the lord of the manor.

The property was conveyed, and the £55 was paid and invested, and now consisted of £100 consols standing in the names of the trustees.

This information was filed in 1835 by the Attorney-General, on the certificate of the Charity Commissioners, stating the present annual value of the property to be about £100 a year, insisting that the trustees had no powers to alienate, and praying a reconveyance of the property upon the trusts of the charity.

There was no relator named in the information. The bill contained a statement, "that it was generally understood in the parish that the land so devised, before it was sold, was unprofitable, uninclosed, and used for playground." The agreement for sale, dated the 6th of April 1725, stated, "that by this agreement the parish made a considerable improvement of this charity, [92] for Mr. Brettingham was to pay £30 over and above the £6 per annum, and which £30 the trustees agreed to have applied to the use of the poor of St. Mary's, in the same manner as the £6 per annum was to be applied, and to that end land was to be bought and settled accordingly."

The Defendant, who had become entitled to the property (being the fifth owner in succession from the purchaser), stated his belief, that the ground was unprofitable at the time of the sale; that the sale was beneficial to the charity; that large sums had been since expended; and he submitted that the alienation was valid, and in case of being compelled to surrender, he claimed to be allowed the monies laid out in permanent improvements.

The witnesses on the part of the information deposed that the present annual value of the property was about £130.

The Defendant's witnesses proved that the buildings erected about the year 1725 must have cost £1338, and that the money expended in building, &c., since 1820 amounted to £750.

Mr. Kindersley and Mr. Blunt, in support of the information. Trustees of a charity have no power to alienate the charity property, it is of itself a breach of trust. Even in the case of leases, their powers are limited; as where it is shewn that the mode of letting is such, that no person meaning fairly to discharge his trust would have resorted to it, Attorney-General v. Cross (3 Mer. 540). Or, [93] where there is a lease for ninety-nine years at a fixed rent, the transaction cannot be supported, Attorney-General v. Lord Hotham (Turn. & Russ. 209); so where a lease is made for ninety-nine years, "it is incumbent on the lessee, taking a term of that duration, to shew a consideration making that a proper lease, as in the ordinary course of a provident management of an estate, it is not:" Attorney-General v. Brooke (18 Ves. 326; and see Attorney-General v. Kerr, 2 Beavan, 420): à fortiori, then must a party who takes under an alienation at a fixed rent charge shew its fairness. Here, there is a permanent alienation of charity property for a fixed rent of 12s. an acre, which cannot be supported.

Mr. Pemberton, Mr. George Turner, and Mr. Bird, contra, after commenting on the harshness of this proceeding, in which the Attorney-General had filed an information without a relator responsible for costs, to set aside a transaction after 115 years' acquiescence, and suggesting no fraud, but relying simply on the dry principle of law, proceeded to argue, that the trustees of a charity were under no absolute incapacity which prevented them alienating the property, if under the circumstances it was beneficial to the charity. In The Attorney-General v. Hungerford (8 Bli. 437; 2 Cl. & Fin. 357), a lease of charity lands renewable for ever at a fixed rent, which amounted to an alienation of the inheritance, was supported by the House of Lords; there, Lord Brougham, in giving judgment, distinctly stated, that an alienation might not only be harmless as regarded a breach of trust, but be fit for trustees to adopt, and be such as on an information by the Attorney-General they might be compelled to do. The case had been previously decided in the same way by Lord [94] Plunkett, who, in giving judgment, fully considered all the former decisions (8 Bli. 455). In The Attorney-General v. Warren (2 Swan. 302), the Court observed, "There is no positive law which says, that in no instance shall there be an absolute alienation;" and again, "alienation not improvident, but beneficial to the charity, and conformable to the rule which ought to guide the trustees, may be good." In The Attorney-General v. Pembroke Hall (2 Si. & Stu. 441), where the trustees of a charity conveyed to Pembroke Hall part of their lands in lieu of an annual sum payable thereout, the Court would not disturb the arrangement, and made this observation, which is very applicable to the present case: "I cannot think it the office of a Court of Equity, at the distance of more than two centuries, to undo an arrangement which was perfectly fair at the time, between the contracting parties."

That if this were a case of fraud or undervalue, it ought to be alleged and proved by the Attorney-General; but now, after a lapse of so many years, when the witnesses were dead and the evidence destroyed, every presumption ought to be made in favour of the transaction, especially where no allegation of improvidence was stated on the information.

Mr. Jeremy, for the trustees.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale], without hearing a reply, observed, I am of opinion that this transaction cannot stand. I think this a hard case, and that a discretion on the part of the public might well have been exercised by abstaining from prosecuting it, but being brought before the Court, it must be dealt with strictly upon the law and the facts as they appear.

[95] This being an absolute alienation of charity property in consideration of a perpetual rent charge and a sum of £30, I think it is incumbent upon those who claim the benefit of that alienation to shew that it was beneficial to the charity. That has not been done on the present occasion, it is difficult even to presume it, yet without that presumption it is impossible to sustain the transaction. Considering, therefore, that it cannot be supported, it is a matter of difficulty to determine what relief is to be given. It would, I think, be better to leave the matter for the present for the consideration of the Attorney-General; the case is a very hard one, and the Attorney-General will exercise a very sound discretion by treating with the parties leniently, or, if I may say so, liberally. If, however, he thinks fit to call upon the Court to act according to the strict rules of law, the Court, whatever regret it may feel, must do so; but I cannot help saying that it is much better in this case, as in a case before Lord Eldon, to leave the consideration of this matter for some time, at least, in the hands of the Attorney-General. I ought to state, in consequence of something that has passed during the argument, that I do not think it is the duty of the Attorney-General in all cases to contend strictly for the rights which the law may give him; I found my opinion, on reasons which appear to me to be quite consistent with general policy; and, if example were wanting, I have that of Lord Eldon, in The Attorney-General v. The Corporation of Exeter (2 Russ. 370), who referred it to the Attorney-General of the day to consider whether it would be proper for the charity to accept a less sum than was found to be due to it. Lord Eldon, in that case, did not receive from the Attorney-General an answer that it was no part of his business to relieve the Court from its perplexity, [96] but the Attorney-General took the matter into his consideration, and made his report, which was afterwards confirmed and acted on by the Lord Chancellor.

I should state, that I have never received an answer of that description from any Attorney-General; and I hope that every Attorney-General whilst he acts in the vigorous discharge of his duty to redress breaches of charitable trusts will consider it to be his duty to act considerately and with forbearance in all proper cases. The law arms him with great power, and enables him to bring parties before the Court without the peril of costs. That power is intended for the benefit of the public, and ought to be used, as it generally is, with forbearance, and without oppression to individuals.

The cause was ordered to stand over to enable the Attorney-General to take the case into his favourable consideration.

[97] BASTIN v. WATTS. July 24, 1840.

A testator devised a copyhold estate to trustees, in trust to pay the rents to his wife until his youngest child attained twenty-one, she maintaining his children until that event; and when and as soon as that event should happen, upon trust to pay one-fifth of the rents to his wife for life. He then gave the remaining four-fifths separately to his four daughters, nominatim, for life, with remainder to their respective children; and it was his will that if any of his children should die without issue that the share of her so dying should go to the children of such of his daughters as should leave issue; but in case all his daughters should die without leaving lawful issue, then he devised all his said real and personal estate unto his brothers and sisters; he subsequently devised the one-fifth given to the wife for life in a similar manner. A., one of the daughters, died without issue before the youngest attained twenty-one. Held, that the shares vested on the youngest attaining twenty-one; that the gift over was only of vested shares, and therefore that there was an intestacy as to the one-fifth intended for A.

William Bastin, the testator, by his will, dated in 1818, devised and bequeathed to trustees his five copyhold messuages, &c., in Cheltenham, and all other his real and personal estate, upon trust to pay the rents and profits unto his wife, Sarah Bastin, until his youngest child should attain the age of twenty-one years (provided she continued his widow), she maintaining, &c., his four children; but in case his wife should die or marry again before his youngest child attained twenty-one, then he directed his trustees to apply such rents and profits towards the support, &c., of his children "until his youngest child should attain the age of twenty-one years; and when and as soon as that event should happen," the testator directed that his trustees, &c., "should divide his said real and personal estate into five equal shares and proportions, and that his said trustees should stand possessed thereof, upon trust to pay the rents, issues, and profits of one-fifth part thereof unto his said wife, Sarah Bastin, and her assigns for her life, or so long thereof as she should continue his widow," which he directed should be made up £100 a year. And if she married again he revoked the devise in her favour, and in lieu gave her an annuity of £80. And he "further directed that as to one other equal [98] fifth part of all his said real and personal estate, his said trustees should pay the rents, issues, and profits thereof unto his daughter, Mary Ann Bastin, and her assigns for life, and after her decease upon trust to convey such share unto all and every the child or children of Mary Ann Bastin; to hold to her, him, or them, their heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns as tenants in common;" and he gave in similar terms another one-fifth to his daughter Emily for life, with remainder to her children; and a third one-fifth to his daughter Charlotte for life, with remainder to her children; and the remaining one-fifth the said testator directed should be paid to his daughter Juliana Bastin, under the same provisions, limitations, and restrictions; and the testator directed the shares to his daughters should be for their separate use.

"Provided, and the testator's will was, that in case any or either of his said children should die without issue, that the share or shares of her or them so dying should go and belong to all and every the child and children of such of his said daughters as should happen to leave issue, his, her, and their heirs and assigns as tenants in common; but in case all his said children should die without leaving lawful issue, then the said testator devised and bequeathed his said real and personal estate unto his brother and two sisters, to hold to them, their heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns as tenants in common.

"And from and after the decease of Sarah Bastin, the testator directed that his trustees should stand possessed of the said fifth part, or share of his said real and personal estate, the rents, issues, and profits whereof were thereinbefore given to Sarah Bastin for her life, upon trust to pay and apply the rents, issues, and [99] profits thereof between his said daughters in equal shares in manner aforesaid, and to convey and assure the same unto and between all the children of the said testator's said daughters, their heirs or assigns as tenants in common, or in default of issue to the said testator's brother and sisters in such and the same manner, and to the same uses, intents, and purposes as were thereinbefore expressed with regard to the said four shares thereinbefore devised."

The testator died shortly after, leaving his widow and four daughters surviving him.

In 1829 the testator's daughter Juliana died an infant without issue, and on the 24th of May 1837 Emily the youngest surviving daughter attained twenty-one. Neither of the surviving daughters had any issue.

The only remaining property of the testator consisted of the copyhold houses in Cheltenham, the rents of the one-fifth part wherof, originally intended for the testator's daughter Juliana, had been carried to a separate account until the determination of the rights of the parties thereto under the above circumstances. A supplemental bill was filed for determining that point, and it now came on for hearing.

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Koe, for the surviving daughters contended, that the gift to Juliana did not vest until the youngest attained twenty-one, and that having died before that period, she had acquired no vested interest; so that even her children (if she had had any) could not have taken. That the gift over, being of the vested share only to which the daughter Juliana at her [100] death might be entitled, had failed by the death of Juliana during the minority of Emily; that there was consequently an intestacy as to the one-fifth intended for Juliana.

Mr. Kindersley and Mr. Blower, for the heir of one of the deceased sisters of the testator; and

Mr. G. Turner and Mr. James Campbell, for a surviving brother and sister of the testator, admitted that nothing vested in Juliana; but they contended, that the gift over was of the share intended for her; that the ultimate gift to the brothers and sisters was expressed to be "of my said real and personal estate," which was a residuary gift, and not a gift of the particular contingent shares previously given to the daughters, and that this shewed clearly the meaning of the testator in the previous gifts over.

That the gift over to the brothers and sisters was not too remote, and that they would be entitled in the event of the other daughters dying without children. They insisted, that until the one-fifth vested, the rents of that share of the estate ought to be accumulated so long as the law allowed, and that the accumulated fund arising from the mesne profits would belong to those ultimately found entitled to Juliana's share; they cited Fearne Cont. Rem. (page 543), Genery v. Fitzgerald (Jacob, 468), Gibson v. Lord Montfort (1 Ves. sen. 485), Chapman v. Blissett (Ca. tem. Talbot, 145); and see Stephens v. Stephens (Ca. tem. Talbot, 228).

Mr. Pemberton, in reply. The subsequent gift over of the wife's one-fifth, shews that the prior gift over to [101] the brothers and sisters was not of a residue, but of the particular vested shares.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. It appears to me, that upon the true construction of this will, the brothers and sisters are entitled only to such shares as had become previously vested in the wife and children. I apprehend that this testator never contemplated the event of any child dying before the youngest attained twenty-one; and in that respect he seems to have made a very absurd disposition of his property. He gave the whole of his property to trustees upon trust, to pay the income to the wife until the majority of his youngest child, for the support of herself and her children. When the youngest attained twenty-one, then there is a distinct gift in five equal parts, one to the wife, and the other to each of the four children; and there are remainders over as to the shares which were given to the children, and which were to vest in the children when the youngest attained twenty-one. He proceeds then to consider certain events which might happen: that some of his children might die without leaving issue, in which case he gives their shares, that is the shares previously vested, to the children of the other daughters. This, which is certainly a very singular provision, was a gift over of those shares only which had vested in his daughter. It was admitted in the argument, that no share vested in his daughter Juliana, and without relying upon that admission, it appears to me that this is the true construction of this will; and then comes the gift over to the brothers and sisters, in the very same clause, and in the very same sentence, in which he has been giving over those shares only which had become vested in the children. That this is not a general residuary clause applied to the [102] whole estate, is perfectly manifest; because it applies only to the shares of the children, and not to that of the wife, and the testator seems so conscious of it, that he proceeds immediately to dispose, separately from the others, of that share which he had previously given to the wife. This, therefore, is not that general and universal gift which is required for the purposes of the argument. I think the real effect of the will is, to give over to these parties those shares which were previously vested, and no other; there is, therefore, an intestacy as to the share in question.

[102] ROBERTSON v. CRAWFORD. June 6, 10, 1840.

A. B., a widow entitled to a pension durante viduitate, cohabited with C. D. in Scotland. In regard to society, they held themselves out as man and wife; but with respect to the pension, they acted as if they were unmarried, and A. B. half-yearly made solemn declarations of widowhood for the purpose of obtaining the pension. Held, on exceptions to the Master's report, that on the whole, he was right in finding that no valid marriage had taken place.

In this case it had been referred to the Master to enquire whether the Plaintiffs Mr. and Mrs. Robertson had contracted a valid marriage previously to the 5th of June 1828. The Master found in the negative, and the Defendants took an exception to his report, thereby questioning the accuracy of the finding.

The circumstances which gave rise to the question in the suit are fully stated in his Lordship's judgment.

Mr. Tinney and Mr. K. Parker, in support of the exception.

Mr. Pemberton, Mr. Kindersley, and Mr. Schomberg, contra.

[103] June 10. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. In the year 1815 the Plaintiff Harriet Robertson, then Harriet Bouchier, as the widow of a civil servant of the East India Company belonging to the Presidency of Bombay, became entitled to a pension payable to her during her widowhood, out of the Bombay Civil Fund.

On the 5th of June 1828 it was resolved by the subscribers to the fund, that the pension from the fund then enjoyed by the widow of any member should not be discontinued on her marriage.

On this resolution being communicated to Mrs. Robertson, she stated it to be her intention to avail herself of it, and she afterwards sent to the Defendants, who are the agents of the trustees of the fund, a paper writing purporting to be a copy of a certificate of a marriage between the Plaintiffs on the 5th of March 1830; and in the same paper writing the parties were stated to have been re-married "having been previous irregularly wed."

This reference to a previous marriage which, though stated to be irregular, might have been perfectly valid, induced the trustees of the fund to enquire when such previous marriage took place. If it took place before the 5th day of June 1828, the pension payable to Mrs. Bouchier during her widowhood then ceased. No satisfactory answer having been given to the enquiries which were made, the trustees refused to continue the payment; Mr. and Mrs. Robertson therefore filed this bill against the agents of the trustees, and at the hearing it was referred to the Master to enquire whether the Plaintiffs had contracted a valid marriage previous to the 5th of June 1828. The Master has found that they [104] did not contract a valid marriage before that time, and the question comes before me upon an exception to his report.

Upon the evidence produced before the Master, it appears that if any marriage took place between Mr. and Mrs. Robertson on the 5th of March 1830, the circumstances under which the marriage took place were greatly misrepresented by Mr. and Mrs. Robertson, and the certificate, of which a paper writing purporting to be a copy was produced, appears to have been a mere invention. The sanction upon oath of so gross a fiction as this appears to me to have been, necessarily takes from the credit of the guilty parties; but innocent persons involved in the appearance of guilt or dishonour, and not knowing how to extricate themselves by direct means, have often been found to resort to improper and guilty means to defend themselves against a charge really unfounded; and it is necessary to be very cautious not to convert the disapprobation of the improper means employed for defence, into a belief of the truth of the charge which those improper means of defence were intended to meet: the credit of the party is most materially affected, but proof of the charge is not the less required.

I have read the evidence with the impression that no fact, depending solely on the oaths of Mr. and Mrs. Robertson, ought to be relied upon; but the case is to be made out against them: they cannot prove a negative; and where their statement is corroborated by other witnesses it must be attended to; and it is, I think, not to be rejected in cases where it is consistent with all the facts otherwise proved, and where, if false, it might have been easily contradicted; and so considering the evidence, it appears to me that Mr. and Mrs. Robertson [105] formed an illicit connection, and went to Scotland in the year 1818 or 1819, that they cohabited there, and permitted themselves to be called Mr. and Mrs. Robertson, and were by several persons considered to be married; but that Mrs. Robertson half-yearly made a solemn declaration that she was not married, and that their conduct was so equivocal, that although some persons considered them to be married, there were several others who considered them not to be married.

From the beginning of this connection Mr. and Mrs. Robertson were desirous to preserve her pension, which was only payable during her widowhood, and also to preserve some reputation in society, which could only be had by marriage or supposed marriage. Widowhood was the title to the pension, marriage was the title to respect in society; there could be a real title only to one; but the parties desired to have both, and consequently whatever the real fact was, there was constant practice of misrepresentation—to the Defendants there was a periodical declaration of widowhood, to the society where they lived there was a course of conduct from which marriage was to be, and perhaps was intended to be, inferred.

It is from the midst of this miserable equivocation, this habitual and degrading deception, that it has been necessary to collect the evidence by means of which it is to be ascertained, if possible, what was the real fact.

Bearing in mind that marriage is everywhere a contract, and requires the consent of parties, and that whatever may be the circumstances from which, by the law of some countries, consent may be presumed, it is plain that in this case, as in other cases of presumption, all the circumstances must be considered, as well those which re-[106]-pel, as those which support the presumption alleged. On the whole, I think, that the evidence preponderates in favour of the Master's finding. It appears to me, that the parties when they first went to Scotland were not married—the first connection between them was illicit—their conduct when they first went to Scotland gave rise to a belief, that the connection was illicit, in the minds of other persons, and the question seems to be, whether their equivocal conduct is to be accounted for, by supposing that they were not married, and desired to keep up appearances, or by supposing that they were really married, and yet acted in a way to excite suspicion at least, for the purpose of disguising the marriage and defrauding the trustees of the pension fund; and it seems to me greatly more probable, that persons who were under a strong desire to preserve the pension, and whose notions of virtue and morality did not preserve them from the illicit connection they formed, should rather determine to maintain a valid title to the pension, and trust to such contrivances as chance offered for acquiring and maintaining without just title some respect in society, than that they should act virtuously and morally in their personal connection, whilst they were defrauding the trustees of the fund, by actual declarations on oath before a magistrate, and by equivocal conduct destroying the title to consideration, to which their lawful connection entitled them; and I think that on the whole, the evidence supports this view of the case, and shews, that so far as these parties cohabited in such a manner as to create a habit and repute from which marriage might be inferred, they did so for the sake of appearances only, and without any notion or consent by either party that a marriage would thereby be constituted or evidenced. The opinions which I have read by the consent of the parties inform me, that the mere appearance to the world, and the habit and repute will not necessarily make a mar-[107]-riage by the law of Scotland, if it can be sufficiently inferred that the contract of marriage had never truly been formed by the consent of parties : that is to say, that the circumstances on which the belief of others might be founded or leading to [the inference, were permitted or arranged for the purpose of disguise and appearance only, and that the parties privately knew that no tie actually existed between them ; and considering the mode in which the connection between these parties was formed, their loose morality, their interest to preserve the pension, the equivocal circumstances in which they appeared in Scotland to several persons who have made affidavits, and the periodical declarations made on oath by Mrs. Robertson, and exposing her to the risk of punishment if shewn to be false, I think I must conclude that the title to the money is that which they preserved valid, and that they were content to rest on appearances only for any claim which they made for admission into virtuous and respectable society.

Their whole life seems to have been passed in attempts to maintain appearances, without losing their title to the pension. Isabella Guthrie had heard Mr. Robertson speak of his wife Mrs. Robertson, and other witnesses depose nearly to the same effect, but only one direct admission or declaration is proved. Mrs. Robertson, then Mrs. Bouchier, had placed three of her sons by Mr. Bouchier under the care of Mr. Graham the rector of a school at Haddington. In March or April 1819 she went to see them, accompanied by Mr. Robertson ; she was pregnant, and Mrs. Graham supposed that a private marriage had taken place. In the summer of the same year she again visited her sons, and placed another with Mr. Graham, and then told Mrs. Graham that she was married to Mr. Robertson, and had borne him a son, who was nursing at Thorningside. [108] Considering the circumstances, the communication with Mrs. Graham, with whose husband her sons were boarded, that when she visited her sons her state of pregnancy was apparent, and that she repeated her visit after that pregnancy had ceased ; the occasion seems to have been one in which, for the sake of appearances for herself, and to avoid serious inconveniences to her sons, she might be most desirous to represent herself as married, though the fact were otherwise.

Taking this declaration or admission in connection with all the other facts of the case, I do not think that it can be held to constitute a marriage, or to be any evidence of a consent to marry.

It appears from the evidence, and particularly from the affidavits of Dr. Struthers and Mr. Glen, that whatever doubts might have arisen in the minds of some persons, Mr. and Mrs. Robertson had so far succeeded in keeping up appearances, as to sustain a respectable character, and to be deemed married persons to a considerable extent ; how important this was to their reception into society, and to the welfare of the daughters of Mrs. Robertson by Mr. Bouchier, may well be conceived, yet she half-yearly made her declaration on oath that she was not married.

It can hardly be doubted, that when the certificate of the 5th of March 1830 was fabricated, the expressions which gave rise to this litigation, were inserted with a view to persuade some persons that there had been a marriage during the whole time of cohabitation, without suggesting to the other persons who had received the periodical declarations, that any marriage had taken place during the time that such declarations had continued.

[109] Nothing is to be said in any way to excuse or palliate the conduct which Mr. and Mrs. Robertson have pursued, but it is my duty to adjudicate on their civil rights, and with a view to that object, to determine upon the evidence before me, whether the Master has rightly found that these parties were not married before the 5th of June 1828, and I think that he has ; and, therefore, that the exception must be overruled.

[109] BUNNY v. BUNNY. July 27, 1840.

By her will a testatrix gave legacies of £200 each to the seven children of J. B. B., and also other interests. By her first codicil she revoked the legacies of £200 to the children of J. B. B., and all other legacies given by the will, and in lieu gave legacies of £200 each to Samuel and four other children of J. B. B. by name. By her second codicil she cancelled all legacies left in her will to J. B. B.'s children, and by a third codicil she revoked the legacy of £200 by a previous codicil to her will given to Samuel. Held, that the legacies of £200 each, given to the other four children by the first codicil, were not revoked.

The question in this case was, whether certain legacies of £200 each, given by the first codicil to the will of the testatrix, were or were not revoked.

On the 20th of November 1824 the testatrix made her will, which was prepared in a formal manner, commencing, "this is the last will," &c., and she thereby, amongst other legacies, gave as follows:—"I give to the seven children of my said cousin Joseph Blandy Bunny a legacy of £200 each." She also thereby gave to each of such children as should be living at her death, a reversionary interest in a sum of £1750.

On the 15th of August 1835 she made a codicil to her will, which was also prepared in a formal manner, commencing with the words, "This is a codicil [110] to my will" dated the 10th November 1824, and it contained this passage:—"I revoke the legacy of £200 each to the children of my late cousin, Joseph Blandy Bunny, and all and every other legacy, benefit or bequest, given to them or any of them under my said will, and in lieu thereof, I give only the legacy of £200 each to Samuel Bunny, Joseph Bunny, Martha Bunny, Elizabeth Bunny, and Anna Bunny, five of the children of my said cousin Joseph Blandy Bunny."

On the 18th of August 1836 the testatrix wrote on a small piece of paper the following memorandum, which was proved as a testamentary paper:—"I cancel all the legacies I have left on my (1) will to my late cousin Joseph Blandy Bunny's children.—A. BUNNY, August 1836."

On the 21st of December 1836 she made another formal codicil, commencing, "This is a further codicil to the last will and testament of me," &c., which bears date the 20th November 1824, and which contained the following passage:—"I revoke the legacy of £200 by a previous codicil to my said will, given to Samuel Bunny, the eldest son of my late cousin, Joseph Blandy Bunny." She thereby also gave other legacies, and declared it to be a further codicil to her said will, and to be deemed and taken as part thereof.

Joseph, Martha, Elizabeth, and Anna Bunny, by this bill claimed the legacies of £200 each given by the first codicil of the 15th of August 1835, and the question was, whether, on the context of the testamentary papers, these legacies had or had not been revoked.

[111] Mr. Pemberton and Mr. John Baily, for the Plaintiffs. By her first codicil the testatrix revokes the gift of £200 each to a class of seven persons, and in lieu gives like legacies of £200 each to five of those individuals, nominatim. The testatrix, who throughout makes a distinction between her will and codicil, by the second codicil cancels the legacies given by the will; she did not refer to the gifts in the first codicil, and therefore leaves the legacies given by the first codicil untouched: this construction is confirmed by the third codicil: for she thereby revokes a legacy of £200 "by a previous codicil," given to Samuel, one of the five persons; this shews that she conceived, that the legacy given to him by the previous codicil had not already been revoked: for, if revoked, it would have been perfectly useless to have made another codicil expressly revoking it; and, further, if she had intended the other four persons to take nothing, why not revoke their legacies at the same time with that of Samuel? Even if the second codicil revoked the legacies given by the first, the third codicil would operate as a restitution of them. A construction must be put on these instruments which will make the whole consistent: that can only be done by holding that the Plaintiffs are entitled, which construction is clearly in accordance with the intention of the testatrix.

The principle which ought to guide in the decision of such cases, is thus stated by Tindal, C. J., in giving judgment in Doe dem. Hearle v. Hicks (8 Bing. 480): "If the devise in the will is clear, it is incumbent on those who contend it is not to take effect by reason of a revocation in the codicil, to shew that the intention to revoke is equally clear and free from doubt, as the original intention to devise; for if there is only a reasonable doubt, whether the clause of revocation was intended to in-[112]-clude the particular devise, then such devise ought undoubtedly to stand."

A codicil ought not to be presumed a revocation, unless it distinctly appears: Griffiths v. Grieve (1 Jac. & W. 31). The case of Miles v. Clark (1 Keen, 92), was very similar to the present: there the "testatrix bequeathed a legacy to A. for life, with remainder to his children; by a codicil she revoked all gifts to A. and his children, except Amelia, to whom she gave £400; the testatrix subsequently, in a letter to Amelia, which was proved as testamentary, said, "I cut A. and his children off from every bequest I have formerly given to him or them." It was held, that the gift to Amelia, though one of A.'s children, was not thereby revoked.

Mr. Tinney and Mr. Piggott, contra, contended that at the time of making the second codicil, the original will and the first codicil together formed the will of the testatrix, for all codicils form part of a will: Crosbie v. MacDoual (4 Ves. 610), so that by the second codicil the testatrix, in cancelling all the legacies she had left in her will to the children of Joseph Blandy Bunny revoked the gifts both in the will and in the first codicil. If she had died immediately after the execution of the second codicil, there could have been no question; and if so the gift by the first codicil could not be revived by implication: Skerratt v. Oakley (7 Term Rep. 492); that whatever might be conjectured as to the intention of the testatrix, that intention, if omitted, could not now be supplied: Holder v. Howell (8 Ves. 97). That there was no greater inconsistency in the testatrix twice revoking the legacies to Samuel, than there would be in adopting the Plaintiffs' construction, [113] which assumed that she had twice revoked the legacies of £200 given by the will, namely, by the first and third codicils.

Mr. Pemberton, in reply.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. It appears to me that the Plaintiffs are entitled. The testatrix commences her will and the first and third codicils with formal words; she terms the first "her will," and the two others "a codicil to her will," and "a further codicil to her will, bearing date the 20th of November 1824;" and the principal question is, what the testatrix means by the word "will," when used in the second codicil. She must mean either her will or her will and codicil taken together; if she meant the former, she was doing what was unnecessary, as the legacies by the will had already been revoked; and if she meant her will and codicil, then it is not easy to account for the subsequent revocation of a supposed existing gift to Samuel. In this state of inconsistency, by far the most reasonable hypothesis is, that she was desirous of having it clearly known that she had revoked the bequests of £200 each given by her will, and that in the absence of advice, she wrote the paper, which was a short repetition of what she had already done; any doubt seems removed by the subsequent codicil, when she appears to have had advice: no longer relying on her recollection, and having the assistance of a professional person, she revokes the legacies of £200 by a previous codicil given to Samuel. It is manifest that she and the person who was advising her then considered that Samuel, and consequently the Plaintiffs also, had at that time legacies left by the previous testamentary papers. I am of opinion, therefore, that the Plaintiffs are entitled, and must decree accordingly.

[114] NEWMAN v. HUTTON. July 8, 9, 1840.

The bill alleged that the Plaintiff had paid to the Defendants a sum of £1250 as the balance of accounts between them, the Plaintiff being at that time deranged, and labouring under the erroneous impression that the Defendants could transport him; and it alleged that nothing was due from the Plaintiff, and prayed for an account and repayment. The Defendants, by a plea, stated that the parties had come to a settlement of account, and after giving credit to the Plaintiff for the sum due to him, a sum exceeding £1250 was found due to the Defendants, which by final settlement was paid, and receipts given; there was an averment that the accounts were just, that credit was given to the Plaintiff for all sums due, and that Defendants were justly entitled to credit for all sums for which credit had been given: that there was no error in the account, and that the Plaintiff was of sound mind. There was, however, no denial, by answer or averment, that the £1250 was not due. The plea was overruled.

The bill, in effect, stated that the Plaintiff had been employed by the Defendants as captain and supercargo of the Defendants' ships trading to Africa, at a fixed salary, and a commission on the goods sold. That he made four voyages without having any settlement of accounts, and that he returned to England in a very bad state of health, and was at times deranged. That he pressed for a settlement of accounts, and that the Defendants, pretending that the Plaintiff had been guilty of embezzlement, which the bill alleged to be untrue, threatened to prosecute him for felony. That a meeting took place for the settlement of the accounts, and that the Defendants made claims on the Plaintiff, amounting to £1650, which were afterwards reduced to £1250, which sum, as the bill alleged, "the Plaintiff, who was at the time in a deranged state of mind, agreed should be paid to the Defendants." The bill alleged "that the Plaintiff was not, in fact, indebted in the sum of £1250, or in any sum of money, but that the Defendants were, in fact, at that time largely indebted to him; and that he consented to pay the said sum of £1250 while labouring under temporary derangement, and under the erroneous impression that the Defendants had it in their power to transport him, and in order to prevent their so doing." The bill alleged that it was [115] then agreed that the £1250 should be paid by the Plaintiff, and that mutual receipts should be given in full of all demands, which was done the next day.

The bill prayed that an account might be taken of what was due to the Plaintiff; that the £1250 might be repaid, and that the agreement and receipt might be delivered up to be cancelled.

The Defendants put in a plea and answer to this bill; the plea stating that disputes having arisen between the Plaintiff and Defendants, they met for the purpose of coming to a final settlement; that the books of account of the Plaintiff and Defendants were produced and examined, and the state of the accounts ascertained (a calculation being made of the commission due to the Plaintiff on certain unsold goods), and after giving credit to Plaintiff for £904, which sum was calculated to be due to him, there was or would, under such computation, be due to the Defendants a sum considerably exceeding £1250; which, by way of final settlement of all accounts between them, it was agreed should be paid by the Plaintiff to the Defendants; and that receipts in full of all demands were to be mutually given. The plea then set out the written agreement, and stated that on the following day the money was paid, and mutual receipts were given; it averred that the books of account were just and true, that credit was justly given to the Plaintiff for all sums due, and that the Defendants were justly entitled to credit for all sums in respect of which credit was taken; that there were no errors in the account, and that the Plaintiff, at the time, was of sound and accounting mind. There was an answer to the part of the bill omitted from the plea, but there was no denial, by answer or averment, of the allegation in the bill that the £1250 was not due.

[116] Mr. Kindersley and Mr. Spurrer, in support of the plea.

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Elderton, contra.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. Considering the nature of this suit, and the extreme improbability that the allegations can be true, I am not surprised at the effort which has been made to shorten the suit and lessen the expences.

This bill states matters of account between the parties, and that it was necessary to settle them; that the Plaintiff was in a deranged state of mind from the time of leaving Africa, and that the Defendants procured a settlement of these accounts when he was in that state of insanity.

The bill also states that the Defendants alleged that they had the grounds for establishing a criminal charge against the Plaintiff, and that, if convicted, he would necessarily have been transported; and alleges that in this state of mind, and to avoid the consequences stated in this threat, he paid the £1250; there is also an allegation that the Plaintiff was not, in fact, at all indebted to the Defendants at the time of the settlement and payment.

The bill prays that an account may be taken of what remains due to the Plaintiff, for the repayment of the sum of £1250, and for the delivery up of the memorandum of agreement and receipt.

I need not state that if these facts were true, the Plaintiff would be entitled to have the transaction reinvestigated, and it would seem a very common equity in [117] this Court to have accounts opened and reinvestigated where, under threats, payment of a sum not due has been obtained.

To this bill the Defendants put in a plea and answer; the plea stating that a sort of agreement or settlement of accounts was made, averring that the accounts in the books were just and true, that there were no errors, and that the Plaintiff was then of sound mind; and they answer that part of the bill which is omitted from the plea; but there is no answer to the statement that nothing was due to the Defendants.

The Defendants say, that the parties met to settle these accounts, that a great part of the Plaintiff's claim related to commission on goods actually sold, another part to commission on goods not sold; and it is stated that they ascertained what was due in respect of the goods sold, and computed what was due in respect of goods unsold, and that, on the balance of accounts, more than £1250 appeared due from the Plaintiff to the Defendants; and they state that the accounts in the books were just and true accounts. But can these statements, taken together, be considered as an answer to the charge in the bill, that the Plaintiff was not indebted to the Defendants in £1250 or any sum of money? I think they cannot. It therefore does appear, from the allegation remaining uncontradicted, that £1250 was not due, and that as the Plaintiff was induced to sign the receipt under threats, he is still entitled to relief, and the plea must be overruled, with costs.

[118] DAVIES v. HARFORD. July 4, 18, 1840.

The Defendants were ordered to deposit certain documents with their clerk in Court for the usual purposes, and to give an inspection of the remainder at their office, and produce them at the examination of witnesses and at the hearing. Held, that the production on the examination of witnesses in town and at the hearing should be at the expense of the Defendants; and for production on the examination of witnesses in the country, at the expence of the Plaintiff.

The point in this case is fully stated in the judgment.

Mr. Pemberton, for the Plaintiff.

Mr. Tinney, for the Defendants.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS. In this case the Plaintiff has obtained an order that the Defendants do produce and leave with their clerk in Court certain books and papers, and the Plaintiff is to be at liberty, at all reasonable times and upon giving reasonable notice, to inspect, at the office of the Defendants, three several ledgers, and to take copies thereof, or extracts therefrom at the Plaintiff's expence; and the Defendants and their clerk in Court respectively are to produce the books and papers on the examination of witnesses, and at the hearing of the cause.

The parties differ upon the minutes of the order, only in this respect, that the Defendants say, that as the production of the ledgers on the examination of witnesses and at the hearing is to be for the benefit of the Plaintiff, it ought to be at the Plaintiff's expence, and to be so expressed in the order; whereas the Plaintiff says, that according to the rules of the Court, which are relaxed only for the convenience of the Defendants, the ledgers ought to be deposited in the hands of the clerk in Court, and that if they were so, there would be no expence incurred by the production on the examination of wit-[119]-nesses in town or at the hearing; and that the expence of production on the examination of witnesses in the country would, if required by them, have to be paid by them in the usual course, but that in consequence of the ledgers being left in the hands of the Defendants for their convenience, there will be considerable expence in the production on the examination of witnesses in town, and at the hearing.

No precedent has been found of any provision for costs in such an order as this.

Let the production be ordered on the examination of witnesses in town and at the hearing at the expence of the Defendants, and for production on the examination of witnesses in the country at the expence of the Plaintiff.

[119] THE DURHAM AND SUNDERLAND RAILWAY COMPANY v. WAWN.
July 18, 22, 1840.

The Court will restrain one tenant in common from the wilful destruction of the common property; but where a railroad company had obtained a lease from five out of six tenants in common, and had, contrary to the wishes of the remaining tenant in common, constructed a railroad on the property, which, at law, had been held to be an ouster, the Court refused to interfere by injunction to prevent the dissenting tenant in common removing the rails, &c., though the rent agreed to be paid by the company was three times the former rent.

The Defendant Mr. Wawn was tenant by the curtesy with remainder to his infant son of one undivided sixth part of two messuages, and two quays or wharfs adjoining thereto, situate in Sunderland; the remaining five-sixths being vested in other persons. This property was let at an annual rent of £30: The Plaintiffs being, in 1835, desirous of obtaining this property [120] for the purposes of their railway, agreed with the other tenants in common for a lease of it for ninety-nine years at the old rent, until the railway had commenced its operations, and thenceforward at a rent of £90 a year. A lease had been prepared by which the several tenants in common purported to grant the property to the company on the above terms, with liberty to pull down the houses and to erect works and machinery, and the company covenanted at the expiration of the lease to replace the property in its former condition. This lease, dated the 1st of July 1835, was executed by the other tenants in common, but the Defendant refused to execute it, alleging that he had entered into no agreement to grant a lease.

In August 1835 the company nevertheless entered into possession, and pulled down the houses, and erected the railway, works, &c., on the site at some considerable expence. A lengthened correspondence took place between the company and Mr. Wawn as to his concurring in the lease, but which it is unnecessary to set forth. In December 1835 Mr. Wawn gave notice of his intention to bring an action against the company, and he accordingly brought an action of ejectment to recover possession, but was defeated by an outstanding term set up by the company. (See Doe v. Wawn v. Horn, 3 Meeson & W. 333.) He afterwards brought a second action and recovered. (3 Meeson & W. 564.) On the 11th of May 1840 the Defendant caused a writ of possession for one-sixth of the property to be issued; and on the 29th of June the company filed this bill against Mr. Wawn and the other tenants in common, stating the above facts, and that from information they had received, they believed that the Defendant Wawn would, on being put into possession of his one-sixth, pull down the buildings, &c., [121] erected by the company, and pull up the railway by violence; and unless prevented by injunction would take such proceedings as would in all probability lead to a breach of the peace; the bill prayed for an injunction.

On the 30th of June the Master of the Rolls, for the purpose of preventing any damage until the question could be discussed, granted an injunction ex parte, restraining the Defendant from damaging the buildings and railway.

The Defendant now moved to dissolve the injunction.

Mr. Bethell and Mr. Hare, in support of the motion, contended, that an injunction to stay waste had in no case been granted on the application of one tenant in common against another; that such was the distinct opinion of Lord Eldon in Hole v. Thomas (7 Ves. 589), who granted an injunction in that case, on the express ground that the Defendant was there cutting timber of one-third growth at an improper season, his Lordship observing, "for that is destruction." So in Twort v. Twort (16 Ves. 128), Lord Eldon expressed the same opinion that there was no instance of an injunction having been granted between tenants in common or coparceners, nay, further, that such motions had been refused (see Goodwyn v. Spray, 2 Dickens, 667); the injunction was granted in that case expressly on the ground that the tenant in common in possession was an occupying tenant to the Plaintiff. That it had been determined in this very case at law, that there had been a legal ouster by laying down the railway, and that there was no equity to prevent the [122] Defendant from removing it if he pleased. That there had been no acquiescence on the part of the Defendant, who had all along repudiated the agreement of the other tenants in common.

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Elderton, contra, contended that, although a tenant in common had an unquestionable right of using property in a beneficial manner for himself, still he had no right so to deal with it as to destroy the profitable enjoyment of it by the other tenants in common; that here it was evidently most beneficial to all parties to lease the property at a triple rent, and that a mere tenant for life of one-sixth could not be allowed to prevent the other parties interested in the property from enjoying that benefit. That to take up the rail would be a mere wilful destruction of the property, and in the cases cited the Court admitted that an injunction would be granted between tenants in common "in a case of malicious destruction." (7 Ves. 590.) So in Twort v. Twort, it was said by Lord Eldon, "Where a case of positive and actual destruction appeared, I granted an injunction, as that was not the legitimate exercise of the enjoyment arising out of the nature of the party's title to that which belonged to him and the other party." There, also, the Defendant had, by acquiescence—by standing by and allowing the Defendants to make a great outlay on the property, prevented himself enforcing his strict legal rights to the Plaintiff's prejudice.

Mr. Bethell, in reply. No acquiescence is stated in the bill, nor has any been shewn. The Plaintiffs have put the property in its present state by their own wrong and violence, and [123] in opposition to the wish of the Defendant, who has a strict right to place it in its former position.

July 22. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. I have read the papers in this case, and am of opinion that the injunction cannot be sustained. There are two grounds on which it has been put by the Plaintiffs; namely, acquiescence, and secondly, that the circumstances are such as to amount to wilful destruction of the common property. It cannot be sustained on the first ground, for it appears that the Defendant throughout has kept the company at arm's length. On the second point, that it involves the destruction of the property, two cases have been stated which are material as shewing this, that if property be held by tenants in common, and enjoyed in conformity with their common rights, and one makes wilful destruction of the common property, he will be restrained by the Court. This state of things does not exist: the state of things which now exists was brought about by the Plaintiffs, in defiance of the legal rights of the Defendant. This, therefore, does not appear to me to come within the principle of the cases cited, and the injunction must be dissolved with costs.

The Plaintiffs appealed to the Lord Chancellor, but, after the hearing, the case was compromised.

[124] GRAHAM v. OLIVER. July 2, 3, 1840.

A party, acting as the absolute owner, contracted to sell property. He was the absolute owner of part, and as to the other part he was tenant for life, with a power of sale, at his request and by his direction, vested in trustees. Upon a bill by the purchaser for a specific performance, an enquiry was directed "whether the Defendant could make a good title, or could, by application to the trustees, procure a good title to be made."

Difficulty in decreeing a partial performance of a contract, where a vendor has not the power of fully performing it.

Evidence of conversations not put in issue is inadmissible, but where conversations are alleged in the answer, evidence is admissible on the part of the Plaintiff to shew their effect, notwithstanding they are not stated in the bill.

This was a bill for specific perform, filed by William Graham against John Oliver.

In 1838 the Defendant Oliver, acting as the owner, entered into an agreement for the sale to the Plaintiff of about ninety-three acres of freehold land, some leaseholds, and two leasehold cottages for the sum of £5500. The Defendant having refused to perform his contract, the Plaintiff filed this bill, praying a specific performance of the agreement, upon the Defendant making a good title; or if he should not be able to make a good title to the whole, then for a specific performance as to that to which he could make a good title, with a reasonable abatement from the purchase-money.

According to the answer, it appeared that the Defendant was absolutely entitled to the leaseholds; that the cottages belonged to his mother, who had verbally promised to make him a present of them; and as to the freeholds, that on his marriage they had been settled on the Defendant for life, or until bankruptcy, &c., with remainder to his wife for her separate use, with remainder to the children of the marriage (which last limitations had failed by the death of his wife without issue), with remainder over to other persons; and it was declared that it should be lawful for the trustees of the [125] settlement, "at the request and by the direction of the Defendant during his life," to be testified by some writing, to sell the property at such price as to the trustees should seem reasonable.

The Defendant resisted the performance of the agreement on the following grounds: first, he insisted that the memorandum was a proposal only, and not a concluded agreement; secondly, he alleged that the word "cottages" had been struck out of the agreement before he executed it, and that therefore there was no existing contract as to them; thirdly, that the agreement had been unfairly obtained at an undervalue; and, fourthly, he insisted that he could not make a good title to the freehold, having no power to compel the trustees to execute the power of sale, and that he was wholly unable to complete the contract as to the cottages.

Mr. Pemberton, Mr. G. Turner, and Mr. G. Russell, for the Plaintiff, after combating the first three objections to a specific performance, depending on facts which it is not necessary to set out, argued, that the contract being valid, the Plaintiff was entitled to a specific performance, either as to the whole, or as to such part as the Defendant was able to make a good title to, and that this was a case for a partial performance with a compensation: Thomas v. Dering (1 Keen, 729), Mortlock v. Buller (10 Ves. 316), Hill v. Buckley (17 Ves. 394), Milligan v. Cooke (16 Ves. 1).

That as yet there was no proof of the Defendant's being unable to make a good title, or that the trustees [126] would not concur, they therefore asked for a reference to the Master, similar to that in Glyn v. Sawle.⁽¹⁾

Mr. Kindersley and Mr. S. Sharpe, for the Defendant.

Courts of Equity will not decree the specific performance of every contract to purchase, if any doubt or hardship exists in the case, it will leave the parties to their remedy at law for damages on the contract; here sufficient doubt has been thrown on the transaction to induce the Court to withhold its intervention, especially in a case where the rights of persons not parties to the cause are deeply concerned. If the trustees were parties to the cause, which they are not, they would not be compelled to perform a contract to which they were not parties, or commit a breach of trust; even the tenant for life may, for the benefit of the parties interested under the settlement, insist that he has not exercised a sound discretion. The settled and unsettled property has been sold for one gross sum; this was improvident as regards the settled property, as the respective values cannot be clearly and satisfactorily ascertained, and the prices severed.

(1) Glyn v. Sawle was a bill by vendors for specific performance of agreement to purchase lands in Cornwall. One objection raised by the Defendants was that on part of the estate there existed certain rights of tin bounds, which authorized persons, not otherwise interested in the estate, to enter for the purpose of searching for and working tin mines.

By the decree of the Master of the Rolls, dated 25th of July 1838, it was referred to the Master to inquire whether a good title could be made to the estate in question, and at what time it was first shewn, "and in case the Master should be of opinion that a good title could not be made, he was to state the reasons upon which such opinion was founded."

As to a partial performance, the case cited of Thomas v. Dering negatives the right of the Plaintiff to have a [127] conveyance of the life-estate, and here there is no alternative prayer, as there was in that case.

Mr. George Turner, in reply, referred to Clark v. Seymour (7 Sim. 87).

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Landgate]. This bill, for the specific performance of an agreement or contract, is certainly filed under very unfortunate and very peculiar circumstances.

The Defendant being entitled to part of the property as tenant for life, and as to other part being absolutely entitled, and with regard to the remainder, it being very doubtful whether he had any title at all, enters into a contract to sell the whole property to the Plaintiff, as if it was his own. Being called upon to perform the agreement, he first of all disputes the validity of the contract. I am of opinion, however, upon the evidence, that the contract is binding upon the Defendant, and that there is no reason whatever for saying that it was unfairly obtained. The Plaintiff is, therefore, either entitled in this Court to a specific performance as to the whole or in part, or he is entitled to damages at law for the non-performance of his contract. It does not at present appear whether this contract can be specifically performed and carried into execution or not. It certainly can, provided the trustees, who have a power of sale, at the request, and by the direction, of the Defendant, think it an advantageous and proper transaction to be carried into effect by them. If this appeared to be the case, I should have no difficulty in compelling the Defendant to perform his part of the contract. If the [128] trustees do not so consider it, the Plaintiff then demands to have the contract carried into effect, so far as it can be, by the Defendant; and this case must then be considered with relation both to the freehold or settled property, and the leaseholds. If the Plaintiff demands the conveyance of the mere interest which the Defendant has in the freehold or settled property and in the leaseholds, then the question arises, which was considered by me in the case of Thomas v. Dering, whether, having regard to all the circumstances, to the nature of the property, and to the trusts of the settlement, to which part of it is subject, there ought to be that partial performance.

The general rule, subject to some qualification, undoubtedly is, that where a party has entered into a contract for the sale of more than he has, the purchaser, if he thinks fit to accept that which it is in the power of the vendor to give, is entitled to a performance to that extent.

There is, however, a very great difficulty in all these cases, and I scarcely know how it can be overcome; though a partial performance only, it has been somewhat incorrectly called a specific performance; the sentiments of Lord Redesdale on this point, as expressed by him in two cases before him, are strongly impressed on my mind. (Lawrenson v. Butler, 1 Sch. & Lef. 13; Harnett v. Yeilding, 2 Sch. & Lef. 553.) The Court has thought it right in many cases to get over those difficulties for the purpose of compelling parties to perform the agreements into which they have entered; and it is right they should be compelled to do so where it can be done without any great preponderance of inconvenience.

[129] I think it right to direct an inquiry in the terms asked, making no declaration however at present as to the specific performance of the contract; the inquiry however is directed with a view to a specific performance, if upon the result it should be ascertained, that it can be properly directed in this case.

It is clear as to the leaseholds, that the Defendant has an absolute power of selling them, and I am not prepared to say, if the Plaintiff asked for a specific performance of the agreement so far as it related to those leaseholds, that he would not have a right to insist upon it; whether he would or not does not now appear.

As to the costs, it is not at present clear that a specific performance will be decreed; it may possibly happen, that notwithstanding the situation in which things now appear, this bill may ultimately be dismissed. I think it premature to give the costs in the present state of the cause; they must therefore be reserved.

A point occurred during the progress of this cause in respect to the admissibility of evidence. The Plaintiff proposed to give in evidence certain conversations with the Defendant which were not charged in the bill, but which to some extent were stated in the answer.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS said, I do not mean in any way to prejudice the existing rule, that conversations not put in issue cannot be read in evidence, but in this case I think that to some extent the evidence is admissible. In the answer, communications to a particular effect are stated; these allegations being made by the Defendant, the Plaintiff has a right to meet them by evidence; and to the extent of shewing the real effect of these com-[130]-munications, or that they were not such as are stated in the answer, I am of opinion that these depositions may be read. So far as they tend to shew something quite unconnected with that which is alleged in the bill and answer, I think it would be an infringement of the rule to admit them.

EXTRACT OF DECREE.—Refer it to the Master to enquire whether the Defendant can make a good title, or can by application to the trustees of the indenture of settlement of the 2d and 3d days of November 1837, in the pleadings mentioned, procure a good title to be made to the premises comprised in the contract or agreement in the pleadings mentioned, including the cottage therein mentioned, or to any and what part thereof; and in case the said Master shall find that a good title cannot be made to the said premises or any part thereof, then he is to state to the Court the reason why such good title cannot be made, with liberty to state special circumstances.

[130] ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. THE HABERDASHERS' COMPANY.

A Master in Ordinary having become incapacitated from attending to the business of his office, the matters were transferred to the Master in rotation, with liberty for him to adopt the proceedings already had.

One of the Masters in Ordinary having by illness become permanently incapacitated from attending to the business of his office, frequent applications were made by motion to the Court, to transfer the matter to the office of another Master. In some of these cases the Master's report had been actually prepared, and only required his signature; and the application in such cases was, that the Master in rotation might sign the report.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS settled, in all these cases, that the proper order to be made was, "to transfer the matter to the Master in rotation, with liberty for him, if he should think fit, to adopt the proceedings already had in the Master's office."

A testator devised real estate in trust, for the persons who at his decease should be the next of kin of R. D. deceased, according to the Statute of Distributions, and their heirs as tenants in common; the next of kin consisted of great-grandchildren's children, and the children of great-grandchildren's children: Held, that they took per stirpes, and not per capita.

The testator in this cause devised certain real estates to trustees, to hold to them their heirs and assigns, and proceeded to express himself as follows: "but in trust, nevertheless, for the person or persons who at the time of my decease shall be the next of kin of Richard Dixon, late of Thoraby aforesaid, grocer, deceased (the great-grandfather of my late wife Elizabeth Terry deceased), according to the statute made for the distribution of intestates' effects, and his, her, or their heirs and assigns for ever; and if there shall be more than one such person, they shall take as tenants in common, and not as joint-tenants."

At the death of the testator, there were living descendants of Richard Dixon, coming under the description of next of kin according to the Statute of Distribution, seventeen persons, seven of whom descended from Isabella, the only daughter, and ten of whom descended from Thomas Dixon, the only son of the same Richard Dixon, and they stood in different degrees of propinquity. The next of kin of equal degree were great-grandchildren's children; the rest were children of great-grandchildren's children, who by representation according to the Statute of Distribution are deemed to be next of kin. That these were the persons to take was admitted, and the question was, whether they were to take per capita or per stirpes. The Plaintiffs, and the others who claimed as children of great-grandchildren's children, insisted that the seventeen next of kin thus ascertained, were to take per capita, and that each was [132] entitled to an equal seventeenth share of the whole estate; the others contended, that the division ought to be per stirpes, and that the children of each great-grandchild's child ought to take among them no more than the parent would have been entitled to if living at the testator's death.

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Torriano, for the Plaintiffs.

Mr. Temple, Mr. Stuart, Mr. Atkinson, Mr. Romilly, Mr. Koe, Mr. J. Russell and Mr. Keene for other parties.

August 1. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. It appears to me that the next of kin must take per stirpes. Those who are not next of kin in fact, but only deemed to be such according to the Statute of Distributions, make out their title by representation as the statute directs, and I think that they can be entitled only to such interest as might have belonged to the person they represent, unless there be words in the will which shew a contrary intention. In the absence of such words, it appears to me, that the testator, by referring to the statute must have referred to the taking by representation, allowed to persons standing in a remoter degree of propinquity than others.

The question is, therefore, reduced to this, whether the words of the will import an intention that the next of kin, though some of them derive their character as such by representation, are nevertheless to take per capita. The cases seem to shew that the word "equally" or the words "share and share alike," would here have had that effect. But the gift in this case is to the persons, and their heirs as tenants in common, and these [133] words are not exclusively applicable to equal interests as the words "equally," and "share and share alike" (Thomas v. Hole, Forrester, 251); and there being nothing in the will to shew a contrary intention, I think, that the parties who made out their right to be legatees, or devisees as next of kin by representation according to the statute, must under the will take by virtue of that representation, and only take the share of the person they represent. I think, therefore, that the estate belongs to the next of kin in shares to be determined by a distribution per stirpes.

Injunction to restrain the piracy of a publication, to which the Plaintiffs would have been otherwise entitled, refused on the ground of delay in making the application. Constructive knowledge imputed to the Plaintiffs by the Court, of an infringement of their copyright by the Defendants.

The Plaintiffs, Lewis and Pringle, who were the publishers of a work called "The Topographical Dictionary of England," applied for an injunction to restrain the Defendants, Messrs. Chapman and Hall, from printing, publishing, vending, &c., a work called "Gorton's Topographical Dictionary of England and Wales," portions of which, as they alleged, had been pirated from the Plaintiffs' work in a similar way to that stated in Lewis v. Fullarton (2 Beavan, 6).

The principal circumstances are stated in the Master of the Rolls' judgment.

Mr. Pemberton, Mr. Kindersley, and Mr. Hardy, for the Plaintiffs.

[134] Mr. G. Richards and Mr. Miller, contra, contended that no injunction ought to be granted until the Plaintiffs had established their title at law; that the two works had been compiled from common authorities, and that the Plaintiffs had deprived themselves of their right to an injunction by acquiescence and delay; they cited Saunders v. Smith (3 Mylne & Craig, 711).

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS reserved his judgment until he had again read the affidavits.

August 8. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS. In this case it has appeared, and upon reconsideration now appears to me, that the injunction for which the Plaintiffs have moved ought not to be granted. The work of the Defendant which is sought to be restrained is on the same subject as the work in which the Plaintiffs claim copyright.

The two works were preparing for publication at the same time. The publication of the Defendants began first, and the attention of the Plaintiffs was drawn to it at the commencement, and afterwards during the progress of the Defendants' publication, which was completed six years and a half before the bill was filed; and for more than one year before the bill was filed a complete copy of the Defendants' work was in the possession of the Plaintiffs, and had been obtained by the Plaintiffs for the express and avowed purpose of investigating the contents and comparing them with the contents of the Plaintiffs' work, and the contents of Fullarton's book, which at that time was under consideration here. The delay of the Plaintiffs is accounted for by [135] reasons which affect them and relate to their own convenience only. In the consideration of the case I have seen no reason to doubt the Plaintiffs' copyright; and upon the examination of the exhibits I have found reason to think that in the preparation of Mr. Gorton's third volume, considerable use was made of the Plaintiffs' work: and although the small extent to which the Plaintiffs from time to time made themselves acquainted with the contents of the Defendants' work, may in point of fact be entirely true; yet it appears to me, that the Plaintiffs having so strong an interest in the subject, having such powerful motives for vigilant attention, and having such means of information, cannot be allowed in a Court of Justice to state that they remained ignorant of that which they had the perfect means of knowing, and which it was their avowed purpose as well as their strong interest to learn; and under these circumstances I think it my duty to impute to them such a knowledge of the contents of the Defendant's work as made it their duty to apply for an injunction, if at all, at a much earlier period.

And on the ground of delay, and not for any other reason, I think that the injunction moved for must be refused.

[S. C. 9 L. J. Ch. 333; 4 Jur. 883. For subsequent proceedings, see 4 Beav. 214.]

Generally, annual rests are not directed against a mortgagee in possession, when the interest is in arrear at the time he took possession; and in the absence of special circumstances, if a mortgagee is not liable to account with annual rests, when he enters into possession, he does not become so liable, until the whole of the mortgage debt has been paid off.

Where, however, a mortgagee in possession came to an account with the mortgagor, whereby all the arrears of interest, &c., were converted into principal, leaving thereby no arrears, and he continued in possession, the rent being more than sufficient to keep down the interest, the Court directed annual rests.

This was a bill for redemption filed by a party entitled to the equity of redemption of the property in question against the representatives of the mortgagee.

In April 1789 Thomas Cluer mortgaged the property to his brother John Cluer, for securing £40 and lawful interest; this was effected by the assignment of an old term of 500 years. John Cluer in the same year took possession, but when, in particular, or whether any arrear of interest was then due did not clearly appear; he continued in possession until 1824.

In 1797 an account was taken between the parties, when it was ascertained and settled, that the sum of £128, 18s. 5d. was due to the mortgagee for principal interest and expenditure. In 1824 possession was retaken by the Plaintiff, and a sum of £40 was tendered by him to the mortgagee in payment of his demands.

John Cluer the mortgagee died in 1832, and the Defendant Hannah Cluer, who was his sole executrix brought an ejectment in 1833 and recovered possession in the following year; she had ever since retained possession.

At the hearing of the cause, it had been referred to the Master to take the accounts between the parties; by his report he treated the £128, 18s. 5d., found to be [137] due in 1797 upon the settlement of accounts, as principal, and calculated interest thereon; and he found that £45, 5s. 7d. was due to the Defendant. It appeared that the annual rents were more than sufficient to discharge the interest on the £128, 18s. 5d.

The cause now came on for further directions on the Master's report, to which no exceptions had been taken.

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Coleridge, for the Plaintiff. If the interest be not in arrear when a mortgagee takes possession and the rents exceed the interest, he is bound to apply the surplus in the liquidation of the principal, Shepherd v. Elliot (4 Mad. 254), and the Court in such a case will direct annual rests to be made against the mortgagee; this may be done on further directions, Wilson v. Metcalfe (1 Russ. 530). The mortgagee in this case took possession the same year in which the mortgage was made, and there could not have been any interest then due; besides which, by the settlement of accounts in 1797, the interest was converted into principal, and then, at least, nothing was due for interest. There ought therefore to be a reference back to the Master to review his report and take the account with annual rests, in which case it will appear that the Plaintiff has tendered more than was due.

Mr. Stinton, contra, contended that the pleadings and decree precluded the account now asked. That a very special case was required, to authorize an account with annual rests; Davis v. May (19 Ves. 382, and Cooper, 238), Latter v. Dashwood (6 Sim. 462; and see Finch v. Brown, 3 Beav. 70). That by the settlement of 1797 the parties agreed [138] amongst themselves in taking an account without rests, and had thereby recognized the principle that they should be taken in the usual mode.

Mr. Tinney and Mr. E. Montague, for other parties.

Mr. Pemberton, in reply.

August 1. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. This cause came on for further directions on the Master's report, in a suit instituted for the redemption of a mortgage.

The mortgage consisted of a term of 500 years, which was created in the year 1758, and in the month of April 1789 was assigned to John Cluer to secure the repayment to him of £40 and lawful interest. The equity of redemption was then vested in Thomas Cluer the brother of John, the mortgagee.

John Cluer in the year 1789 (the same year in which the mortgage was assigned to him), took possession of the mortgaged estate, and he continued in such possession till the year 1834, a period of about thirty-five years.

At the time when possession was taken, there could not have been more than half a year's interest due on the mortgage money, and it does not appear whether, in fact, any interest was due at the time of taking possession in the year 1789.

The Master states in his report, that in the year 1797 an account was stated between John Cluer the mort-[139]-gagee, and his then late brother Thomas Cluer, of the 25th of March 1797, which contained an account of the expenditure of John Cluer the mortgagee in respect of the mortgaged premises, and also of the principal sum of £40 and interest secured thereon by the mortgage; and that by such account it was then ascertained and settled, that there was then due to John Cluer, the mortgagee, the sum of £128, 18s. 5d., upon the entire balance of such account for principal, interest, and expenditure; in the subsequent part of report, the Master treats this sum of £128, 18s. 5d., as principal money, and computes interest thereon. The particulars of the account are not stated, otherwise than as I have mentioned, nothing is said of rent, although at that time the mortgagee had been about eight years in possession of the estate; but taking this (as upon the Master's report not objected to I think I ought) as a settled account between mortgagor and mortgagee in possession, in relation to the mortgage debt and the amount due on the security, it appears, that all which was then due to the mortgagee, either was, or was then converted into, principal money; after the settlement of the account, £128, 18s. 5d., principal money was due on the mortgage, and nothing was due for interest. The mortgagee, having nothing due to him for interest, nevertheless continued in possession of the estate; and the rents and profits in every year exceeded the annual interest accruing due on the principal sum of £128, 18s. 5d., and on a further sum of £2, 0s. 4d., which at a subsequent period became due to the mortgagee for substantial repairs.

Under these circumstances, the question is, whether the surplus of the rents after satisfying the interest, ought or ought not to be annually applied in reduction of the principal money due on the mortgage; or in [140] other words, whether the account ought to be taken against the mortgagee with annual rests.

With some qualification perhaps, it may be said to be a general rule, not to direct annual rests to be made in the accounts of a mortgagee in possession, when the interest is in arrear at the time when he takes possession; and in the absence of any special reason, I conceive that if a mortgagee is not liable to account with annual rests when he enters into possession, he does not become so liable when the arrear of interest is paid off, or till after the whole of the mortgage debt has been paid off by receipt of the rents, although from the time when the debt is ascertained to be paid off, annual rests will be decreed, though none were ordered previously.

I am not aware of any case, in which, although the mortgagee may have taken possession under circumstances which did not render him liable to account, with annual rests, there was afterwards a settled account, by which it appeared either that no interest was due, or that any interest which was due was satisfied as interest, by being converted into principal, and the mortgagee continued in the receipt of rents of amount more than sufficient to satisfy the interest of such principal. But it appears to me, that such settlement of account ought to be considered as a rest made by the parties themselves; and that the mortgagee continuing in possession after the statement of such an account, and with no interest due to him, must, from that time, be dealt with as a mortgagee who takes possession, without any interest being in arrear.

Declare that from the 25th of March 1797, when the account was settled as in the report mentioned, the annual surplus of the rents after satisfying the in-[141]-terest of the principal, or so much thereof as remained due ought to be applied in reduction of the principal, and for that purpose refer it back to the Master to make annual rests in the account of rents and interest.

Having read the pleadings, I observe, that the account of 1797 is not mentioned, either in the bill or in the answer. There was in the year 1824 a tender of £40 which, upon taking the account as directed by the decree, appears to have been £2, 5s. 7d. less than the amount then actually due; and whether it was or not sufficient, being the principal point in the cause, the Plaintiff has failed in establishing his allegation, upon the mode of taking the account which he appeared to be entitled to upon his bill; the question of costs, under these circumstances, will have to be considered.

[141] HICKS v. KEAT. August 7, 1840.

Pending a suit for the administration of assets, and before the accounts had been taken, the Attorney-General presented a petition for payment out of the assets, of a sum which, under false representations, had been returned to the administrator as overpaid in respect of probate duty, and for the legacy duty payable by the administrator on his share of the residue. The administrator had wasted the assets, and the widow, who was entitled to one-third, had not been paid. Held, that the application was premature, and the petition was dismissed.

Whether the money thus repaid formed a primary charge on the fund, quære.

In an administration suit, the Court provides for the payment of the legacy duty before payment to the legatee.

Henry Gray Keat died intestate, leaving a widow and an only son Ebenezer Keat, who thereupon became entitled to his personal estate. His widow died shortly after, and Ebenezer Keat took out letters of administration to his father, swearing the property to be under £12,000, and paying £300 for probate duty.

[142] Upon the affidavit of Ebenezer Keat, stating that a mistake had been made in the valuation of the intestate's estate, and that the value thereof did not exceed £6000, the Commissioners of Stamps returned him £147, 15s. in respect of overpaid probate duty. Ebenezer Keat wasted the assets, and a suit was instituted against him in this Court by the representatives of the widow, for the administration of the intestate's estate; the usual accounts had been directed to be taken before the Master, a sale of the leasehold property, which was the only remaining estate, had been directed, and a receiver appointed. No report had yet been made by the Master. Ebenezer Keat being called upon by the usual rule issuing out of the Court of Exchequer to render an account of the intestate's estate, rendered one, by which it appeared that the value amounted to £11,000 and upwards, and the duty of 1 per cent. on two-thirds, being the share of Ebenezer Keat, amounted to £77, 8s. 10d.

The Attorney-General presented this petition in the cause praying a declaration that the leaseholds were liable to answer the debt of £225, 3s. 10d., composed of the two above-named sums of £147, 15s. and £77, 8s. 10d., due to Her Majesty; that the same might be paid by the receiver out of the rents and profits, and if not paid out of the rents previous to the sale, then that it might be paid out of the produce of the sale.

Ebenezer Keat had become bankrupt.

Mr. J. Romilly, in support of the petition, contended that the probate and legacy duties were, under the statutes, a primary charge on the assets, and ought to be paid in priority to all other claims.

[143] Mr. Pemberton, contra, contended, as to the probate duty, that even if it were lien on the property, which he did not admit, still having been once actually paid, the assets had been released; and that the Commissioners had no right, under the statutes, to revert to the assets belonging to others, for payment of money, which the administrator, by false representations, had obtained from the Commissioners.

As to the legacy duty on the son's share, that it formed no lien, and that the Commissioners had no right to throw the burthen of the son's legacy duty on the mother's share of the residue.

That the present application was unwarranted by the practice of the Court, and altogether premature.

Mr. J. Romilly, in reply.

The 36 G. 3, c. 52, and the 55 G. 3, c. 184, were referred to.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. It appears that the probate duty having been properly paid, the Commissioners, on the representations of the Defendant, returned him £147, 15s. Upon that proceeding it would appear, that the Commissioners of Stamps and the Crown were defrauded; and the question made in that respect is this, what is the situation of the Crown as against the estate? what is the demand of the Crown? and how is it to be enforced? There was a bond fide debt due to the amount stated, which was bond fide paid; a part of it was repaid upon a false statement, and the question is, what are the rights of the Crown in respect of the sum so repaid? It is argued by the Petitioners, that the debt is remitted to [144] the very same situation in which it originally stood; and that the Crown has the same rights against the estate, as it would have had, if the sum of £300 had never been paid. On the other side it is said, that the £300 was actually paid; and if the Commissioners, having ample means of satisfaction, allowed themselves to be deluded in this manner, the Crown has not, to the prejudice of those entitled to the estate, the same remedy which it originally had.

The Act of Parliament is wholly silent upon this subject; yet this petition is presented during the administration of the estate, in an early stage of the cause, unsupported by any statement in the Master's report, desiring that this claim of the Crown may be satisfied out of the assets; I cannot help thinking that this is premature. I do not know how I am to arrive at a satisfactory conclusion upon the important point which has been raised; and I doubt whether I ought to take upon me to decide it without the assistance of another tribunal; at all events, it is not necessary to be decided in this stage of the cause.

The other part of the case is different. Legacy duty, or residue duty, is payable out of the shares which belong to the son and the widow; the usual mode is to pay the legacy duty at the time when the legacy is paid or retained; and I do not find any statement here that there has been any appropriation of the different parts of the residue, or that the son, who was entitled to two-thirds, ever did appropriate any part to himself, or retain any portion in satisfaction of his two-thirds; if he had done so, his share of the duty would be payable. It does not appear that the widow has received anything, and nothing has been retained for [145] her; the time, therefore, has not arrived for the payment of her share of the legacy duty.

In the administration of property in a cause like this, care is always taken that the amount of the legacy duty shall be paid before the party receives anything by the order of the Court (36 G. 3, c. 52, s. 25). Then why is there to be a petition in this stage of the cause desiring the payment of the duty upon the share of the residue said to be retained?

It is said there is a portion of the estate existing in specie—that the son retained his share of the residue, and that therefore the duty on this ought to be paid out of what remains; in what character he retained that share of the residue we do not know; but it appears that the portion of the estate now existing in specie is in a due course of administration. I think this application is premature: whatever may be ultimately ascertained to be his share of the residue will no doubt be secured for the payment of the legacy duty. This Court would make no order for a party to receive any share of the legacy till the duty has been secured; and I do not understand, why the Court is to interpose at this early stage of the cause to order this payment out of the specific portion of the assets, when it has not been ascertained that it has been retained in satisfaction of this party's share. I do not give my opinion upon the real question, this is not the time for it; and I even doubt whether the first question can be properly decided in this Court. I make no order: and the petition must be dismissed.

[8 C. 9 L. J. Ch. (N. S.), 352; 4 Jur. 958. See Fish v. Attorney-General, 1867, L. R. 4 Eq. 524; see also cases collected in Mews' Digest, vol. xv. p. 1342.]

A testator bequeathed to his daughter A., the wife of B., a legacy of £10,000, payable six months after his decease; and he recommended his daughter and her husband to settle it, together with such sum of money of the husband as he should choose, for the benefit of A. and her children. Held, a trust for the children, and that the legacy did not lapse by the death of A. in the lifetime of the testator.

In this case the testator William Fowler, after bequeathing to his daughter Elizabeth W. Fowler £10,000, to be paid to her in six months next after his decease, and to his son John W. Fowler, the sum of £10,000 to be paid to him in like manner, expressed himself as follows: "I also give and bequeath to my daughter Sarah Matilda, the wife of William Ford, &c., the sum of £10,000 to be paid to her in like manner; and I recommend to my said daughter and her said husband, that they do forthwith settle and assure the said sum of £10,000, together also with such sum of money of his own as the said William Ford shall choose, for the benefit of my said daughter Sarah Matilda, and her children.

The daughter Sarah Matilda died in the lifetime of the testator.

This bill was filed by the infant children of Sarah Matilda Ford, by the father, and next friend against the executors and the residuary legatees, for payment of the legacy of £10,000.

The infant Plaintiffs contended, that the words of recommendation created a trust for them.

The residuary legatees insisted, that no trust had been created, and that the legacy had lapsed by the death of the testator's daughter in his lifetime.

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Osborne, for the Plaintiffs.

Mr. Pemberton, in reply.

August 7. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. I am of opinion that a trust was created. The word "recommend" as here employed is imperative, according to the authority of several cases; the subject of the recommendation, the disposition of which the testator had power to command, was the certain definite sum of £10,000, and the objects of the recommendation were the children of the daughter. I am of opinion, that the husband could not have claimed the legacy in right of his wife, and that the wife could not have claimed it for her own use. A settlement upon the wife and children was intended by the testator to be made by the husband and wife. The wife being dead, the settlement cannot be made; and I am of opinion, that the children are entitled equally. It was argued that the subject was uncertain, because the testator recommended, that besides the £10,000 of his own, something of the husband's to be settled also; but there being certainty as to that which was in the testator's power, the trust as to this does not fail, because the testator expressed a wish as to something over which he had no power. His wish or recommendation that the husband should settle something of his own is perfectly consistent with his wish or recommendation that the whole of the £10,000 should be settled, whether the husband settled anything or not.

[148] KNIGHT v. KNIGHT. Dec. 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, 1839; August 7, 1840.

[S. C. 9 L. J. Ch. (N. S.), 354; 4 Jur. 839; and in House of Lords (sub nom. Knight v. Boughton), 11 Cl. & F. 513; 8 E. R. 1195; 8 Jur. 923. See Holmesdale v. West, 1866, L. Principles of construction, in cases of precatory words in wills, and the requisites to enable the Court to construe them as imperative.

Where property is given absolutely to one, who is by the donor recommended, intreated, or wished, to dispose of it in favour of another, the words create a trust, if they are such as ought to be construed imperative, and the subject and objects are certain: thus, if a testator gives £1000 to A. B., desiring, wishing, recommending, or hoping that A. B. will, at his death, give the same sum or any certain part to C. D., a trust is created in favour of C. D.

Bequest to A. B. of a residue, with a recommendation to him after his death to give it to his own relations, or such of his own relations as he shall think most deserving, or as he shall choose, has been considered sufficiently certain both as to subject and object, as to create a trust.

Where it is to be collected that the donor did not intend the words to be imperative, or if the first taker was to have a discretionary power of withdrawing any part of the subject from the object of the wish, or if the objects, or the interests they are to take, are not ascertained with sufficient certainty, no trust is created.

A testator, R. P. K., was entitled to real estates in tail male, with remainder to his cousins in tail, with remainder to himself in fee as right heir of the settlor, as to part under a settlement, made by his grandfather, and as to other part under the will of his same grandfather. R. P. K. suffered a recovery and acquired the fee-simple. He afterwards made his will, by which he devised all his estates, real and personal, to his brother T. A. K., if living at his decease, and if not to T. A. K.'s son, T. A. K. the younger, and in case he should die before the testator, to his eldest son or next descendant in the direct male line; and in case he should leave no such descendant, to the next male issue of his said brother, and his next descendant in the direct male line; but in case that no such issue or descendant of his said brother or nephew should be living at the time of his, the testator's decease, to the next descendant in the direct male line of his said grandfather, according to the purport of his will under which the testator inherited those estates which his industry had acquired, &c. He constituted the person who should inherit his said estates his sole executor and trustee, to carry the same and everything therein duly into execution, "confiding in the approved honour and integrity of his family to take no advantage of any technical inaccuracies, but to admit all the comparatively small reservations which he made out of so large a property according to the plain and obvious meaning of his words:" he then gave some small legacies, and proceeded thus: "I trust to the liberality of my successors to reward any others of my old servants and tenants according to their deserts, and to their justice in continuing the estates in the male succession, according to the will of the founder of the family, my above-named grandfather." T. A. K. survived the testator. Held, that the words were not sufficiently imperative, and that the subject intended to be affected, and the interests to be enjoyed by the objects, were not sufficiently defined to create a trust in favour of the male line, and that T. A. K. took the property unfettered by any trust in favour of such male line.

Richard Knight being entitled to the manors of Leintwardine and Downton, executed an indenture of settlement, dated the 26th of April 1729, and made between himself and Elizabeth his wife of the [149] first part; his four sons, Richard Knight the younger, Thomas Knight, Edward Knight, and Ralph Knight, of the second part; and William Bradley and Joseph Cox of the third part: and it was thereby witnessed that the said Richard Knight, for the love and affection which he bore to his said wife and sons, and for settling an annuity by way of jointure upon his wife in lieu of dower, and "for settling and assuring the hereditaments therein-after mentioned, to continue in the name and blood of the said Richard Knight the elder, so long as it should please Almighty God," &c.; and to the end that the hereditaments might be settled and established to and for the uses, intents, and purposes, and upon and under the powers, provisoes, limitations, and agreements after expressed, he, the said R. Knight, conveyed the manors of Leintwardine and Downton, and the hereditaments therein described, to trustees, to the use of himself for life; and after his decease, to the use, intent, and purpose, that his wife might receive the annuity therein mentioned, with powers of distress and entry, and subject to the annuity, and the remedies for the recovery thereof, to the use of Richard Knight the younger and his assigns for life; with remainder to the use of the trustees, to preserve contingent remainders; with remainder to the use of the first, second, third, fourth, fifth, sixth, and all and every other sons of the body of the said Richard Knight the younger, on the body of his then wife to be begotten, and the heirs male of such sons; with remainder to the use of the sons of the body of the said Richard Knight the younger, begotten on the body of any other wife in tail male; with remainder to the use of his son Thomas for life; with remainder to the sons of Thomas successively in tail male; with remainder to the use of his son Edward and his assigns for his life; with remainder to the sons of Edward successively in tail male; with [150] remainder to the use of his son Ralph and his assigns for life; with remainder to the sons of Ralph successively in tail male; with remainder to the use of the right heirs of Richard Knight, the settlor himself; the deed contained powers of jointuring and leasing.

Richard Knight, by his will dated the 27th day of October 1744, devised his real estates to trustees, to the uses, trusts, intents, and with and upon and under the same powers, provisoes, limitations, and agreements as he had theretofore settled, conveyed, and assured the manor of Leintwardine; and he directed the residue of his personal estate to be laid out in the purchase of lands, to be settled to the same uses.

The testator died on the 6th of February 1745, leaving his four sons surviving him. Richard, the eldest son, died in 1765, without leaving any issue male. Thomas, the second son, who died in 1764, was the father of the testator Richard Payne Knight and of Thomas Andrew Knight. Edward, the third son, who died in 1780, was the grandfather of the Plaintiff John Knight, and of the Defendant Thomas Knight. Ralph, the fourth son, died in 1754, leaving two sons, both of whom died long ago without issue male. (See the pedigree in the next page.)

The eldest son, Richard Knight, enjoyed the estates until his death in 1765, and was succeeded by his nephew Richard Payne Knight, who held the estates until his death in 1824.

Richard Payne Knight being tenant in tail of the estates, suffered common recoveries thereof, and having thereby barred the entail, became the owner thereof in fee.

[151] On the 3d of June 1814 he made his will. At that time, his nearest relation, and the next male descendant from Richard Knight his grandfather, was his brother Thomas Andrew Knight, who had an only son, Thomas Andrew Knight, the younger; after his brother and nephew, the next male descendants from Richard

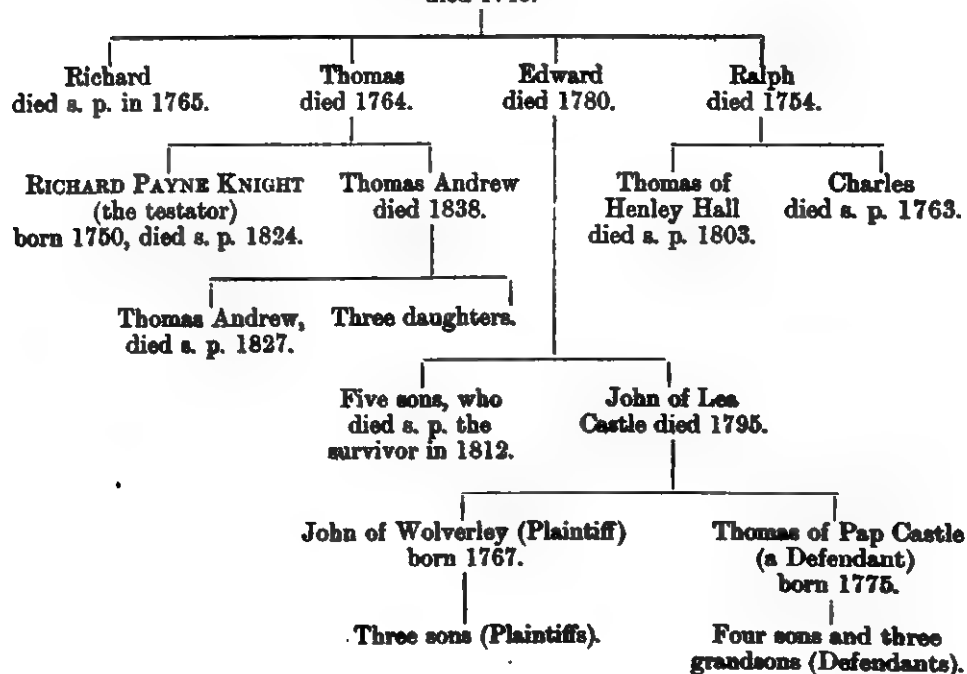

Knight the grandfather, were the Plaintiff John Knight and his sons, and the Defendant Thomas Knight and his sons.(1)

The will was expressed as follows:—"I give and bequeath all my estates, real and personal (except such parts as are hereinafter excepted), to my brother Thomas Andrew Knight, should he be living at the time of my decease; and if not, to his son Thomas Andrew Knight the younger; and in case that he should die before me, to his eldest son or next descendant in the direct male line; and in case that he should leave no such descend-[152]-ant in the direct male line, to the next male issue of my said brother, and his next descendant in the direct male line; but in case that no such issue or descendant of my said brother or nephew shall be living at the time of my decease, to the next descendant in the direct male line of my late grandfather, Richard Knight of Downton, according to the purport of his will, under which I have inherited those estates which his industry and abilities had acquired, and of which he had therefore the best right to dispose; subject, nevertheless, and liable in every case to the following reservations and deductions out of the rents and profits thereof, which I give and bequeath to the purposes and in the manner following, viz.: in the first place, I give and bequeath the sum of £300, to be distributed, within one month after my decease, among the poor of the several parishes of Downton, Barrington, Aston, Elton, Leinthall, Starke, and the northern division of Leintwardine, all in the county of Hereford, in such portions to each individual pauper or poor family as my executor, or such person as he shall appoint for that purpose, shall think equitable and expedient, on condition that no diminution of the parish allowance to any person receiving the same shall be made in consequence thereof."

"And I do hereby constitute and appoint the person who shall inherit my said estates under this my will my sole executor and TRUSTEE, to carry the same and every thing contained therein duly into execution; confiding in the approved honour and integrity of my family, to take no advantage of any technical inaccuracies, but to admit all the comparatively small reservations which I make out of so large a property, according to the plain and obvious meaning of my words; accordingly I give and bequeath in the second place, out of the said reserved rents and profits, the weekly sum of 25s. of good and lawful money of Great Britain to my faithful old servant Ann Payne, [153] to be paid into her hands every seventh day, commencing from the day of my decease, so long as she shall live. And I also give and bequeath the sum of £3 weekly out of the said reserved rents and profits, to be paid in the same manner into the hands of Caroline Elizabeth Gregory, commonly called Ford, of No. 44 Wells Street, Oxford Road, London, as a reward for the affectionate kindness and sincerity with which she has always behaved towards me."

"And I moreover give and bequeath all coins and medals, and all wrought and sculptured articles in every kind of metal, ivory, and gems or precious stones, together with all descriptive catalogues of the same, and all drawings, and books of drawings of every kind, which shall be found in the gallery or western room of my house in Soho Square, to the British Museum, on condition that, within one year after my decease, the next descendant in the direct male line then living of my above-named grandfather be made an hereditary trustee, with all the privileges of the family trustees, to be continued in perpetual succession to his next descendants in the direct male line, so long as any shall exist (see 5 G. 4, c. 60); and in case of their failure, to the next in the female line; and also on condition that all duties and other expenses attending the taking possession of and removing the said articles be paid out of the funds of the said Museum. I had, in a will which I hereby revoke, bequeathed these articles to the Royal Academy; and it is not out of any change of sentiment or disrespect towards that body that I now alter that bequest, but because I think that, under the regulations now adopted in the Museum, they will be of more service to the academicians and students, as well as to the public at large, if added to those of my late respected friends Townley and Cratchrode, so as to [154] make one great collection, such as no other nation can boast, and afford a more complete comparative view of the rise and progress of imitative art than is anywhere else to be obtained. I trust to the liberality of my successors, to reward any others of my old servants and tenants according to their deserts, and to their justice, in continuing the estates in the male succession, according to the will of the founder of the family, my above-named grandfather, Richard Knight."

Richard Payne Knight died the 29th of April 1824, and his brother Thomas A. Knight proved his will.

The state of the family was not altered during the time which elapsed between the date of this will and the death of Richard Payne Knight.

Thomas Andrew Knight took possession of the estates, and certain indentures, dated the 27th and 28th days of December 1825, and made between Thomas Andrew Knight of the first part, Thomas Andrew Knight the younger of the second part, and Thomas Pendarves Stackhouse of the third part, were executed: whereby after reciting that it was apprehended that Thomas Andrew Knight was not made subject to or bound by any trust of the will of R. P. Knight; or if bound by a trust, that he might exercise or perform the same trust, by settling the devised real estate on Thomas Andrew Knight the younger, his only son in tail male, and by settling the personal estate on him and the heirs male of his body, subject nevertheless to an estate for the life of himself therein; and that T. A. Knight, with the consent and approbation of his said son, had determined to settle the said real and personal estate accordingly; it was witnessed that he conveyed the said real estates to a trustee and his heirs, to the use of Thomas Andrew Knight for life, [155] without impeachment of waste; with remainder to the use of Thomas Andrew Knight the younger, and the heirs male of his body lawfully issuing; with remainder to the use of Thomas Andrew Knight in fee, subject nevertheless to the trusts, if any, created by the will of the said R. P. Knight, and which were not thereby performed and duly executed. By the same deeds the personal estate was limited to a trustee, in trust to permit Thomas Andrew Knight to use the same during his life; and after his death, in trust for Thomas Andrew Knight the younger and the heirs of his body.

In Trinity term 1826, a common recovery was suffered of such of the real estates as were situate in the county of Hereford, and Thomas Andrew Knight and his son Thomas Andrew Knight the younger were vouched therein, and the uses thereof were declared to be in favour of Thomas Andrew Knight in fee.

On the 30th of November 1827 Thomas Andrew Knight the younger died intestate and without issue, and his father Thomas Andrew Knight became his legal personal representative. The trustee of the deeds of December 1825 afterwards died, and the Defendant, Edward W. W. Pendarves, was his legal personal representative.

Thomas Andrew Knight the elder afterwards executed certain indentures, dated the 24th and 25th of April 1835, the release being made between Thomas Andrew Knight of the one part and Sir William Edward Rouse Boughton of the other part; and after reciting that doubts were entertained whether Thomas Andrew Knight was not tenant in tail at law or in equity of the lands therein mentioned, being lands devised by the will of the said Richard P. Knight, and that he was desirous and had [156] determined to bar the same estate tail, if any, and enlarge his estate and interest therein to a fee-simple, it was witnessed that, in pursuance of the said determination and of the statute of the 3 & 4 W. 4, c. 74, Thomas Andrew Knight conveyed the lands in Middlesex, Salop, and Gloucester, discharged of all estates in tail and interests of the nature of estates tail, to Sir William Edward Rouse Boughton and his heirs, to the use of Thomas Andrew Knight in fee. The memorial of this deed was duly enrolled.

On the 5th of February 1838 Thomas A. Knight the elder made his will; and thereby, after bequeathing certain legacies, he stated that in the lifetime of his son they had fully considered and arranged as to the settlement and future disposition of the real and personal estate of which his late brother R. P. Knight had died seized and possessed, over which they had a disposing power, and accordingly had executed the deeds of the 27th and 28th of December 1825; and that it was the avowed and fixed determination of his said deceased son, expressed to him in conferences and consultations between them on the subject of their family interests and affairs, that if it had pleased God that his said son should survive him and become possessed of the said real estate, and have no issue, he, the said son, would, in that event, settle or otherwise devise or bequeath the property of the said R. P. Knight unto or amongst or for the benefit of his three sisters Frances Acton, Elizabeth Walpole, and Charlotte Lady Boughton, or their issues, &c., in such manner as he should, under existing circumstances, for the time being and from time to time think most fitting and expedient; his said son considering that it would be, on his part, an act contrary to every principle of natural and moral justice, if, in the events of his surviving him and leaving no issue, whereby the power [157] of disposing of the said real estate would reside and rest solely in himself, he should pass by and disinherit those so nearly connected in blood with him as his sisters and their issue and descendants, in order to prefer and benefit remote relations' descendants in the male line of his great grandfather Richard Knight; and that therefore, as under the calamitous and heavily afflicting event which had happened in the death of his son the power and right of disposing of the real estate of his brother, as well freeholds in fee and for lives, as copyholds, and also his personal estate, had devolved on him, he thereby, in accordance with the wishes and intentions of his son, &c., and in the events before mentioned, and also according to his own sense of justice, and wish and desire in all things, made his said will, and thereby devised and bequeathed all his real estates, comprising as well those which were his late brother's as his own (with certain exceptions), to Sir W. E. R. Boughton and Charlotte his wife, and such son as therein mentioned of the said Sir W. E. R. Boughton and Charlotte his wife. And in case it should thereafter be decided that he had not the power of disposing of the estates and property which belonged to his late brother, but which upon the assumption and full conviction that they did belong to him, and that he had such power, he had included in the aforesaid general devise, then he devised his own estate in the manner therein mentioned. He then stated his will to be, that the costs, &c., of the said Sir W. E. R. Boughton, and every other party interested in his will, in establishing his right to the estates of his late brother, and of any appeal to the House of Lords, should, in case the decision should be pronounced against his claim, and such costs should not be decreed to be paid out of such estate of his said late brother, be charged upon and payable out of his own copyhold and leasehold estates.

[158] And the same testator, after giving various other directions by his will, further provided, that if by the judgment it should be ultimately decided that he had not the right and power of disposing of the said real and personal estates of his said brother, &c., as he had done by that his will, then, and in such case only, and if under any devise and bequest, limitation, or power in his said brother's will contained, he was, in consequence of failure of his own issue male, authorized and empowered to direct the order of succession, and appoint the real and personal estate, &c., to such one or more of the male descendants of his grandfather, Richard Knight, as he should think most proper, he thereby in exercise of his best judgment and discretion, and in order to continue and preserve the real estate in the male line of the family descended from Richard Knight, by limiting and appointing the same in manner mentioned to the persons in succession, whom he considered the most likely to keep and preserve the same in the family, but subject to the previous devises and bequests, gave and devised the real estates which were the property of his late brother to his cousin the Defendant, Thomas Knight of Pap Castle, for life, and after his death to John Knight, his second son, and the heirs male of his body lawfully issuing, with other remainders over.

Thomas A. Knight the elder died in May 1838.

Previously, however, to this event, John Knight, who was the male heir of Richard Knight of Downton who died in 1745 (see pedigree, 3 Beav. 151 (n)), together with his three sons, filed this bill in May 1836, against Thomas Andrew Knight the elder and others; praying a declaration that according to the true construction of the will of Richard Payne [159] Knight deceased, all the real and all the residue of the personal estates of Richard Payne Knight ought to be conveyed and assigned in such manner as best to secure the enjoyment thereof to the male descendants of Richard Knight the grandfather, as long as the rules of law and equity would permit; and that the same ought to be so limited that Thomas Andrew Knight should have a life-estate therein, with such remainder to his issue male and to the Plaintiffs as might best answer the purposes aforesaid, and for accounts, &c.

Subsequently to the date of his will, Thomas Andrew Knight the elder put in his answer to the original bill in this cause, and thereby claimed under the will of Richard Payne Knight, with or without the aid of the further title derived under the indentures of the 27th and 28th of December 1825, and the indenture of the 23d day of March 1826, and the recovery suffered, and the said indentures of the 24th and 25th of April 1835, to be absolutely entitled to the whole of the real estates of the testator, Richard Payne Knight, in fee-simple and under the said will, or as next of kin of Thomas A. Knight the younger deceased, to be absolutely entitled to the leasehold and personal estate of the said testator.

Thomas Andrew Knight, as before stated, died on the 11th of May 1838, without having revoked or altered his will; and the necessary parties having been brought before the Court by a bill of revivor and supplement, and the preliminary enquiries having been made by the Master, the causes now came on for hearing.

The question in the cause was, whether the precatory words in the will of Richard P. Knight were imperative on Thomas A. Knight.

[160] Mr. Pemberton, Mr. G. Turner, Mr. J. Humphry, and Mr. Menteth, for the Plaintiffs. The dispositions contained in the will of the testator, Richard Payne Knight, imposed an imperative trust on his brother, Thomas Andrew Knight, to settle the property in the direct male line of the testator's grandfather, Richard Knight.

It has been now firmly established by a long series of decisions, "that whenever a person gives property, and points out the object, the property, and the way in which it shall go, that creates a trust; unless he shews clearly, that his desire expressed is to be controlled by the party, and that he shall have an option to defeat it." "If a testator shews a desire that a thing shall be done, unless there are plain express words or necessary implication, that he does not mean to take away the discretion, but intends to leave it to be defeated, the party shall be considered as acting under a trust;" Malim v. Keighley (2 Ves. jun. 335). To create by precatory words such a trust as the Court will carry into execution, there are three requisites; first, the precatory words must be sufficiently clear; secondly, there must be a certainty as to subject of the gift; and, thirdly, the objects to take must be certain; Wright v. Atkyns (Turner & Russ. 157), Cary v. Cary (2 Sch. & Lef. 189), Cruyck v. Colman (9 Ves. 322), Morice v. The Bishop of Durham (10 Ves. 535), Paul v. Compton (8 Ves. 380).

As to the first requisite, no particular form of words is necessary; it is sufficient for a testator "to express a desire as to the disposition of the property, and the desire so expressed amounts to a command; Cary v. Cary. Thus "request," Eade v. Eade (5 Mad. 118); "desire," [161] Harding v. Glyn (1 Atk. 469); "my particular wish and request," Foley v. Parry (5 Sim. 138, and 2 Myl. & K. 138); "my last wish," Hinaman v. Poynder (5 Sim. 546); "recommend," Tibbitts v. Tibbitts (19 Ves. 656); Horswood v. West (1 Sim. & St. 387); Malim v. Keighley (2 Ves. jun. 333); "entreat," Prevost v. Clarke (2 Mad. 458, n.); "my dying request," Pierson v. Garnet (2 Bro. C. C. 38, and 226, and Pr. in Ch. 200, n.); "not doubting," Parsons v. Baker (18 Ves. 476); "trusting and wholly confiding," Wood v. Cox (1 Keen, 317, and 2 Myl. & Cr. 684); in short, "any words of recommendation and desire in a will are always expounded a devise," Eales v. England (Pr. Ch. 200). They also cited on this point The Duchess of Buckingham's case (2 Ves. jun. 580), and 1 Jarm. Pow. Devises, 355.

By the civil law, from which most probably the principle was adopted by Courts of Equity, "words of request or confidence rogo, volo, mando, injungo, desidero, deprecor, fidei tue committo, acio te hereditatem meam restituerum," &c. are those by which a fidei commissum is created; but effect is given to a fidei commissum, if it can be collected from any expressions in the instrument that it was the grantor or testator's intention to create it" (2 Burges Comm. 106): and like a declaration of a use in equity, where there has been a transmutation of possession, "any expression whereby the mind of the party may be known that such a one shall have the land is sufficient;" Jones v. Morley (12 Mod. 159).

Secondly, the subject of the gift is sufficiently certain, being the estates and personal property devised and bequeathed by the will.

[162] Thirdly, the persons to take are sufficiently defined being persons in the male line in succession; a description much more perfect than the expressions "family," "relations," which have been held sufficiently certain to be carried into execution; Harding v. Glyn (1 Atk. 470), Cruwys v. Colman (9 Ves. 322).

Applying these principles to the present case, the Court finds the testator "TRUSTS to the justice of his successors in continuing the estates in the male succession, according to the will of the founder of the family, his above-named grandfather Richard Knight;" and he "appoints the person who shall inherit his estates his sole executor and TRUSTEE, to carry the same and everything contained therein duly into execution, confiding in the approved honour and integrity of his family to take no advantage of technical inaccuracies." These words of trust and confidence are much stronger than many which have occurred, besides which, the person inheriting was also distinctly appointed a trustee to carry the will into execution. The clause respecting the hereditary trustees of the British Museum and the first gift over, in case of there being no issue of Thomas A. Knight and his son living at the testator's death, shew how anxious the testator was to keep up the distinction of the direct male line of his grandfather.

If, then, this be a trust binding on Thomas Andrew Knight, he was bound to carry it into effect by a settlement of the property, so as to run so far as was possible in the male order of succession. This was a trust to be executed by him; and the distinction between trusts executed and executory has always been recognised and admitted; Mortimer v. West (2 Sim. 282), Jervoise v. The Duke of Northumberland (1 Jac. & W. 570), 1 Preston Abet. 135. The estate ought, therefore, to have been settled so as to give successive life-estates to the parties in esse; Leonard v. The Earl of Suffolk (2 Vern. 526), Papillon v. Voise (2 P. Williams, 470), White v. Carter (Amb. 670), Humberston v. Humberston (1 P. Williams, 332), Hopkins v. Hopkins (1 Atk. 593). In Lord Dorchester v. The Earl of Effingham (G. Coop. 312, and post, p. 180, n.; and see 2 Pow. Devises, 443), a testator, having a power of revocation and new appointment, directed "his estates to be attached to his title as closely as possible," it was held that the effect of his will was to abridge the estates of all persons in esse, in the line of the title, from estates tail to estates for life. In Woolmore v. Burrows (1 Sim. 512), lands were to be purchased and closely entailed to the family estate; and it was decided that every person in esse at the testator's death must have life-estates, and no more.

The difficulty of making a settlement so as to meet every event will probably be relied on by the other side; but the Court has frequently, as in several of the cases already referred to, overcome that objection. The same argument was used in Pierson v. Garnet (2 Bro. C. C. 38); but there it was met by the Court in these terms: the difficulty and impracticability of carrying the trust into execution has been pressed : "That argument has no weight with me ; because if an express trust had been raised, it must have been executed, though it would have been attended with all the same difficulties and impracticabilities stated in this case. However arduous the trust was, the Court must have carried it into execution."

[164] Mr. Spence, Mr. Coots, and Mr. Phillips, for the Defendant Thomas Knight of Pap Castle and his children, concurred in the argument of the Plaintiffs, that the precatory words used by the testator Richard Payne Knight were imperative upon Thomas Andrew Knight ; but they contended that he had, by implication, a power of selection amongst the male descendants of the founder of the family ; and that it had been duly executed by the will of Thomas Andrew Knight in favour of John Knight and his family ; Brown v. Higgs (4 Vea. 708). That the only object of the testator R. P. Knight was to continue the property in the male line, to the exclusion of females ; and there were many events which might happen, as the bankruptcy, insolvency or insanity of the elder male branches, which would render such a power of selection in T. A. Knight absolutely necessary to carry out the intention of the testator of continuing the estates in the family.

THE ATTORNEY-GENERAL [Campbell], Mr. Tinney, Mr. Wilbraham, and Mr. Hodgson, for the widow of the testator and for Mrs. Acton, his daughter, and Pendarves, a trustee ;

Mr. Kindersley and Mr. K. Parker, for Sir W. Boughton and children ; and

Mr. Richards and Mr. Torriano, for Mrs. Walpole, who claimed under the will of Thomas Andrew Knight, contra, argued to the effect following. The testator, Thomas Andrew Knight, became absolutely entitled to the real and personal estate of his brother Richard Payne Knight, under the will of the latter, unfettered with any trust ; or, supposing him to have taken an estate tail under the will, yet by means of [165] the recoveries it became afterwards converted in a fee-simple absolute.

The principle of holding precatory words to be imperative has been frequently disapproved of, and the current of modern authority is strongly against it. Lord Chief Baron Richards, speaking of the former decisions on the subject, thus expressed himself (10 Price, 265), "I hope to be forgiven if I entertain a strong doubt whether, in many, or perhaps in most of the cases, the construction was not adverse to the real intention of the testator.

"It seems to me very singular, that a person who really meant to impose the obligation established by the cases, should use a course so circuitous, and a language so inappropriate and also obscure, to express what might have been conveyed in the clearest and most usual terms—terms the most familiar to the testator himself, and to the professional or any other person who might prepare his will. In considering these cases, it has always occurred to me, that if I had myself made such a will as has generally been considered imperative, I should have never intended it to be imperative ; but, on the contrary, a mere intimation of my wish that the person to whom I had given my property should, if he pleased, prefer these whom I postponed to him, and who, next to him, were at the time the principal objects of my regard.

"I am happy to be enabled to state, that in this opinion I have the concurrence of a noble Judge, than whom there has never been, and, I believe, never can be, a person more active and acute in investigating the principles of the law in all its bearings, or more extensively learned on every legal subject."

[166] "In Wright v. Atkyns (1 Vea. & B. 315), Lord Eldon says, 'This sort of trust is generally a surprise on the intention, but it is too late to correct that.' Again, he says, 'We know the question was, what the word family meant? I do not believe that the testator intended a mere trust, but that must be the construction, if the word "family" is properly construed.' I have said so much as a justification, or rather the foundation, of the opinion which I entertain, that, though I hold myself bound by the decisions, and obliged to follow them, I do not consider it to be my duty to extend the rule of construction which has been adopted in them, and to add to the number of those where the Court appears to me rather to have made than to have given effect to the wills of testators."

In the same case Lord Redesdale said, that "all cases of this description were to be considered with very considerable strictness, as it was a very inconvenient mode of disposition : " Meredith v. Heneage (1 Sim. 566). And Sir Anthony Hart observes, as to this equity, that "The first case that construed words of recommendation into a command, made a will for the testator; for every one knows the distinction between them. The current of decisions has, of late years, been against converting the legatee into a trustee:" Sale v. Moore (1 Sim. 540), and see Lawless v. Shaw (1 Lloyd & Goold, 154, and 165, n.; 5 Cl. & Fin. 129; 1 Drury & W. 512).

The words used by the testator are not, and were not, intended to be, imperative upon his successors. There are three instances in which he expresses his confidence; first, he "confides in the approved honour and integrity of his family to take no advantage of tech-[167]-nical inaccuracies, but to admit all the small reservations out of the property; secondly, he trusts to the liberality of his successors to reward old tenants and servants; and, thirdly, he trusts to their justice in continuing the estates in the male succession." In neither of these cases was it the intention of the testator to bind his family, and in every of them he would have deprecated the interference of this Court. If his wishes had been consulted, they undoubtedly would have been to have continued the estate in the family for ever. He was aware that this could not be effected by any legal means; he knew that he could not effectually settle his estate so as to be unalienable, further than the minority of the first tenant in tail; and he therefore considered the best mode to accomplish his wishes was to trust to the honour of his successors, and to impose on them what is termed "an imperfect obligation," which was to be binding morally only.

His intention, so far as can be collected, was to create a perpetuity, which the law will not allow, and which the Court cannot carry into execution; but taking it to be his wish to settle the estates "according to the will of the founder of the family," then the will of 1744 must be the scheme and model for effecting it. Under that will, Thomas Andrew Knight the elder would have been tenant in tail, and that estate has been barred, and converted into a fee-simple absolute. Again, at the date of the will of 1744, Richard Knight appears to have had seven grandchildren living, who were the children of his son Edward, yet he did not attempt to limit life-estates to the two generations, but gave estates tail to the children of Edward. If then this will is to be taken as a model, the settlement to be made would be very different from that asked by the Plaintiffs, namely, to limit successive life-estates to all the persons in esse; [168] or, as is stated in the prayer of the bill, to convey estates "in such manner as best to secure the enjoyment thereof to the male descendants of Richard Knight the grandfather of the testator, so long as the rules of law and equity will permit;" but would have been to Thomas A. Knight for life, with remainder to T. A. Knight the younger in tail.

This case has none of the requisites for enabling the Court to say, that the property is fixed with a positive trust in favour of the Plaintiffs.

First, the words are not sufficiently strong to be construed imperative. The testator trusts to their justice, a word clearly importing no legal obligation.

In Harland v. Trigg (1 Bro. C. C. 142) there was a gift to his brother of leaseholds, hoping he would continue them in the family, and it was held that no trust had been created. Cunliffe v. Cunliffe (Ambler, 686) was a devise to his son, recommending him if he died without issue to give and devise it to his brother the Plaintiff, and it was held that no trust had been created. In Bland v. Bland (2 Cox, 351), the testator earnestly requested the party by will to settle, and there no trust was created. In Sale v. Moore (1 Sim. 534), there was a gift to wife of a residue, recommending to her, and not doubting she would consider his near relatives, and there the decision was against there being any trust. In Curtis v. Rippon (5 Mad. 434), the testator trusted that the devisee would make such use of it as should be for her own and her children's spiritual and temporal good; remembering always, according to circumstances, the Church of God and the poor; and in Lechmere v. Lavis (2 Myl. & K. 197) where the [169] words were "of course they will leave what they have," &c.; and Ex parte Payne (2 Younge & C. 636), where the expressions were "I strongly recommend her to execute a settlement;" and Meredith v. Heneage (10 Price, 306, and 1 Sim. 542), it was successively held that no trust had been created.

The second requisite, namely, certainty in the subject, is also wanting; the property to be subject to the supposed trust is in the greatest degree of uncertainty. From the word "continue," one would suppose that those estates which passed by the will of Richard Knight the founder were alone to be included; as to which, however, it seems strange that Richard Payne Knight should himself have defeated the will of his grandfather, by suffering recovery of those estates. There are, however, five distinct properties which may be the subject of the supposed trust: first, the realty settled by the deed of 1729; secondly, the realty afterwards acquired by Richard Knight, and devised by his will; thirdly, the personal estate of Richard Knight; fourthly, the real estates acquired by Richard Payne Knight; and fifthly, his personal estate. It is impossible to say, whether all or any, and which, of these different descriptions of property are to be included in the supposed trust. Again, it is clear, that the successors are to have the right of rewarding the old servants and tenants out of the property; and this, then, will have the effect of rendering the residue uncertain, and of making the trust void. Wynne v. Hawkins (1 Bro. C. C. 179); Eale v. Eade (5 Madd. 118).

Thirdly, the persons to take; the extent of their interest, and the estates they are severally to enjoy is in no way defined. How is this Court to carry such a trust into execution? What provision is to be made for jointures, [170] portions, leasing-powers, &c. ? When are the daughters to be let in to take in default of male issue? It is impossible to carry anything so vague and uncertain into execution; and to effectuate the wish fully, a perpetuity must be created, which is contrary to law.

The wish is addressed to all successors in the most remote line; why is it to bind the first taker only?

The distinction between trusts executed and trust executory has always been admitted, but here the testator had no reference to any settlement to be executed, there is no conveyance to execute. It is true, that where a deed is to be executed, the Court will mould the limitation, so as to effectuate the general intention, "but if a party will be his own conveyancer and create the estate, the Court has no jurisdiction to alter it." The Countess of Lincoln v. The Duke of Newcastle (12 Ves. 238), Douglas v. Congreve (1 Beavan, 59). In Gower v. Grosvenor, as reported in Barnardiston (page 62), the Court seems to have considered that a conveyance was to be executed. Humberston v. Humberston was a gift to trustees to convey. In Woolmore v. Burrows, there was a direct gift to the executors to be laid out, and closely entailed to the family estate. Lord Dorchester v. The Earl of Effingham appears to have been a legal devise under a power, and the estate was to be attached to the title as closely as possible.

There is no reported case in which the Court has directed a settlement to be executed upon precatory words, and no case in which words of request have been addressed to so indefinite a series of persons as successors.

Mr. Pemberton, in reply.

[171] August 7. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale] (after stating the circumstances of the case, proceeded): The Plaintiff, John Knight of Wolverley, contends, that, under the will of Richard Payne Knight, his brother Thomas Andrew Knight was bound to make a strict settlement of the real and personal estates upon the male descendants of Richard Knight the grandfather.

The Defendant Thomas Knight of Pap Castle contends, that Thomas Andrew Knight was not bound to make a strict settlement of the estates, but was bound to make some settlement thereof upon one or more of the male descendants of Richard Knight, among whom he had a power of selection, which he has duly exercised by his will.

The Defendant Sir William Edward Rouse Boughton, and the widow and daughters of Thomas A. Knight, who claim under his will contend, that he had an absolute estate and interest in the property in question, and had a power of disposition, unfettered by any trust or obligation whatever.

The principal question is, whether a trust in favour of the male descendants of Richard Knight is created by the will of the testator Richard Payne Knight.

That the testator wished that his estates, or at least, that some estates should be preserved in the male line of his grandfather, and had a reliance, or in the popular sense, a trust, that the person to whom he gave his property, and those who should succeed to it, would act upon and realise that wish, admits of no doubt. He has expressed his wish and his reliance in terms which are, to that extent, sufficiently clear.

[172] But it is not every wish or expectation which a testator may express, nor every act which he may wish his successors to do, that can or ought to be executed or enforced as a trust in this Court; and in the infinite variety of expressions which are employed, and of cases which thereupon arise, there is often the greatest difficulty in determining, whether the act desired or recommended is an act which the testator intended to be executed as a trust, or which this Court ought to deem fit to be, or capable of being enforced as such. In the construction and execution of wills, it is undoubtedly the duty of this Court to give effect to the intention of the testator whenever it can be ascertained: but in cases of this nature, and in the examination of the authorities which are to be consulted in relation to them, it is, unfortunately, necessary to make some distinction between the intention of the testator and that which the Court has deemed it to be its duty to perform; for of late years it has frequently been admitted by Judges of great eminence that, by interfering in such cases, the Court has sometimes rather made a will for the testator, than executed the testator's will according to his intention; and the observation shews the necessity of being extremely cautious in admitting any, the least, extension of the principle to be extracted from a long series of authorities, in respect of which such admissions have been made.

As a general rule, it has been laid down, that when property is given absolutely to any person, and the same person is, by the giver who has power to command, recommended, or entreated, or wished, to dispose of that property in favour of another, the recommendation, entreaty, or wish shall be held to create a trust.

[173] First, if the words are so used, that upon the whole, they ought to be construed as imperative;

Secondly, if the subject of the recommendation or wish be certain; and,

Thirdly, if the objects or persons intended to have the benefit of the recommendation or wish be also certain.

In simple cases there is no difficulty in the application of the rule thus stated.

If a testator gives £1000 to A. B., desiring, wishing, recommending, or hoping that A. B. will, at his death, give the same sum or any certain part of it to C. D., it is considered that C. D. is an object of the testator's bounty, and A. B. is a trustee for him. No question arises upon the intention of the testator, upon the sum or subject intended to be given, or upon the person or object of the wish.

So, if a testator gives the residue of his estate, after certain purposes are answered, to A. B., recommending A. B., after his death, to give it to his own relations, or such of his own relations as he shall think most deserving, or as he shall choose, it has been considered that the residue of the property, though a subject to be ascertained, and that the relations to be selected, though persons or objects to be ascertained, are nevertheless so clearly and certainly ascertainable—so capable of being made certain, that the rule is applicable to such cases.

On the other hand, if the giver accompanies his expression of wish, or request by other words, from which it is to be collected, that he did not intend the wish to [174] be imperative: or if it appears from the context that the first taker was intended to have a discretionary power to withdraw any part of the subject from the object of the wish or request: or if the objects are not such as may be ascertained with sufficient certainty, it has been held that no trust is created. Thus the words "free and unfettered," accompanying the strongest expression of request, were held to prevent the words of the request being imperative. Any words by which it is expressed or from which it may be implied, that the first taker may apply any part of the subject to his own use, are held to prevent the subject of the gift from being considered certain; and a vague description of the object, that is, a description by which the giver neither clearly defines the object himself nor names a distinct class out of which the first taker is to select, or which leaves it doubtful what interest the object or class of objects is to take, will prevent the objects from being certain within the meaning of the rule; and in such cases we are told (2 Ves. jun. 632, 633) that the question "never turns upon the grammatical import of words—they may be imperative, but not necessarily so; the subject-matter, the situation of the parties, and the probable intent must be considered." And (10 Ves. 536) "wherever the subject, to be administered as trust property, and the objects, for whose benefit it is to be administered, are to be found in a will, not expressly creating a trust, the indefinite nature and quantum of the subject, and the indefinite nature of the objects, are always used by the Court as evidence, that the mind of the testator was not to create a trust; and the difficulty, that would be imposed upon the Court to say what should be so applied, or to what objects, has been the foundation of the argument, that no trust was intended ;" or, as Lord Eldon expresses it in another [176] case (Turn. & Russ. 159), "Where a trust is to be raised characterised by certainty, the very difficulty of doing it is an argument which goes, to a certain extent, towards inducing the Court to say, it is not sufficiently clear what the testator intended."

I must admit, that in the endeavour to apply these rules and principles to the present case, I have found very great difficulty ; that in the repeated consideration which I have given to the subject, I have found myself, at different times, inclined to adopt different conclusions ; and that the result to which I have finally arrived has been attended with much doubt and hesitation.

The testator, at the date of his will, was entitled in fee to a large real estate, and absolutely entitled to a very considerable personal estate. Of the largest part of the real estate he had been tenant in tail, under the dispositions made by his grandfather Richard Knight ; he had suffered recoveries, whereby he became entitled to the same estate in fee ; and the question is, whether by the will he meant to impose on his brother, Thomas Andrew Knight, the trust or duty of making such a settlement as is alleged by the Plaintiffs ; or such a settlement upon some of the male descendants of the grandfather as would, under the will of Thomas Andrew Knight, give a right to the Defendant, Thomas Knight of Pap Castle ; or did he mean that his brother was to have over the estate the same power which he himself had acquired and enjoyed ; and which by his will he exercised for the purpose of transmitting the estate to the next male heir of his grandfather, and which he wished his successors to use in the same manner for the further transmission of the estates in the same line. And I [176] am of opinion, though, I admit, after great doubt and hesitation, that the testator did not intend to impose an imperative trust on his successor, and that his will ought not to be construed to have that effect.

As he who had made himself absolute owner of the property had conceived himself bound in honour to transmit it to the male line of his grandfather, so he wished the same sentiment to govern his successors. He was pleased to speak of the honour and integrity of his family, and he expressed his trust or reliance on the justice of his successors ; but it does not appear to me that he intended to subject them, as trustees, to the power of this Court, so that they were to be compelled to do the same thing which he states he trusted their own sense of justice would induce them to do.

It is a common observation in all such cases, that the testator might, if he had intended it, have created an express trust ; but the authorities shew that if there be sufficient certainty, and nothing in the context of the will to oppose the conclusion, the trust may and must be implied ; and the question is, whether there is a trust by implication.

He gave all his estates, real and personal (except as therein mentioned), to his brother, or to the next descendant in the direct male line of his grandfather, who should be living at the time of his death. The gift is in terms which make the devisee the absolute owner, and give him the power of disposing of the whole property (with such exceptions as are mentioned) as he pleases. The exceptions, deductions, or reservations consist of certain gifts for charitable and other purposes ; and he constitutes his devisee sole executor and trustee to carry his will into execution, "confiding in the ap-[177]-proved honour and integrity of his family to take no advantage of any technical inaccuracies ;" and the context appears to me to shew, that these words relate to the reservations which he had made out of the general devise and bequest to his brother or the next descendant in the direct male line of his grandfather. The expressions used in his great bequest to the British Museum, afford additional evidence of his wish to maintain the distinction of his family in the same line ; but I think that the question in the cause depends on the effect to be given to the last sentence in the will. Having given all his estates, real and personal, to his successor, that is, the next male descendant, and having given a few legacies, he says, "I trust to the liberality of my successors to reward any others of my old servants and tenants according to their deserts, and to their justice in continuing the estates in the male succession, according to the will of the founder of the family, my above-named grandfather Richard Knight."

In this passage there is no doubt of the wish, or of the line of succession, in which the testator desired the estates (whatever he meant by that term) to devolve or be transmitted.

Contemplating his successors, and, as it would seem, all his successors without limit in that line, he says, that he trusts to their liberality for one purpose, and to their justice for another. So far as he trusts to their liberality to reward any of his old servants or tenants, according to their deserts, he cannot be understood to have intended to create an imperative trust. Notwithstanding the use made of the word "trust," an indefinite discretion was, in that respect, left with the successors; and it is difficult to suppose, that having in this sentence used the word "trust" in a sense consistent with an [178] indefinite discretion in the person trusted, he should, in the same sentence, use the word "trust" in a sense wholly inconsistent with such discretion;—in a sense which imposed an absolute obligation to resort to the most refined subtleties of the law for the purpose of executing a trust in such a manner as to preserve, by compulsion, the succession to the estate in the same line for the longest time possible. Admitting the wishes of the testator, which seem to me sufficiently expressed, I have found an insuperable difficulty in coming to a satisfactory conclusion that he did not intend to rely on the honour, integrity, or justice of his family or successors for the performance of his wishes, but did intend to impose upon his successors an obligation to be enforced by legal sanction: and the impression arising from the last words in the will appears to me to be increased by a consideration of the preceding parts. He gave absolute estates; as to the gifts to other persons, he confides in the approved honour and integrity of his family that no advantage will be taken of technical inaccuracies to defeat them; and as to the succession of the estates intended to pass in the line he had chosen, he trusts to their justice. It seems to me, as if he had said, "you see my sense of what is due to the founder of the family; under his will, I have inherited the estates which his industry and abilities acquired, and of which he had, therefore, the best right to dispose. I have, by my own act, made myself absolute master of the estates, but I think it just to continue the succession in the same manner: this I do by my will, and I trust to your justice to do the like." If this were his meaning, it is consistent with an intention that each successor should take from his immediate predecessor, by gift proceeding from a sense of justice, or by descent from the same motive, an absolute interest in the estates; and that the continuance in the line designated should be provided for in that way.

[179] I think, therefore, that there is great reason to doubt the intention to create an imperative trust: and looking to the subject to which his wishes were directed—observing the absolute gift of all his estates, real and personal, with certain exceptions; and that, in the last clause, he has not used the words "my said estate," or any words clearly and certainly indicating all that he had given to those whom he has called his successors, but had simply used the words, "the estates," leaving it be matter of by no means easy construction, whether he intended under that expression to include the personal estate as well as the real; and it not being certain, having regard to the subsequent reference to the will of his grandfather, whether he meant to include more than the estates of his grandfather, to which he had himself succeeded; and observing that some part of the personal estate, at least, was subjected to the liberality of his successors, I think that there is reason to doubt whether the subject is sufficiently certain for a trust of this nature.

The objects do appear to me to be indicated with sufficient certainty, and it seems to me clear in what order he wished them to take. But, unless they were to take successively as absolute owners, I cannot discover what estates they were intended to take. I have not been able to persuade myself that the testator meant to tie down his successor to make such a settlement as is proposed by the Plaintiffs, and nothing less would give the Plaintiffs any right to ask for a decree of this Court in their favour; and if I might be permitted to adapt the words of Lord Rosslyn, in the case of Meggison and Moore (2 Ves. jun. 633), to the circumstances of this case, I should say, that "if I were imperatively to declare that the successors designated by the will should take only [180] for life and their issue in strict settlement, I should do a thing most foreign to the testator's intention. His successor might have done what is suggested. The testator intimated a wish to him, and gave sufficient power; but I cannot say that he has left it to the Court of Chancery to accomplish his wishes."

On the whole, I am under the necessity of saying, that for the creation of a trust, which ought to be characterised by certainty, there is not sufficient clearness to make it certain that the words of trust were intended to be imperative, or to make it certain what was precisely the subject intended to be affected, or to make it certain what were the interests to be enjoyed by the objects. -

It appears to me, therefore, that the Plaintiffs have not made out any title, and that the bill ought to be dismissed.(1)

Bill dismissed with costs.

(1) Lord Dorchester v. The Earl of Effingham. Rolls. Feb. 18, 19, March 9, 1813.

[See cases in note to Knight v. Knight, 3 Beav. 148.]

A. having a power of revocation and new appointment over an estate, of which B., his heir, was tenant in tail, by his will directed the estate "to be attached to his title as closely as possible." Held, that the estate of B. and all other tenants in tail in esse at A.'s death (being in line of the title) were abridged to estates for life only.

The facts of the case, as appearing by the decree, were as follows: under certain indentures, real estates were limited to the use of Guy Lord Dorchester for life, with remainder to his then eldest son Christopher for life, with remainder to Christopher's first and other sons in tail male, with remainder in succession to the other children of Guy Lord Dorchester for life, with remainder to their first and other sons in tail. A power of revocation of their uses, and of making a new appointment by deed or will, was reserved to Guy Lord Dorchester.

Christopher died in 1806, leaving the Plaintiff Arthur Henry, his eldest son, an infant.

Guy Lord Dorchester died in 1808. By his will, attested so as to pass real estate, he expressed himself as follows:—"All my landed estates to be attached to my title as closely as possible; all the timber woods [181] and trees on my estates I leave to my executors in trust to increase my landed property; all debts due to me from Government, and all my personal property not otherwise disposed of, I leave to my executors in trust to increase my landed property, all which trust shall be lodged in Bank stock, there to accumulate principal and interest, and profits arising therefrom, till my executors find an advisable purchase adjoining to or near my estates. The executors to have a power, with the consent and approbation of Lady Dorchester, to sell my estates for the purpose of buying others, which may unite or approximate the landed property."

By a codicil unattested, he gave all the timber on his estates, and all his personal property not otherwise disposed of, to his executors in trust to increase his landed property.

After the death of Guy Lord Dorchester, his grandson Arthur Henry, then Lord Dorchester, who, under the limitations in the deeds, taken independently of the will, would have been tenant in tail, filed this bill by his guardian, praying that he "might be declared to be tenant in tail of the said settled estates, under and by virtue of the limitations of the said deeds;" that the deeds and will might be carried into execution, and for a declaration of the rights of the parties.

The parties entitled in remainder, after the limitations to the Plaintiff and his issue, insisted "that the said testator did by his said will alter the uses of the said settlement, and that he had full right and power so to do; and that upon the true construction of the said will, the Plaintiff ought to be declared to be tenant for life of the estates of the said Guy Lord Dorchester; and that they would become entitled upon the death of the said Plaintiff to successive estates for life therein, with remainder to their respective sons in tail male; and the Defendant Guy Carlton claimed to be the first tenant in tail in being of the said estates."

It appears from the registrar's note-book, that the cause came on upon the 18th and 19th of February 1813, when it was ordered to stand over for a fortnight, with liberty for the Plaintiff to amend the bill, and bring the cause again to a hearing as he should be advised. The cause accordingly came on upon the 9th of March 1813, when Sir S. Romilly and Mr. Trower appeared for the Plaintiff.

Mr. Leach and Mr. Courtenay, for Lady Dorchester and the Defendants to the amended bill.

Mr. Richards, for the executors.

Sir William Grant, Master of the Rolls, declared "that by the effect of the said testator's will, the estate tail of the said Plaintiff Lord Dorchester, in the said settled estates, and the estates tail of all other the male issue [182] or descendants (if any) of the testator in esse, at the time of the testator's death, in the same estates were abridged to estates for life only, with remainder to their first and other sons successively in tail male in strict settlement." (NOTE.—See this case reported on another point in G. Cooper, 319; where the former part of the will is stated.)

[182] FRANKS v. PRICE. Dec. 6, 7, 10, 11, 13, 14, 1839; August 8, 1840.

[S. C. 9 L. J. Ch. (N. S.), 383; and at law, 5 Bing. (N. C.), 37; 6 Scott. 710.]

A testator gave life interests in real and personal estate to A. and B., with interests to their issue male in certain events only, and the estate was given over to the heir of the testator on a general failure of issue male of A. and B. Held, that A. and B. took estates tail by implication.

A testator devised his real and personal estate to trustees, and gave life-estates therein to several persons, namely, A., B., &c.; and after their deaths he directed the trustees to pay the income to Moses and Naphthali, during their respective lives, share and share alike; and in case either of them should, after the deaths of A., B., &c., depart this life without leaving issue male of his body, in trust to pay the whole income to the survivor for life; and he directed that if Moses should, after the deaths of A., B., &c., die before Naphthali, leaving issue male, then the trustees should convey, a moiety of the real estate, to the use of the first and other sons of Moses in tail male, with remainder to Naphthali for life, with remainder to his first and other sons in tail, and in default to the testator's right heirs, and lay out a moiety of the personal estate in land, and convey the same to trustees to the like uses. The testator made a similar disposition mutatis mutandis of the other moiety in case of the death of Naphthali, after the death of A., B., leaving issue male, and he provided that in case Moses and Naphthali should die without leaving issue male, or if such issue male should die without leaving any issue male, the trustees should convey the property to such person as should, at the death of the survivor of Moses and Naphthali, be the right heir of the testator. It will be seen that no provision was made for the event (which happened), of Moses dying without issue before the death of A., B. Naphthali survived Moses and A., B., &c., and Moses died without issue. Held, first, that the words "after the deaths of A., B., &c." did not import contingency, but were merely words of reference, shewing that the gifts then in course of expression were subject to the prior gifts, and were not to have effect in possession until those prior gifts were satisfied or had become inoperative. Secondly, that the words, "if Moses should die before the death of Naphthali, leaving issue male," must have their natural meaning, and be taken to provide only for the particular cases expressly described. Thirdly, that to effectuate the general intent, Naphthali took an estate tail by implication in both moieties of the realty, and an absolute interest in the personalty. And, fourthly, that the trusts on which the question arose were not executory so as to alter the construction as arising on an executed trust.

The question in this case arose on the will of the testator Moses Hart, and was, whether, under the will and in the events which had happened, Naphthali Hart took an estate for life, or an estate tail by implication, in the real and personal estate of the testator. In the former case alone the Plaintiff would be entitled.

The testator, by his will, dated the 2d of April 1756 (after bequeathing several annuities and certain legacies, and specifying various personal property to which he was entitled, and reciting that he was possessed of divers messuages and hereditaments and premises at Islesworth, as well freehold and copyhold, and at Richmond and Topsefield, and also divers other leasehold messuages, lands, and tenements), devised and bequeathed all his real and personal estate to trustees, their heirs, executors, and administrators, upon trust to sell his real estate at Islesworth and Richmond, and his personal estate, and invest the produce in Government securities; and out of the yearly income thereof, and out of the rents and profits of his estate at Topsefield, and of his leasehold estates, and all other his real and personal estate, to pay the annuities and legacies; and after payment thereof, he directed the trustees to pay the surplus yearly income of his estate, both real and personal, in manner following: that is to say, one moiety thereof to his daughter, Judith Levy, during her life, or so long as she continued the widow of her late husband; and the other moiety to his daughter Rachael Adolphus, during her life, for her separate use. The testator then proceeded in the following terms:—"And upon further trust, that if the said Rachael Adolphus shall survive the said Judith Levy, or if the said Judith Levy shall at any time hereafter intermarry with any other husband, that from the time of such death or marriage, the moiety of the surplus of the income of my real and personal estates made payable as aforesaid to the said Judith Levy shall be paid by half-yearly payments to the said Rachael Adolphus, for the term of her natural life, for her own sole and separate use, in the same manner as the other moiety is hereby [184] directed to be paid to her as aforesaid; and upon further trust, that if the said Rachael Adolphus shall die without having any issue of her body, and the said Judith Levy shall her survive, that then and in such case the moiety of the surplus of the income of my said real and personal estate, payable to the said Rachael Adolphus as aforesaid, shall by half-yearly payments be paid to the said Judith Levy, for and during the term of her natural life, if she so long continues the widow of the said Elias Levy. And upon further trust, that if the said Rachael Adolphus shall at her death have any issue of her body lawfully begotten, that then and in such case the moiety of the surplus of the income of my said real and personal estate payable to the said Rachael Adolphus as aforesaid shall from thenceforth by half-yearly payments be paid to all the children of the said Rachael Adolphus, during their respective lives, in equal proportions, share and share alike; and in case of the death of any of them, the part and share of such child so dying shall be equally paid to and amongst the survivors and survivor of them. And on further trust, that from and after the death or marriage of the said Judith Levy, the income of my said real and personal estates devised to her as aforesaid shall be paid by half-yearly payments to and amongst all and every of the children of the said Rachael Adolphus, in the same manner and with the like benefit of survivorship as the surplus of the income of my said real and personal estate payable to the said Rachael Adolphus as aforesaid is hereby directed to be paid. And on further trust, that in case my daughter Rachael Adolphus shall have any issue of her body lawfully begotten, that my said trustees do and shall lay out and expend so much money as they shall think necessary for the boarding, maintenance, and education of such children out of the yearly income and produce of my said real and personal estates devised to them as aforesaid, until such time as they shall respectively attain their [185] respective ages of twenty-five years; and that they my said trustees and executors shall respectively lay out the surplus of such yearly income and produce in Government securities for the use of such children respectively, to be paid to each of them, as he, she, or they shall respectively attain their age or ages of twenty-five years, share and share alike, with benefit of survivorship to each other. And upon further trust, from and after the decease of both my said daughters, and of the issue of the said Rachael Adolphus (or on the marriage of my daughter Judith Levy as aforesaid, she surviving the said Rachael Adolphus and her issue), that the trustees and executors, &c., do pay the yearly income, &c., of all my said estates, &c., among so many of my said three sisters, Margolus Simons, Judith Hart, and Jacobed Hart, as shall be then living, and to the survivors and survivor of them, share and share alike, for and during their respective natural lives, and the life of the longer liver of them, for their separate use."

"And upon further trust, from and after the decease of my said daughters, and of the issue of my daughter Rachael Adolphus, and of the decease of my said three sisters, that my said trustees and executors shall pay the yearly income and produce of my said real and personal estates unto Moses Hart and Naphthali Hart, the sons of my brother-in-law, Solomon Hart, for and during the term of their respective natural lives, share and share alike; and in case either of them, the said Moses Hart and Naphthali Hart, shall, after the deaths of the said Judith Levy and Rachael Adolphus, and of the children of the said Rachael Adolphus (if any she shall have), and of the decease of my said three sisters, depart this life without leaving issue male of his body lawfully begotten, then in trust to pay the whole yearly income and produce of my said real and personal estate unto the survivor of them, for and during the term of his natural life."

[186] "And I do hereby further direct and appoint, that if the said Moses Hart shall, after the deaths of the said Judith Levy and Rachael Adolphus, and the children of the said Rachel Adolphus (if any she shall have), and of the decease of my said three sisters, depart this life before the said Naphthali Hart, leaving issue male of his body, that then and in such case my said trustees, or the survivor of them, and the heirs of such survivor, shall convey one moiety of my said real estate at Topsfield, and also convey one moiety of all such other parts of my freehold and copyhold estates as shall be then remaining unsold, to trustees to the use and behoof of the first and every other son and sons of the said Moses Hart, severally and successively in tail male; and in default of such issue, remainder to the said Naphthali Hart, for the term of his natural life, with remainder to his first and other sons, severally and successively in tail male; and in default of such issue, to my right heirs. And in case of such death in manner aforesaid of the said Moses Hart before the said Naphthali Hart, and of the said Moses Hart leaving issue male, I do hereby direct and appoint that my said trustees, and the survivor, &c., shall and do lay out one moiety of my personal estate and effects, and of such money as shall have arisen by sale of my freehold and copyhold estates, directed as aforesaid to be sold (in case they should then have been sold), in the purchase of lands of inheritance, and convey the same to trustees, to the like uses as I have hereinbefore directed, one moiety of my said real estate at Topsfield to be conveyed and settled on the issue of the said Moses Hart, on the contingency aforesaid."

"And I do hereby further direct and appoint, that if the said Naphthali Hart shall, after the deaths of the said Judith Levy and Rachael Adolphus, and the children of the said Rachael Adolphus (if any she shall have), [187] and of the decease of my said three sisters, depart this life before the said Moses Hart, leaving issue male of his body lawfully begotten, that then and in such case, my said trustees, or the survivor, &c., shall convey one moiety of my real estate at Topsfield, and also convey one moiety of all such other parts of my freehold and copyhold estates as shall be then remaining unsold, to trustees, to the use and behoof of the first and every other son and sons of the said Naphthali Hart, severally and successively in tail male; and in default of such issue, remainder to the said Moses Hart, for the term of his natural life, with remainder to his first and other sons severally and successively in tail male; and in default of such issue, to my right heirs. And in case of such death, in manner aforesaid, of the said Naphthali Hart before the said Moses Hart, and his, the said Naphthali Hart's, leaving issue male, I do hereby direct and appoint that my said trustees, and the survivor, &c., shall and do lay out one moiety of my personal estate and effects, and of such money as shall have arisen by sale of my freehold and copyhold estates, directed as aforesaid to be sold (in case they should have been then sold), in the purchase of lands of inheritance and convey the same to trustees to the like uses as I have hereinbefore directed, one moiety of my said real estate at Topsfield to be conveyed and settled on the issue of the said Naphthali Hart, on the contingency aforesaid."

"And in case the said Moses Hart and Naphthali Hart shall both die without leaving any issue male, or such issue male shall die without leaving any issue male, that then and in such case my said trustees and executors, or the survivor, &c., shall convey my said real estate at Topsfield, and all other my freehold and copyhold estates which shall then remain unsold, unto such person or persons as shall, at the death of the survivor of them, the said Moses Hart and Naphthali Hart, be [188] my right heir or right heirs; and shall in that case transfer, pay, and dispose of all my personal estate to and amongst such persons, and in such shares and proportions as they would, by virtue of the Statute of Distribution of Intestates' Estates, be respectively entitled unto in case I had died intestate."

It will be seen that the will made no provision for the events which afterwards happened, namely, of Moses dying without issue before the deaths of the previous tenants for life.

The testator died in 1756.

All the devisees named in the testator's will survived him. The events which subsequently happened were these :

The testator's daughter Rachael, and his sisters, Margolus, Judith, and Jacobed, and Moses Hart, all died without issue, in the lifetime of Judith Levy and of Naphthali Hart.

In 1803 Judith Levy died.

In 1828 Naphthali Hart died a bachelor.

Judith Levy remained in possession of the property until her death. Naphthali Hart then entered into possession, and assuming to be tenant in tail in possession, he suffered recoveries of the freehold and copyhold property, and in 1821 conveyed all the freehold and copyhold and personal estate to a purchaser for valuable consideration.

The co-heirs at law and next of kin of the testator were the Plaintiff, Jacob Henry Franks, and the Defendants, Priscilla Franks and Dame Isabella Bell Cooper.

[189] Besides some leaseholds, there was a sum of £1600 East India stock, and £458 consols, forming the personal estate of the testator.

This bill was filed in 1829 by Jacob Henry Franks, against Price Priscilla Franks, and Sir William H. Cooper and Lady Cooper, and the personal representative of the testator and the heir at law of the surviving trustee of the real estate, and against parties claiming beneficially under the purchaser and their trustee, praying that the rights of all parties in the testator's real and personal estates might be declared, for consequential accounts and inquiries, and that the Plaintiff might be let into possession of his share of the real estates.

The preliminary inquiries having been made before the Master, the cause came on to be heard for further directions in March 1837, when a case was directed for the opinion of the Judges of the Court of Common Pleas on the following points :—

1. Whether Naphthali Hart took any and what estate, under the will of Moses Hart, in the real estate of the testator at Topsfield.

2. Whether Jacob Henry Franks, Priscilla Franks, and Dame Isabella Bell Cooper, the heirs at law of the testator living at the death of Naphthali Hart, took any and what estate under the will in the real estate at Topsfield ; and,

3. Whether Judith Levy, Rachael Adolphus, H. Isaac Franks, Philah Franks, and Priscilla Franks, the heirs at law of the testator living at the time of his death, took any and what estate under his will in the real estate at Topsfield.

[190] The case was argued in Michaelmas term 1838 (5 Bing. N. C. 37 ; and 6 Scott, 710), and the following certificate was returned :—

"We are of opinion, that upon the death of Moses Hart without issue, Naphthali Hart became and was seised, under and by virtue of the testator's will, of a vested estate in tail male in remainder expectant on the determination of the estates limited to Judith Levy, Rachael Adolphus and her children, and the testator's three sisters, in all the messuages, lands, and hereditaments at Topsfield. It having been intimated to us by the counsel on both sides, that, in the event of our opinion on the first question being such as is above stated, they do not desire to have our opinion on the matters referred to in the second and third questions, we forbear to say any thing in answer to them."

The cause now came on for further directions upon the certificate of the Court of Common Pleas.

Mr. Pemberton, Mr. Parker, and Mr. Lee, for the Plaintiff. The will contains no express gift in tail to Moses and Naphthali ; and it is only by implication that they can be held to take such an estate. It is said on the other side, that the ultimate gift over being on a general failure of the issue male of Moses and Naphthali, shews an intention, that all such issue shall be provided for ; but the testator not having, by the previous gifts, provided for all such issue, it is necessary, in order to effectuate the general intention of the testator, to imply an estate tail in the parents, through whom the whole line of such issue may inherit. It has, however, been clearly established, that there can be no such estate by im-[191]-plication, if the preceding gifts exhaust the whole issue, on failure of which the gift over is to take effect.

It is said then by the Defendants, that in this case there are not previous limitations to the issue male of Moses and Naphthali in every event; and for this reason, because the gifts to them are contingent on their parents surviving the several tenants for life; the answer, however, is this:

First, that if the words sound in contingency, then such contingency runs through the whole will, subsequent to the life-estates to Moses and Naphthali, and consequently none of the subsequent devises took effect at all; by importing contingency, every devise subsequent to those to Moses and Naphthali has failed, and the Plaintiff and the other co-heirs will then become entitled.

Secondly, if the words be not read in a contingent sense, but as importing the period at which, consistent with the previous gifts, the estate is to vest in possession or enjoyment, then it will be found that there is a previous limitation to all the issue of Moses and Naphthali, in respect of both the moieties of the estate, and no necessity will then exist for implying an estate tail in their parents.

Thirdly, if any doubt exists whether the prior limitations would, by express devise, exhaust all the issue male as to both moieties; yet it is clear, that as to one moiety, it does exhaust all such issue male, and therefore, as to that moiety, it is impossible to imply an estate tail in Naphthali.

Fourthly, if the Court is compelled to imply an estate tail at all, it must be implied in favour of the issue of [192] Moses and Naphthali, and not in favour of Moses and Naphthali themselves.

Fifthly, if this Court should concur in the certificate of the Court of Common Pleas on the case stated to them, in which the words of the will have been varied, so as to make the devises legal devises, yet that in this Court a different conclusion must prevail on the words of the will themselves, on the ground of their creating an executory trust; and,

Sixthly, That the gifts to the children of Rachael Adolphus at twenty-five, and those subsequent thereto, are too remote; and that the heir becomes consequently entitled.

If the words be read as importing contingency, how did Naphthali take an estate for life in the whole? The words are, if either Moses or Naphthali shall, after the deaths of Judith, &c., die without leaving issue male, then to pay the whole income to the survivor for life; and this event never took place as to the moiety of Moses. But it is absurd to suppose that the gift of the whole to Naphthali was to be dependent not only on the event of Moses dying without issue male, but also on the contingency of Moses surviving the previous tenants for life. If you read the words as contingent, the event never took place, and Naphthali never became entitled for life to the moiety of Moses; but if you construe them as providing for the period at which the limitations were to take effect, without prejudicing the estates previously limited, then everything will be consistent. The next clause must be construed in a similar way. It is, that if Moses shall, after the deaths of Judith, &c., depart this life leaving issue, then there is to be a conveyance to the first and other sons of Moses in tail, with re-[193]-mainder to Naphthali for life, with remainder to his first and other sons in tail. Here again it would be absurd to consider the gifts over to Naphthali and his issue, depended either on the contingency of Moses surviving Judith, &c., or of his leaving issue male; the object was to give it over to them after first providing for those persons to whom previous gifts had been limited, and it will be found from the authorities subsequently referred to, that in construing these limitations there is no contingency whatever, and that all the male issue have been provided for.

Again: the words "depart this life before Naphthali" must be read as words of limitation, and not of contingency, for nothing would be more absurd, than to make the estate of the first and other sons of Moses depend on the uncle being alive or dead at the time of the death of their father. The reason of the introduction of these words was this, that there was a subsequent gift to Naphthali for life which could only take effect in the event of his surviving Moses.

In a legal devise, but more especially in an executory trust, it is sufficient to find the order on which the devisees are to take: it is quite immaterial how the devisees themselves are mixed or misplaced in the will; and, bearing this in mind, it will be found that this will contains a provision for the issue of Moses, with remainder to Naphthali and his issue in every event which can possibly happen.

The settlement of the moiety of Moses was not to depend on his surviving his brother, or on his leaving issue male, but was to take place at all events, and then there would be limitations of his moiety to his first and [194] other sons in tail, with remainder to Naphthali for life, with remainder to his first and other sons in tail.

With respect also to Naphthali's moiety the same arguments apply: it is merely reading the words redendo singula singulis.

In Murray v. Jones (2 Ves. & B. 313) Lady Bath gave certain property "in case, she should have but one child living at the time of her decease," to Mrs. Markham. She never had any child at all, and it was argued, therefore, that the gift could not take effect, because the specified event had not happened; but the answer of Sir William Grant was this; The condition has been more than performed; she did not mean that there should be one child in order that Mrs. Markham should take, but that there should not be more than one child. So here, it is not necessary that there should be children of Moses to entitle Naphthali and his children to take: but it is sufficient, if there are no children of Moses to take, to the exclusion of Naphthali and his children. Similarly in Aiton v. Brooks (7 Sim. 204), there was a gift over to B. in case A. should have children living at her decease, who should all die under twenty-one, and it was held, that the gift over took effect, though A. never had a child.

The principle is thus stated in 2 Jarman's Pow. Devise, 217, "where an estate in remainder is limited in terms of contingency, on the happening of certain events, and the events described are precisely those on which, the preceding estates having determined, it will fall into possession, it is construed to be, not a contingent gift conditioned to take effect on these events, but as a devise [195] immediately vested, the possession of which is necessarily dependent on the events in question."

This proposition is fully borne out by a long series of cases, as Webb v. Hearing (Cro. Jac. 415), Anon. (2 Vent. 363), Pearsall v. Simpson (15 Ves. 29), Massey v. Hudson (2 Mer. 130), Napper v. Sanders (Hutton, 118), stated in Lethieullier v. Tracy (3 Atk. 781).

It does not, however, follow that where all the issue will not take under the preceding limitations an estate tail is to be implied upon a gift over, in default of issue; because such issue, may be construed, that issue to whom limitations have been previously made; Blackborn v. Edgley (1 P. Wms. 600), Morse v. Lord Ormonds (5 Mad. 99; 1 Russ. 382), Ellicombe v. Gompertz (3 Myl. & Cr. 127).

On the fourth point: even if the gift to the issue of Naphthali be held to depend on Naphthali surviving Moses, or Moses Naphthali, it is clear, that as to one moiety of the estate, there is no contingency; for either Naphthali must survive Moses, or Moses Naphthali. One of these events must necessarily take place; and in either case, there is a limitation to the issue of Naphthali. As to a moiety, therefore, there is no necessity whatever for implying an estate tail in the parent.

As to the fifth point. Assuming that an estate tail must be implied, it is to be implied not in favour of the parents, so as to enable them by a recovery to defeat all the subsequent gifts, but in favour of the children of Moses and Naphthali. The ultimate gift over being [196] in case Moses and Naphthali shall die without leaving issue male, or such issue male (meaning first and other sons), shall die without leaving any issue male; Doe dem. Barnard v. Reason (3 Wils. 244), Southby v. Stonehouse (2 Ves. sen. 610), Lewis v. Waters (6 East, 336), Smith v. Horlock (7 Taunt. 129). There is this difficulty also in implying estates tail in the two parents, if there were but one that would be easily effected, but it is far different where there are two or more. How are they to take? Are they to take as tenants in common in tail, or joint-tenants, or in succession, or with cross-remainders? The difficulty had great weight with C. J. Vaughan in Gardner v. Sheldon (Vaughan, 259).

Lastly, this is an executory trust to be carried into effect by a conveyance from the trustees; in such case the Court will mould the most inflexible expressions, as "heir," "heirs of the body," &c., so as to effectuate the full intention of the testator; and will take care, by giving an estate for life only to the parents, to preserve the property for their issue. Papillon v. Voice (2 P. Wms. 470), Leonard v. Earl of Sussex (2 Vern. 527), Jervoise v. Duke of Northumberland (1 Jac. & W. 559).

Mr. Tinney and Mr. Stuart, for Defendants in the same interest with the Plaintiff.

Mr. Kindersley, Mr. Bethell, Mr. Barry, and Mr. Hedge, for the other Defendants, contra. Naphthali took by implication an estate tail in the whole real estate, and he destroyed the remainders by suffering the recoveries; he took also an absolute interest [197] in the personalty. First, from the frame of the record, it is incompetent for the Plaintiff now to insist that all the limitations after the several life-estates to the daughters, sisters, and the children, are contingent; for by the bill they are treated as vested, and the Plaintiff thereby claims one-half as one of the co-heirs at the time of the failure of the prior limitations, and not one-fourth, which he would have been entitled to as representing one of the co-heirs at the testator's death, or if claiming upon failure of the prior limitations, and not under the will. The Plaintiff has done so, for this obvious reason, viz., because the adverse possession of Naphthali for twenty-five years, would, as to one moiety, have been a complete answer to any claim he might make, otherwise than under the ultimate limitation in the will.

On the second point. The general rule seems free from all doubt: that as the ultimate gift over is in default of issue male of Moses and Naphthali, they will take an estate tail if it can be shewn that such issue male are not provided for by the previous limitations; Langley v. Baldwin (1 Eq. Ca. Abr. 185), Attorney-General v. Sutton (2 Bro. P. C. 382), Allanson v. Clitherow (1 Ves. sen. 24), Stanley v. Lennard (1 Eden, 87; and Ambler, 355), Parr v. Swindells (4 Russ. 283). We contend that such is the case, and that the previous limitations to the issue male being limited to them in certain contingent events only, which may not occur, it is necessary to give by implication an estate tail to their parents. There are three events contemplated by the testator, in which a totally distinct disposition is made by him of his property, and however absurd they may seem, yet if clearly expressed, they must determine the rights of the parties.

[198] First, if Moses or Naphthali should die without issue male, then to pay the whole rents to the survivor of them, but in that case there is no limitation to the issue, if any, of the survivor.

Secondly, if Moses should die before Naphthali, leaving issue male, then and then only a conveyance is to be made to the sons of Moses in tail, with remainder to Naphthali for life, with remainder to his first and other sons in tail, with remainder both as to the real and personal estate to the testator's right heirs, and similarly in the other alternative, if Naphthali should die before Moses, leaving issue male.

Thirdly, in case both Moses and Naphthali should die without issue male, then there is to be a conveyance not to the testator's right heirs as before directed, but a conveyance of the realty to such person as at the death of the survivor of Moses and Naphthali, should be the testator's right heir, and the personalty to his next of kin. So that, in these particular events, the ultimate limitation is altogether different. It is, therefore, clear that the property was not, in every event, to go according to the scheme proposed by the Plaintiffs, and that in the several contingent events before stated, the destination of the property was to be different. We contend, therefore, that the expressions, "if Moses shall die before Naphthali, leaving issue male," are to be construed as contingent, and that the case does not come within the class of authorities cited on the other side, commencing with Boraston's case (3 Rep. 19). The principle is this: where a remainder is limited in words which seem to import a contingency, but on events precisely those on which the preceding estates will determine, then such words do not amount to a [199] condition precedent, but only denote the time when the remainder is to vest in possession. The words are considered mere surplusage, as they do nothing more than would be implied without them; as to A. for life, with remainder to B. in tail, if he survive A., B.'s estate would not be contingent on his surviving A.; but the case is far different where the contingency stated does not correspond with the determination of the previous estates, as to A. for life, with remainder to B. in tail, if he survive A. and C. This case then comes within the third class stated in Jarman's Pow. Dev. (2 vol. 224), who very accurately states the effect of the several cases which have been cited on behalf of the Plaintiff: he says, "The several preceding classes of cases clearly demonstrate that the Courts will not construe a remainder to be contingent merely from the inaccurate and inartificial use of expressions importing contingency, if the substance and effect of the limitations afford ground for concluding that they were not used with a view to suspend the vesting. They may be considered, however, as exceptions to the general rule; and agreeably to the maxim exceptio probat regulam, they confirm rather than oppose the doctrine, that devises limited in clear and express terms of contingency do not take effect, unless the events upon which they are made dependent happen, which cases we now proceed to consider." The author then proceeds to another class of cases, and to which the present belongs, in which estates limited in clear terms of contingency have been so construed, notwithstanding the absurd consequences. He says of this class: "The first observation suggested by this class of cases is, that an estate will be construed to be contingent, if clearly so expressed, however absurd and inconvenient such a [200] construction may be, and however inconsistent with what it may be conjectured was the testator's actual intention." This statement is fully borne out by the cases cited; thus in Denn dem. Radcliffe v. Bagshaw (6 Term R. 512) was a devise to M. for life, and after her decease to the first son of her body, if living at the time of her death, and it was held that the estate of the son who died before the mother never arose; Holmes v. Cradock (3 Ves. 317), Shulthan v. Smith (6 Dow. 22).

The words "if Moses shall die leaving issue male" must, therefore, necessarily be construed as contingent. The consequence is, that Moses having died without leaving issue male, the contingency never took effect; and in that event, therefore, there was no limitation of his share to the children of Naphthali. As to Naphthali's share, he did not die in the lifetime of Moses, and therefore as to his share the limitation to his children failed. In the events therefore, which happened, no child of Naphthali, if he had happened to have had one, could have taken under the limitations. Further than this, if either Moses or Naphthali had left children, it is plain they could only take one moiety, and that only in the event of their father surviving their uncle; and if both left issue male, the issue male of the survivor would take nothing in their parent's moiety. Thus, then, it appears, that in many events, the children of Moses and Naphthali would have been totally unprovided for under the will as to the whole or a moiety of the property. This case then becomes the ordinary one of implying an estate tail in the parents, in order to effectuate the general intention of the testator, and to let in the whole issue male.

[201] Fourthly, the implied estate tail must be given to the parents, and not to the children. Stanley v. Lennard (1 Eden, 87) is in point, which was a devise to A. for life, with remainder to the eldest son of A. and the issue male of such eldest son, and for want of issue of A. to B., it was argued that all the sons of A. should take an estate tail, but Lord Northington held that A. took an estate tail. Lewis v. Waters, and the other authorities cited on this point, were not cases of implication, and do not apply.

Fifthly, we contend that this is not a case of executory trust, for although in particular events, which have not happened, the testator has directed a conveyance to be made, yet on all the clauses on which any controversy arises, the testator has executed the trust himself. The gifts to his daughters, his sisters, and to Moses and Naphthali, consist of a direction to pay, and are trusts executed, and the limitation of which must receive the same construction as limitations of the legal estate. Even if they were executory, the Court would not change the estates expressly directed to be given to the several parties 2 Pow. Devise 447, or insert estates to parties which are not warranted by the expressions in the will.

If any error has arisen in the statement of the case to the Common Pleas, which we deny, the fault rests with the Plaintiff who prepared it. We submit that the certificate of the Court of Common Pleas is satisfactory, and ought to be confirmed.

Mr. Pemberton, in reply.

The Master of the Rolls postponed giving his judgment.

[202] August 8, 1840. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. This is a bill filed by Jacob Henry Franks, who is one of the co-heirs of Moses Hart deceased, claiming to be entitled to a share of the real estates of the same Moses Hart, and for consequential relief.

The Defendants claim as purchasers from Naphthali Hart, who was a devisee named in the will of Moses Hart. If Naphthali Hart took under the will an estate for life only, the Plaintiff is now entitled as one of the heirs of Moses; but if Naphthali took an estate tail under the will he barred it, and the Plaintiff has no title.

The necessary parties to the consideration of the question having been ascertained by the Master's report, the cause came on to be heard on the 2d day of March 1837, and it was ordered that a case be made for the opinion of the Judges of the Court of Common Pleas on the will of the said Moses Hart, and that the questions be—

1. Whether Naphthali Hart took any, and what estate under the will of Moses Hart, dated the 2d of April 1756, in the real estate of the said testator at Topsfield.

2. Whether the heirs at law of the testator living at the death of Naphthali Hart took any, and what estate under the said will in the said real estate at Topsfield.

3. Whether the heir at law of the testator living at the time of his death took any, and what estate under his said will in the said real estate at Topsfield.

On the 1st question, the Judges on the 4th of July 1838 stated their opinion to be, that on the death of [203] Moses Hart without issue, Naphthali Hart became and was seized under and by virtue of the testator's will of a vested estate in tail in remainder (expectant on the determination of the estates limited to Judith Levy and Rachael Adolphus and her children, and the testator's three sisters) in all the messuages, lands, and hereditaments at Topsfield.

And such being their opinion upon the first question, they were not requested to give any answer to the second and third questions.

It is now contended before me that this opinion is erroneous, and I am desired either to decide in opposition to it, or to send the question to the same or some other Court for reconsideration.

The will of Moses Hart, on the construction of which the question depends, is dated the 2d of April 1756. The testator died in the course of the same year, and he had three sisters, viz., Judith Hart, Jacobed Hart, and Margolus Simons, and two sons of his brother-in-law, Solomon Hart, viz., Moses Hart and Naphthali Hart.

He intended to give interests in his estate to his daughters, Mrs. Levy and Mrs. Adolphus, to the issue or children of his daughter Mrs. Adolphus, to his three sisters, and to his nephews of the half blood Moses and Naphthali Hart. Mrs. Adolphus died without issue in the year 1773, leaving Mrs. Levy surviving her; and Mrs. Levy was entitled during her life or widowhood to the income of the testator's estate. The three sisters died in the lifetime of Mrs. Levy. Moses had a son who died before his father, and Moses himself died in the lifetime of Mrs. Levy.

[204] Mrs. Levy died in 1803, and upon her death Naphthali Hart took possession of the estate, and the question is, what was the estate to which he was entitled under the will.

The testator after bequeathing certain annuities and specific legacies, proceeds to state the property to which he was entitled, and he gives the same to trustees and directs them to sell various parts thereof, and place out the money arising from the sale thereof on Government securities, and out of the yearly income or produce thereof, and of his real and personal estate, to pay the annuities and legacies which he had before given; and after payment thereof he directed the trustees to pay the surplus income and produce of his estate in manner therein mentioned to his daughters, Judith and Rachael, and to the children of his daughter Rachael, and after the decease of both his daughters, and the issue of Rachael, to his sisters Margolus, Judith, and Jacobed, and the survivors or survivor of them for life. It thus appears that Moses and Naphthali were not to take anything during the lives of the daughters Judith and Rachael, or the life of any child of Rachael, or the life of any of the three sisters, Margolus, Judith and Jacobed. The testator then proceeds to direct his trustees to hold his estate on trust, "from and after the decease of my said daughters, and of the issue of my daughter Rachael, and the decease of my said three sisters, that my said trustees shall pay the yearly income and produce of my said real and personal estates unto Moses Hart and Naphthali Hart, the sons of my brother-in-law Solomon Hart, for and during the term of their respective natural lives, share and share alike: and in case either of them the said Moses Hart and Naphthali Hart, shall, after the deaths of the said Judith and Rachael, and of the children of the said Rachael, if any she shall [205] leave, and the decease of my said three sisters, depart this life without leaving issue male of his body lawfully begotten, then in trust to pay the whole yearly income and produce of my said real and personal estate unto the survivor of them, for and during the term of his natural life: and I do hereby further direct and appoint that if the said Moses Hart shall, after the deaths of the said Judith and Rachael, and the children of the said Rachael, if any she shall have, and the decease of my said three sisters, depart this life before the said Naphthali Hart, leaving issue male of his body, that then and in such case my said trustees, &c., shall convey one moiety of my said real estates at Topsfield, and also convey, one moiety of all such other parts of my freehold and copyhold estates as shall then be remaining unsold, to trustees, to the use and behalf of the first and every other son and sons of the said Moses Hart, severally and successively in tail male, and in default of such issue remainder to the said Naphthali Hart for the term of his natural life, with remainder to his first and other sons severally and successively in tail male, and in default of such issue to my right heirs; and in case of such death in manner aforesaid of the said Moses Hart, before the said Naphthali Hart and his the said Moses Hart's leaving issue male; I do hereby direct and appoint that my said trustees, &c., shall and do lay out one moiety of my personal estate and effects, and of such money as shall have arisen by sale of my freehold and copyhold estates, directed as aforesaid to be sold (in case they should then have been sold), in the purchase of lands of inheritance, and convey the same to trustees to the like uses as I have hereinbefore directed one moiety of my said real estate at Topsfield to be conveyed and settled, on the issue of the said Moses Hart on the contingency aforesaid; [206] and I do hereby further direct and appoint, that if the said Naphthali shall, after the deaths of Judith and Rachael, and the children of Rachael, if any she shall have, and the decease of my said three sisters, depart this life before the said Moses Hart leaving issue male of his said body lawfully begotten; that then and in such case my said trustees, &c., shall convey one moiety of my said real estate at Topsfield, and also convey, one other moiety of all such other parts of my freehold and copyhold estates as shall be then remaining unsold, to trustees to the use and behoof of the first and every other son and sons of the said Naphthali Hart, severally and successively in tail male, and in default of such issue, remainder to the said Moses Hart for the term of his natural life, with remainder to his first and other sons severally and successively in tail male, and in default of such issue to my right heirs; and in case of such death in manner aforesaid of the said Naphthali before the said Moses Hart, and his the said Naphthali Hart's leaving issue male; I do hereby direct and appoint that my said trustees, &c., shall and do lay out one moiety of my personal estate and effects, and of such monies as shall have arisen by sale of my freehold and copyhold estates, directed as aforesaid to be sold, in case they should have been then sold, in the purchase of lands of inheritance, and convey the same to trustees to the like uses as I have hereinbefore directed; one moiety of my said real estates at Topsfield be conveyed and settled on the issue of the said Naphthali Hart on the contingency aforesaid: and in case the said Moses Hart and Naphthali Hart shall both die without leaving any issue male, or such issue male shall die without leaving issue male, that then and in such case my said trustees, &c., shall convey my said real estate at Topsfield, and all other my freehold and [207] copyhold estates which shall then remain unsold, unto such person or persons as shall at the death of the survivor of them the said Moses and Naphthali, be my right heir or right heirs, and shall in that case transfer, pay, and dispose of all my personal estate to and amongst such persons, and in such shares and proportions as they would by virtue of the Statute of Distribution of Intestates' Estates be respectively entitled unto in case I had died intestate.

The directions of this will, if applied to the events relating to Moses and Naphthali which happened, are, that the trustees should pay the surplus income to Moses and Naphthali, share and share alike, during their joint lives, and upon the death of Moses without leaving male issue in the lifetime of Naphthali, to pay the whole surplus income to Naphthali for life, and upon the death of both Moses and Naphthali without leaving issue male, that the trustees should convey the real estate to the testator's right heirs, and transfer and pay the personal estate to his next of kin.

As the heir at law and next of kin were not to take unless both Moses and Naphthali should die without leaving male issue, the testator must have intended such issue, if any such there had been, to take, and unless there are other parts of the will by which the estates are given directly to such male issue, the rules of law will upon this construction of the will give to the parents such estates as might enable the issue to take the interests intended for them.

It was argued in this case, that in the clauses of the will which precede the gift over, by which if at all the gift by implication is to be sustained, estates were directly given to the issues of Moses and Naphthali in such a manner as to exhaust the whole, and by that means to prevent the gift by implication.

In considering those clauses, it has appeared to me that the words "after the death of the said Judith and Rachael, and of the children of Rachael, and the decease of my said three sisters," which so frequently occur, do not import contingency, but are merely words of reference, shewing that the gifts then in course of expression were subject to the prior gifts, and not to have effect in possession till those prior gifts were satisfied or become inoperative; but there are other words in some of the same clauses which do seem to me to import contingency. There are four events or states of things which the testator seems to have distinctly contemplated with respect to Moses and Naphthali:—

1. Their joint lives; in this case they were to enjoy the surplus income share and share alike during the continuance of their lives.

2. The death of either of them without leaving any issue male, leaving the other surviving in this case (which happened), the survivor was to receive the whole surplus income for his life.

3. The death of either, in the lifetime of the other leaving issue male. This case is provided for by clauses distinctly applicable to Moses and Naphthali respectively, but the effect in terms applicable to either was that the trustees of the will were directed to convey and transfer one moiety of the real and personal estate to trustees for the issue of the nephew who died first, as to the real estate in tail male with remainder to the surviving nephew for life; with remainder to the issue [209] male of the surviving nephew; with remainder to the testator's right heirs. Neither of the two clauses which thus provide for a moiety of the estate being settled on the issue male of the nephew dying first, makes any provision for the moiety which by the former clauses was given to the other nephew for life; and then comes the last case.

4. Both nephews dying without leaving issue male, or such issue male dying without leaving issue male. In this case there is a gift over to the heir and next of kin of the testator.

The testator having thus distinctly contemplated the event which happened, and having thereupon given the estate to his heir and next of kin, the gift ought to take effect, if consistent with the rules of law, and the intention appearing on the whole will, it can do so.

If the words which the testator used with reference to the event of Moses dying before Naphthali leaving issue male, and to the event of Naphthali dying before Moses leaving issue male, could be construed as merely referential, and not confined to the particular event provided for, it would follow that all the issue of both Moses and Naphthali were in every event provided for in the clauses which precede the gift over, and no estate tail would be implied from words in which the gift over is expressed; but it appears to me from the words used, and even from the care taken to repeat the words as applied to the case of Moses and Naphthali respectively, that the words must have their natural meaning, and be taken to provide only for the precise cases which are expressly described, and it seems as if the testator intending to provide, that in all events, the gift over should not take effect if there were any issue [210] male of either Moses or Naphthali, and doubting whether he had contemplated or provided for all the events which might happen, expressed the gift over in such a way as to comprise any issue male of Moses and Naphthali which might have been omitted. I think, therefore, that the words operate to create an estate tail by implication.

It is said, that even if this should be so as to one moiety, it is not so as to the other: but it appears to me, that as to this purpose no sufficient distinction can be made between the two. Naphthali as survivor was by direct gift tenant for life of the whole, and the gift over applies to the whole, and I think that the implication which arises as to a moiety must be held to arise as to the whole.

It is then said, that if any estate tail is to be implied it should not be in favour of Moses and Naphthali or either of them, but in favour of their issue male. In the consideration of the gift over, with a view to this question, it is to be observed, that although the testator has on different occasions throughout his will used the words issue and children synonymously, yet that, except in the particular cases specified, there is no direct gift either to children or issue, and consequently, that the issue of children must take through children, and that the children, if at all, take through their parents by an implied gift to them. The case differs materially from those which were cited. In Lewis v. Waters (6 East, 336) there was an expressed gift to the first and other sons and their heirs, and the words "such issue" were construed to refer to the heirs of the sons. In the case of Ginger v. White (Willes, 348) there were express gifts to all the [211] male children successively, and to their heirs, and then to the female children and their heirs; and the words "such issue" were construed to refer not to the issue of the parent generally, but to such issue as he had mentioned before. In the present case the sons or issue of Moses and Naphthali do not appear to have given to them any estate capable of being affected by implication arising upon the construction of the gift over.

It is lastly said, that although this may be an estate in tail in Naphthali if the will is conceived to contain only legal or equitable limitations; yet that upon the true construction of the will, the trusts are executory, and ought to be carried into effect by this Court according to the manifest intention, which was, to give the estates to the heir, in default of issue male of Moses and Naphthali.

That some of the trusts were executory is plain; whether Moses or Naphthali died first, leaving issue male, there was to be a conveyance of a moiety to the trustees; but as to the other trusts, it does not appear that any discretion was given, or that any act was required to give the cestuis que trust the beneficial interest intended. Acts were required to be done, to place the property in the condition in which the testator intended it to be enjoyed, but the trusts and limitations upon which the questions in this cause arise seem to be expressly declared; and it does not appear to me that this Court has any authority to interfere with their legal effect.

On the whole, therefore, I concur with the opinion of the Judges of the Court of Common Pleas; and it [212] does not appear to me that I ought to send the case to the same, or any other Court, for further consideration.

Mr. Pemberton called the attention of the Court to the fact, that the bill applied both to freehold and leasehold estate, and that a different construction might possibly prevail as to the latter; but

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS said, that the will gave an estate tail in the freeholds, and consequently an absolute interest in the leaseholds.

[Cf. Glover v. Reynolds, 1867, 16 L. T. 113.]

Two parties claimed a real estate under different wills, the validity of which were in controversy. An action being brought against the tenant by one of the claimants, he filed his bill of interpleader against both claimants, and obtained an injunction on bringing his rent into Court. Some delay having occurred in getting in the answer of one of the Defendants, the other, who had filed his answer, moved to dissolve the injunction, and have the rent paid out to him. The answer of the other Defendant having been filed before the motion came on, the Court, on the motion, directed an issue to determine the rights of the Defendants, and continued the injunction on the tenant continuing to pay his rent into Court.

Peter Rainer died in 1837, seized in fee of some chambers in the Albany, which had been let by him to the Plaintiff. He left two wills, dated respectively in 1836 and 1837, and which were contested in the Ecclesiastical Court. The Defendants Deare and Mayhew claimed under the former, and the Defendants Elwyn and wife under the latter. In September 1837 the Ecclesiastical Court decided in favour of the latter, but an appeal from this decision was pending in the Privy Council.

Mr. Elwyn gave notice to the Plaintiff not to pay his rent to Deare and Mayhew; the latter, in consequence [214] of the Plaintiff's refusal to pay, commenced an action against him for the recovery of the rent.

The Plaintiff, Townley, on the 15th of January 1838, filed a bill of interpleader against Deare, Mayhew, and Mr. and Mrs. Elwyn; and upon the usual affidavit he obtained an order to pay £120, the arrears of rent, into Court, and an injunction to restrain the proceedings against him at law. The Defendants all appeared, and on the 30th of May 1838 Deare and Mayhew put in their answer. On the 27th of July 1839 they gave notice to dismiss for want of prosecution, and on the following day the Plaintiff filed a replication.

No answer having been put in by Elwyn and wife, the Defendants Deare and Mayhew, on the 27th of July 1839, gave notice of motion to dissolve the injunction with costs, so far as regarded them; and that the £120 cash in Court might be paid out to them. The answer of Elwyn and wife was put in on the 30th of July 1839, and the motion now came on.

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. James Parker, in support of the motion, contended, that as the Plaintiff had evinced very great delay in getting in the answer of Elwyn and wife, the Defendants Deare and Mayhew were warranted by the authority of Hyde v. Warren (19 Ves. 322) in moving to dissolve the injunction, and to have the money paid out to them, Stevenson v. Anderson (2 V. & B. 407); and that, at all events, the Court ought now to put the right in a train of enquiry, by directing an issue at law. (The Thames and Medway Canal Company v. Nash, 5 Sim. 280.)

[215] Mr. Tinney and Mr. Young, for the Plaintiff, argued that there had been no collusion or neglect on the part of the Plaintiff.

Mr. Loftus Wigram, for Elwyn and wife, did not object to the injunction being dissolved, but resisted the payment of the fund in Court to the other Defendants; he contended that as the value of the property was small, it would be wholly spent in the trial of an issue, which he therefore opposed.

Mr. Pemberton, in reply.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. In this case the bill is filed by the Plaintiff, a lessee of a portion of the real estate of the testator. The rent which became due from him having been claimed by persons claiming under two devises, the only question lies between the Defendants; and is this, which is the valid will? which of the two wills confers the right to this property?

The Plaintiff, being the lessee, and having claims made on him by two persons, files this bill of interpleader in the ordinary way, desiring to be protected; and he has made the ordinary affidavit of there being no collusion. The bill being filed in January 1838, one of the parties filed his answer in May 1838, but the other Defendants did not answer till July 1839. In the meantime, an injunction was obtained restraining both parties from proceeding, and an order was also obtained that the Plaintiff should pay his rent into Court, which he has done. On the 27th of July last, the answer of the other Defendants not having been put in, the Defendants who had answered gave notice of this motion to dissolve the injunction, and to have the money in Court paid out, and the rents paid to them.

[216] It is to be observed, that in all cases of interpleader the Plaintiff, to a certain extent, admits the right of each of the Defendants as against himself, and he undertakes the duty of bringing the Defendants into controversy to ascertain their rights; not having done this, the Plaintiff has been guilty of such negligence as might have deprived him of protection against the party whose right, as against himself, he admits by the fact of filing the bill of interpleader. It appears, however, that after the notice of motion was given, the answer of the other Defendants was put in, and then for the first time the parties are really brought into conflict. The circumstance of the remaining answer having been put in, pending the notice of motion, makes a great difference; for although the Defendant was right, when he gave the notice of motion, in consequence of the negligence of the Plaintiff, yet when the answers are all put in another question arises, namely, how can the matter in litigation be best decided? I think, notwithstanding the argument to the contrary, I have known bills of interpleader brought to a hearing, but never without observations falling from the Court as to why the matter had not in an earlier stage been put in a train of investigation. However, in this case, both parties have now put in their answers; both claim the money in Court; and an application being made to pay the money to the parties making this motion, the question is, whether I have not jurisdiction to put the matter in a course of enquiry; and if so, how can it be best effected? I think I have such jurisdiction, and that the question in this case being, who is entitled to the testator's real estate, it can be properly determined only by means of an issue.

The Defendants must, therefore, proceed to an issue devisavit vel non; the Elwyns being Plaintiffs, and Deare and Mayhew Defendants; and the Plaintiff must continue to pay his rent into Court. I make no order as to costs on this occasion, but will give liberty to the parties to apply.

It is said that though the right to the personal estate only can be determined by the Ecclesiastical Court, yet as the real estate is of comparatively small value, the question respecting it will virtually be settled by the same decision; but that can only be so by arrangement.

I recollect a case of Dew v. Clarke (1 Sim. & St. 108; and 5 Russ. 163), in which the father of Mrs. Dew had a large personal estate, but a very small real estate; there was litigation in every Court into which it could be carried; the Plaintiff, Mrs. Dew, was successful in maintaining that the will was invalid as to the personal estate, but she could not establish her right to the real estate without an action, and to avoid the trial she gave up her claim to the real estate altogether. (NOTE.—14th Nov. 1840. The Lord Chancellor refused with costs a motion, by way of appeal, of Elwyn and wife.)

Disapproval of the practice of advancing money out of funds in Court, to enable parties to try an issue directed by the Court.

An issue being directed which was to be conducted on one side by persons not parties to the cause, the Court refused to direct the depositions and affidavits used in the cause of witnesses who had since died, to be read on the trial of the issue.

Where an issue is directed by the Court, and the Plaintiff makes default in going to trial, it will be taken pro confesso against him, unless reasonable cause for the neglect be shewn.

A negotiation for a compromise held, in such a case, to be a reasonable cause.

The object of this suit was to administer the real and personal estate of Robert Marshall, the testator, who died in Jamaica in 1820. The residuary and some other legatees having died in the testator's lifetime, it became necessary to ascertain who, in the character of next of kin, and heir at law, were entitled to the undisposed-of real and personal estate of the testator.

The Plaintiffs claimed to be sole next of kin.

A reference had been made to the Master to ascertain the next of kin and heir at law, in which certain other persons, not parties to the cause, came in before the Master, and claimed to be the next of kin, as related to the testator in a nearer degree of propinquity than the Plaintiffs. The Master, however, reported that the Plaintiffs were the only next of kin. The other claimants took exceptions to his report, which came on for argument.

Mr. J. Anderson, in support of the exceptions.

Mr. Pemberton, for the executors.

Mr. Kindersley, Mr. Turner, and Mr. Parry, for the Plaintiffs.

Mr. Stuart and Mr. Moor, for a party claiming to be heir at law.

[219] THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS, after argument, which turned principally on the evidence, directed an issue to ascertain who were the next of kin and heir at law, and he ordered the new claimants to be Plaintiffs in the issue.

The Plaintiffs in the cause afterwards presented a petition to have a sum of £500 paid to them out of the funds in Court, for the purpose of enabling them to defend the issue. They contended, that having been found to be next of kin by the Master, they had a prima facie case, and also that they had been placed in the situation of executors defending the estate, and ought consequently to be indemnified.

Peck v. Beechey (2 Sim. 40), Gregg v. Taylor (4 Russ. 279), were cited for the Plaintiffs; and Nye v. Maule (4 Myl. & C. 343) contra.

June 25. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. The parties on whose behalf this application is made have produced before the Master a great deal of very important evidence, and have succeeded before him in establishing their claim; he has accordingly found in their favour. Having myself examined the whole of the evidence, I am perfectly aware of its importance; and if the application could be granted, consistently with the principles and the caution with which this Court finds it its duty to act, it would certainly be a satisfactory thing to myself personally if I could comply with this application. That feeling is very much strengthened by the strong sense I have of the great [220] hardship imposed upon persons who have to establish their claim at so great an expense as must have been incurred in such a case as this. But the question here is, whether there is in Court a sum which I judicially know to be properly applicable to the purpose for which it is asked; and I confess the way in which it is brought before me leaves me in very great doubt upon that subject; there being a doubt in my mind, I conceive it to be inconsistent with my duty so to dispose of this fund. There is a fund in Court; but there is nothing to enable me to know judicially that ultimately the fund will properly be applicable to this purpose, especially having regard to the doubt which exists as to the right of these parties.

The case of Gregg v. Taylor (4 Russ. 279) has naturally and properly been pressed upon me. It is said to be a case in circumstances precisely similar to the present. I confess after hearing that case, that I have very considerable doubt as to the principle upon which it was founded. It has been over and over again stated to me, that these parties are defending an issue which the Court has directed; and upon that ground I have been asked to shew favour and indulgence to them. It is said (but how far correctly I think is worthy of some consideration) that evidence has been produced which satisfied the Master; the same evidence, contrasted with the other evidence which has been produced in the cause, has not so far satisfied me as to enable me to say I can confirm the Master's report. What interest has the Court, or has justice, to say that either of these parties ought to be preferred to the other in the future prosecution of the case? It rests upon this, that the case is doubtful. There has been, in [221] the opinion of the Master, a preponderance of evidence on one side, and I will not say there may not be a bias in my own mind upon that subject; but still the preponderance is not such as to enable me to say that the case is not doubtful, and ought not to be subjected to a further investigation. As far therefore as I can form an opinion upon that subject, justice is in no way concerned in saying that either party ought to have a preference over the other. The matter is to be subjected to an investigation, and that investigation must take place between these parties in the usual form.

With regard to the policy of making advancements of money for these purposes, I must say that I think the policy of giving that species of advantage to one party or the other extremely doubtful; if you advance money to one party, and leave the other to struggle with poverty, I cannot think you are promoting the ends of justice. I concur also in the observation of my Lord Chancellor in Nye v. Maule, that such advancements have the effect of inducing parties to indulge in idle litigation. Having regard to the state of this fund, and the uncertainty of the claims that are made, it does not appear to me that I can safely, and consistently with the principles upon which the Court usually acts, order the advance here required.

I am therefore under the necessity of refusing this application with costs.

The Plaintiffs in the cause also made an application to the Court to be at liberty to read the depositions taken upon commission in the cause, and affidavits taken ex parte and used in the Master's office, of witnesses who had died in the interim. On this point, [222] THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS said, I have caused enquiries to be made with respect to orders of this sort, and I believe a very extensive search has in consequence been made by the registrars. They have not been able to find any case in which, upon an issue of this kind, an order has been made for reading on the trial of an issue between persons, all of whom were not parties to the record, depositions which were taken between those persons only who were parties to the record; and it appears to me, that, according to the practice, such an order cannot properly be made.

It is true that in some cases this Court finds it necessary to order evidence to be received, which, without such an order, would be rejected by a Court of law; but the circumstances of this case do not appear to me to make it necessary or proper to direct any evidence, which may not be legal evidence, to be received, and this application must also be refused.

Feb. 18, 1841. A further point subsequently arose in the cause.

The issue had been directed to be tried at the then next ensuing Summer Assizes for Newcastle, which were held in August 1840. After the terms of the issue had been finally settled, the Plaintiffs made an offer of compromise, which was accepted by the person claiming to be heir at law, but rejected by the person claiming to be next of kin. The latter not having gone to trial with his issue at the Summer Assizes, the Plaintiffs in the cause moved that the issue should be taken pro confesso against him. In support of this motion, they contended that a Plaintiff in an issue directed by the Court of Chancery was not at liberty to commit one default in not going to trial; and that if he allowed the [223] time at which the trial was directed by the Court to take place to pass, the Defendants were entitled to have the issue taken pro confesso. Casborne v. Barsham, L. C. 21 March 1840.

On the other hand, it was contended, that all that was decided in Casborne v. Barsham was, that the Plaintiff in an issue was not entitled as of right to pass over the assizes at which it was directed to be tried; but he might justify himself by shewing reasonable cause for not going to trial. That the negotiation for a compromise was such reasonable cause.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS said, that the case of Casborne v. Barsham, having established that an issue might be adversely taken pro confesso against a party who appeared and was willing to go to trial, but had once made default, it must be followed as a precedent. That the rule, however, was not without exception; and if the Plaintiff in the issue could shew such cause for not going to trial, as in the opinion of the Court appeared reasonable, the rule would not apply. That the negotiation for the compromise was in his Lordship's opinion reasonable cause, as the parties could not be expected to prepare for trial while such a negotiation was pending.

The motion was refused with costs.

[224] STRICKLAND v. STRICKLAND. Feb. 15, 1840.

A bill was filed to establish a will as to real estate. It set forth the will, and stated that it had been proved in the proper Ecclesiastical Court, and it contained an allegation of a pretence on the part of the Defendant, that the will had been altered, whereas it charged the contrary, and that the will was executed in several parts, one copy of which was in the possession of the testator at his death unaltered. The Defendant put in a plea, stating that the will as proved did not contain certain passages; and from which it attempted to draw the conclusion that the bill was defective for want of parties. There was no answer accompanying the plea. Held, that the plea was irregular in point of form.

The bill stated the will and codicil of the testator, under which, in the events stated, the Plaintiff claimed to be entitled to a life-estate in certain premises, and it stated that the will had been duly proved in the proper Ecclesiastical Court. It also contained an allegation of a pretence made by the Defendant that the testator had altered his will and codicil by striking out certain stated limitations, and it charged the contrary, and "that the testator duly executed several parts of the said will and codicil as the same were thereinbefore set forth; and that his execution of each and every part thereof was duly attested for passing real estate by devise; and that if it were the fact that there was any striking out or altering of any portion, either of the said will or first codicil as thereinbefore stated, the same appeared in one part only of the said will and first codicil," and that the other parts which were in the testator's own custody at his death were entire and undefaced, and that, if any part had been defaced, the same was not done by the testator.

The bill prayed for the establishment of the will, and a declaration that the Plaintiff was entitled for life to the real estate in question, and consequential relief.

The Defendant put in a plea stating "that the first codicil, as in the said bill was mentioned, duly proved in the proper Ecclesiastical Court, as the first [225] codicil to the will of Sir George Strickland the testator, did not appear to contain either of the following passages [stating them]." The conclusion attempted to be drawn by the plea was, that the bill was defective for want of parties. The plea was not accompanied by any answer.

Mr. Kindersley and Mr. Shadwell, for the plea, argued that it appeared from the plea, that the passages in question were not contained in the testator's will; in which case the bill was defective for want of parties.

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Bethell, contra, raised many objections to the plea in point of form, and amongst them, that the will which the plea alleged not to contain the passages in question was the will proved in the Ecclesiastical Court; that the question here related to real estate, and it was therefore quite immaterial in what terms the will had been proved in the Ecclesiastical Court, which had no jurisdiction in questions relating to real estate.

Mr. Kindersley, in reply. The Plaintiff states the will to have been proved in the Ecclesiastical Court, and the plea, properly enough, identifies that will as the will stated to be proved in the Ecclesiastical Court, and negatives the existence in it of the passages in question. Doe dem. Burtonshaw v. Gilbert (Cowper, 49) was cited.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale] was of opinion that the plea could not be sustained in point of form. That the plea did not negative the fact alleged, namely, that the will and codicil were as stated in the bill, but traversed the fact of the copy proved in the Ecclesiastical Court [226] being so. That the question here was, what was the will to be established in this Court in respect of the real estate, and not what will had been proved in the Ecclesiastical Court.

His Lordship also said, that the plea required proper averments to lead to the conclusion attempted to be deduced.

[226] WHITLEY v. MARTIN. March 4, 1840.

Letters proved in the cause, but not referred to in the pleadings are inadmissible in evidence, even on the question of costs.

The only question in this case was, who ought to pay the costs of the suit, as to which

Mr. G. Richards, as a ground for charging the Defendant with the costs of the suit, proposed to read letters which had passed before the institution of the suit shewing that the Defendant had refused to furnish accounts.

Mr. Anderdon admitted that the letters had been proved in the cause, but he stated that they had not been referred to in the pleadings.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale] said he could not take this evidence into his consideration, as the Plaintiff had in no way called these letters to the attention of the Defendant, or given him the least opportunity of explaining them. (See Howell v. George, 1 Mad. 1.)

[227] PALMER v. WAKEFIELD. March 20, 1840.

A testator appointed two trustees, and gave them a power of making advancements to his children; and he directed if either declined to act, a new trustee should be appointed. One alone (the mother of the children) acted, and made, as was alleged, advancements without the concurrence of the other trustee, or the appointment of a new trustee. Held, that the proper discretion had not been exercised, and that no enquiries could be directed as to the alleged advancements with a view to their being allowed.

A widow was absolutely entitled to legacies of £3500, of which her husband by his will professed to give to her and her children £2500, which he directed to be invested in the funds or real securities. He gave his widow other benefits out of his own property. The widow received the money, and invested it in the funds, but treating it as her own, she afterwards sold it out, and applied it to her own use. A case of election arose on the will, but it did not appear when she had elected. Held, that the widow electing to take under the will was responsible for £2500 only, and not for the stock purchased therewith.

Liability of husband for the breach of trust of his wife before marriage.

The testator Richard Palmer, being entitled in right of Elizabeth his wife (now the wife of the Defendant Wakefield) to two legacies of £3000 and £500 each, which had not been reduced into possession, by his will, dated in 1807, bequeathed to his wife Elizabeth, the sum of £1000 part of these legacies, "and he gave and bequeathed the sum of £2500, being the remainder of the aforesaid legacies amounting to £3500, as aforesaid, and the interest that should become due thereon until the principal should be paid, unto his said wife, and to his brother the Rev. John Palmer, their executors and administrators, upon trust to lay out and invest the same in or upon some or one of the public stocks or funds, or upon Government or real securities, in their names at interest, with power to vary and transfer such stocks, funds, and securities for others of a similar nature until the same, or the money thereon to be invested, should become transferable and assignable under the trust thereafter declared concerning the same; and he declared that his said wife and brother, and the survivor of them, or other the trustees or trustee for the time being of his said will, should stand possessed of the stocks, funds, and securities after the said sum of £2500 should be so invested as aforesaid, and of said sum of £2500 in the meantime, in trust to pay to and permit and suffer his said [228] wife or her assigns to receive the interest, dividends, and annual produce thereof during her life for her and their own use; and from and immediately after her decease in trust for all and every his present and future children by his said wife that should be living at his decease or born in due time afterwards in equal shares," &c. The testator devised all his freehold, copyhold, and leasehold estates to his wife and brother upon similar trusts. The will contained a clause, whereby the testator declared and directed that it should be lawful for the trustees or trustee for the time being of his will after the decease of his said wife, and also during her life with her consent, to levy and raise by mortgage, sale, transfer, or other disposition of the presumptive or expectant shares of his said children, of and in the therein aforesaid stocks, funds, securities, and trust estates, or any part thereof, any sum or sums of money not exceeding the sum of £600 for any one child towards the maintenance and education of his said children, or towards placing out his said children in any profession, trade, or employment, or otherwise for their advancement or benefit, notwithstanding such children should not have attained vested interests; and the testator directed new trustees to be appointed if the said Elizabeth Palmer and John Palmer, or either of them, or any future trustees or trustee, should die or refuse or decline to act, and he appointed his wife sole executrix and guardian of his children.

The testator died in 1808, leaving his wife and six infant children surviving, the eldest of whom was then about sixteen years of age; his will was proved by his widow alone; she thenceforward enjoyed the testator's property devised and bequeathed to her for life. John Palmer, the testator's brother, survived the testator, and died in 1817, and (as was stated in the bill and answer) without having acted in the trusts.

[229] In March 1816 Elizabeth Wakefield, the widow, received the sums of £3000 and £500, and on the 28th of March 1816 she invested the same in her own name in the purchase of £3878, 2s. 4d. Navy 5 per cents. This sum was afterwards converted into £3228, 18s. 9d. 4 per cents., and was sold out by her in different sums in the years 1827, 1829, and 1830, through the intervention of the Defendant Thomas Wakefield; the produce was received by him and applied in the reimbursement of advances made by him to Elizabeth Palmer.

In October 1831 Elizabeth Palmer married the Defendant Thomas Wakefield, and on their marriage a settlement was made on him of the property devised by the testator's will. A separation took place between Defendant Wakefield and his wife, and in 1835 the testator's children filed this bill against Thomas Wakefield and Elizabeth his wife, to compel them to replace the stock which might have been purchased with the £2500. The bill alleged that a case of election had arisen under the testator's will, and that Elizabeth, the widow of the testator, had elected to take under the testator's will; it also alleged that Thomas Wakefield, both when the stock was sold out, and on his marriage, had notice of the trusts of the fund.

Thomas Wakefield, who appeared separately from his wife, denied all notice of the trust; none was proved against him further than the constructive notice which might arise from the marriage settlement.

The Defendant, by his answer, insisted that the legacies belonged absolutely to his wife, and that if any case of election did arise, no election had been made; he further said "he believed that the Plaintiffs had, in fact, long since had and received from Elizabeth [230] Wakefield the full benefit to which they would have been entitled from such bequest; for he said that Elizabeth Wakefield remained unmarried from the death of her first husband, in 1807, to October 1831, when she intermarried with the Defendant; and that during that period the Defendant believed that she not only maintained and educated the Plaintiffs, her children, but also advanced considerable sums of money in placing out the Plaintiffs, her sons, and on the marriage of the Plaintiffs, her daughters; and that the sums of money paid and applied by her for the purposes aforesaid, were fully equal to the shares of the Plaintiffs, her children, of and in the sum of £2500 in the testator's will mentioned to be bequeathed to them out of the legacies of £3000 and £500."

At the original hearing of the cause, in 1838, it was referred to the Master to enquire whether Elizabeth Wakefield, before her marriage, had elected to take the benefits given by the testator's will; the Master found in the affirmative.

The cause now came on for further directions, when

Mr. Kindersley and Mr. Koe, for the Plaintiffs, asked for a decree against the Defendants to replace the amount of stock in which the £2500 had been invested, with costs, contending that the Defendant Wakefield had constructive notice of the breach of trust committed by his wife, and, moreover, that he was responsible for the liabilities of his wife at the time of the marriage.

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Wilbraham, for the Defendant Mr. Wakefield, contended that the Defendant was not affected by notice of the trusts, and, if responsible, was responsible for the £2500 sterling only; and further [231] that from this sum the amount advanced by Mrs. Wakefield to her children for their maintenance and advancement (being ascertained by a further enquiry), ought to be deducted.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale] (after stating the principal circumstances of the case) said, I think that as Mr. Wakefield on his marriage obtained from his wife a conveyance of the interest in the real estate which she took under the will of her first husband, he must be assumed to have had notice of its contents at that time, but there is not the slightest evidence to shew that he was acquainted therewith at the time when the stock was sold. I apprehend, therefore, that the circumstance of his being employed by Mrs. Palmer, as an agent to procure the sale of that stock, in no way affected him with the knowledge of the will. Some time after the second marriage, Mr. and Mrs. Wakefield separated, and Mr. Wakefield being then called upon to make good the stock which the legacies would have purchased if invested when first received, his wife, who was the person by whom and for whose benefit it was sold, and who had used it, appears, upon the hearing of this cause, separately from her husband, saying, she makes no objection to the relief which the Plaintiff seeks. This certainly is one of those cases which can never be contemplated without great pain. The law is rigid, and in respect of breaches of trust must compel parties to perform their duty; but in this case we find the children, educated and maintained by the mother, out of her means and not out of any fortune or property of their own, many years after they have attained the age of twenty-one years, and after a separation between their mother and her second husband, come and demand a restoration of this stock, and resisting the slightest allowance in respect of the [232] benefits which they, from time to time, received from her during the period in which she was applying her own means for their maintenance. It is fit, I think, to advert to these proceedings, though my judgment must not in the least be guided by considerations of that nature. In cases of breaches of trust the law must be rigidly applied, however hard it may press in particular cases.

A question was made whether, under this will, a case of election arose. It appears to me there clearly did. It was referred to the Master to enquire whether she had elected; and the Master has found that she has. Having elected, it was her duty, as I conceive, to treat the money originally belonging to her, but of which the testator assumed the right of disposing, as a legacy given by the will and subject to the trusts contained in the will; she must be taken to have known the right, and ought to have performed her duty, and I think that she must be considered as owing that money from the time when it came into her hands. She appears, however, not to have considered herself subject to any duty, but to have treated the money as her own. She had the option in what sort of security she would invest it, and might have invested it upon real security, and the rights of the parties would have been fully satisfied by the production of the principal sum of £2500 given by the testator in this case; and, looking at the circumstances of this case, I do not think that I am acting at all contrary to the rules which this Court has adopted, when I say, that the sum for which she was answerable was the sum of £2500, the principal money; she became answerable for it, in respect of what must be considered as her breach of trust, because, upon her election, it became trust money. Having become answerable [233] for it, she married Mr. Wakefield, and it was by the marriage, and by his assuming the liabilities to which she was subject, that he also, as I think, became liable to pay it, notwithstanding he is called upon to make good that liability by these children, who are aided in doing so by the mother, who, before her marriage, applied this money to her own use as she thought fit. The children, nevertheless, who are the objects of the trust, and entitled to the benefit of that which the testator intended to give them, have a right to call upon him to make good that sum.

The next question which has been raised is, whether any allowance is to be made. There is a proviso in the will, giving the trustees a power to apply sums of money, to the extent of £600 for each child, for their maintenance, education, or advancement. Could anybody do it but the trustees? Did the testator intend that this discretionary power should be vested in anybody but the trustees? I must say that it is with great regret that I come to the conclusion that the trustee, not having been here introduced, because the lady applied the money herself, and without applying to Mr. J. Palmer to act as trustee, there was not that discretion in the application of this money which was necessary under all the circumstances in this case. It happened that this lady, thinking herself the absolute owner of this property, applied what she considered her own monies for the maintenance of the children. She might, by the assistance of the trustee or of this Court, have had the money applied for them; and the question is, whether, after so many years, we can review the matter, and say, she ought to be allowed this sum. I am much afraid, according to the rules which have been adopted, we cannot.

[234] Considering that the suit has other objects than the relief in respect of the breach of trust, the decree must be against the Defendant, Mr. Wakefield, without costs.

One of the presumptive next of kin assigned the share to which he might become entitled in the personal estate of a lunatic who was then living, on trust to pay the costs, and any sums which might be advanced for the purposes of the trust, then to pay an annuity to the assignee, and afterwards to pay his debts. No creditor was party to the deed. The trustees made some payments in advance. On the death of the lunatic, the trustees of the deed filed a bill against the administrator and the assignor for payment of the assignor's share, alleging that the assignor was desirous that it should be paid to them. Held, that a general demurrer by the administrator could not be supported on these allegations, and semble that there was a sufficient consideration for the deed.

This was a general demurrer to a bill, which in substance stated as follows :—

William Blake became a lunatic in August 1833, being possessed of a sum of £11,403 consols.

After his lunacy, and in January 1834, Sir Francis Blake, who was one of the brothers and presumptive next of kin of the lunatic, by a deed made between himself of the one part, and the Plaintiffs who were trustees of the other part, conveyed and assigned to the Plaintiffs all his real estate, and all the part, share, and interest in the said sum of £11,403 consols, and of any other monies belonging to the said William Blake, the brother of the said Sir Francis Blake, and a lunatic, to which he the said Sir F. Blake should or might become entitled upon the decease of the said W. Blake as his next of kin, or as one of his next of kin, whether such part, share, or interest should be a third or a moiety, or a greater part, share, or interest, with a power of attorney and covenant [235] for further assurance; and by an indenture of even date, and made between the same parties, the trusts were declared to be in the first place to pay the costs, charges, and expenses, and any sums they might advance for the purposes of the trust, in the next place to pay to Sir F. Blake an annuity of £500 a year, and then for payment of his debts.

It did not appear that any creditors were parties to this transaction.

The lunatic died in 1838, leaving Sir F. Blake the Defendant Robert D. Blake, and Mrs. Stag, his next of kin, who became entitled to his personal estate; administration was granted to R. D. Blake, who possessed himself of the personal estate.

This bill was filed by the trustees of the creditor deed against R. D. Blake the executor, Mrs. Stag, and Sir F. Blake, to obtain payment of the share of Sir F. Blake.

The bill stated that the Plaintiffs had paid, for the purposes of the trust, more than they had received, and that there was then due to them on the balance of account the sum of £1806; and it also stated that they had made application for payment to R. D. Blake, the administrator, which he refused to make; and that Sir F. Blake was desirous that the one-third of the said sum of £11,100 consols should be paid to them upon the trusts of the deed.

To this bill R. D. Blake filed a demurrer for want of equity.

Mr. Tinney and Mr. Lovat, in support of the demurrer, contended that there was no valid assignment [236] of this property, it being at the time a mere possibility, and that nothing passed to the trustees. Fearne Cont. Rem. 549, Wright v. Wright (1 Ves. sen. 409). That the deed was inoperative, no creditors being parties to it.

Walwyn v. Coutts (3 Mer. 707), Garrard v. Lord Lauderdale (3 Sim. 1; and 2 Russ. & Myl. 451), Colyear v. The Countess of Mulgrave (2 Keen, 81).

Mr. Purvis (in the absence of Mr. Pemberton), in support of the bill. In equity a possibility is assignable for valuable consideration, Metcalf v. The Archbishop of York (1 Myl. & Cr. 547); and the payment of the debts and of the costs incurred by the trustees form a sufficient consideration; besides which, it must be taken to be the fact that Sir F. Blake is desirous that the amount should be paid to the Plaintiffs.

The deed contains a power of attorney, which, being coupled with an interest, is irrevocable until the money advanced has been repaid.

Mr. Tinney, in reply. In Metcalf v. The Archbishop of York there was an actual consideration at the time: here the deed is attempted to be supported by payments subsequently made.

If the subject-matter be not assignable, it matters not whether the assignor is desirous that payment should be made to the Plaintiffs or not; the question being whether, under the deed, they have in themselves such an interest as will enable them to maintain the suit.

[237] THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. The Defendant admits that he is the legal representative of William Blake, who died a lunatic possessed of personal estate, and that the next of kin of William Blake were Sir Francis Blake, R. D. Blake, and Mrs. Stag. It is admitted that the Defendant R. D. Blake, as the legal personal representative, has possessed himself of the estate, and that he must account for it to the next of kin, one of whom is Sir Francis Blake, but it is denied that the Plaintiffs have any right to sue.

William Blake, the intestate, became a lunatic in August 1833, and the Defendant Sir Francis, who was one of the presumptive next of kin at the time of the lunacy, executed two contemporaneous deeds, by one of which he assigned all his possible interest of the personal estate of the lunatic. The other was a declaration of trust: it recites that several debts were due from Sir F. Blake at the time, and the trusts are for payment of costs, and any sums which they might advance for the purposes of the trust, and then to pay Sir F. Blake an annuity of £700 a year, and afterwards to pay his debts. Sir Francis had no actual interest in the property of the lunatic at the time, but he might have, if living, at the lunatic's death. It is admitted that the deed was executed; but the objections taken are, first, that there was no proper subject of assignment, because the assignor had only a possibility, and secondly, that there was no sufficient consideration for the deed.

The money is payable to Sir Francis Blake, or those claiming under him; the Plaintiff alleges, and it is admitted by the demurrer, that Sir Francis Blake is desirous that payment should be made to the Plaintiffs; [238] and it is alleged and admitted by this record that the deed was executed by Sir F. Blake, and that monies have been expended by the trustees on the faith of it. I am inclined to think there is a sufficient consideration; but Sir F. Blake being admitted to be desirous that the money should be paid to the Plaintiffs, I think the demurrer must be overruled.

[238] Between ANN RYCROFT, the Wife of HENRY RYCROFT, and PAMELA RYCROFT, an Infant, by their Next Friend, Plaintiffs; and WILLIAM M. CHRISTY and HENRY RYCROFT, Defendants. June 15, 1840.

A feme covert made a disposition of property, as to which it was doubtful whether it was settled to her separate use. The husband disclaimed. Held, that whether separate property or not, the husband's disclaimer gave effect to the disposition of the wife.

A. B., the cestui que trust of money in the hands of a trustee, by deed, without consideration, directed part of the dividends to be paid by him for the maintenance of an infant, a stranger to A. B., and covenanted to indemnify him, and agreed to allow the same out of the dividends of the trust fund. The trustee accepted the new trust, and acted upon the deed. Held, that there was a valid executed trust created, which A. B. could not revoke.

The testator John Price, by his will, dated in 1831, bequeathed his personal estate to the Defendant William Miller Christy, on trust to sell and invest, and pay the dividends, &c., "unto, or permit the same to be received and taken by Ann Rycroft, then residing with him as his housekeeper, or her assigns, during her life, for her and their own absolute use and benefit," and after her decease in trust for his natural daughter Pamela by the said Ann Rycroft.

[239] The testator died in the same year, leaving Ann Rycroft and her daughter Pamela, and also another natural daughter by one Ann Elf.

William M. Christy proved the testator's will.

Ann Rycroft was a married woman, her husband being living at the death of the testator.

The daughter of Ann Elf being wholly unprovided for, Ann Rycroft, by an instrument dated the 21st of December 1831, and made between the Plaintiff Ann Rycroft of the one part, and William M. Christy of the other part, after reciting the will, and that the testator had another child by Ann Elf, and that it was his express wish and desire, although not stated in his will, that the said Ann Elf should be paid or allowed out of his estate 7s. a week for the maintenance and support of his said child by the said Ann Elf, as the said Ann Rycroft did thereby acknowledge; it was witnessed that, in order to carry into effect the wish and desire of the testator, Ann Rycroft did thereby direct W. M. Christy, out of the interest of £500, forming part of the produce of the estate of the testator secured by the warrant of attorney of one Richard Meeson, to pay 7s. a week to Ann Elf for the maintenance of her child until she should attain sixteen years. Ann Rycroft thereby covenanted to indemnify Christy in respect of such sum, and agreed to allow the same to Christy out of the dividends payable to her under the will. At the time of Ann Rycroft's executing the deed she was a married woman, having married the Defendant Henry Rycroft in 1811; they were then and were now living separate.

The trustee accepted the trusts of the deed of 1831, and acted upon it.

[240] In 1835 Ann Rycroft and her daughter filed a bill against her husband and Christy the trustee, for the administration of the estate. H. Rycroft, the husband, by his answer, disclaimed all interest in the funds.

By an order on further directions, it was referred to the Master "to inquire and state to the Court, whether the agreement in the answer of the Defendant W. M. Christy was binding on Ann Rycroft." The Master found in the affirmative.

The Plaintiff took an exception to the report, alleging that the Master ought to have found that the agreement was not binding on the Plaintiff. This exception now came on for argument.

Mr. C. P. Cooper, for the Plaintiff, contended that the words of the will did not create a separate estate in Mrs. Rycroft; Tyler v. Lake (2 Russ. & M. 183). That her deed, therefore, as a married woman, was inoperative, and could not become effectual by the subsequent disclaimer of her husband. That this was an executory and voluntary trust, which could not be enforced in this Court.

Mr. Tinney and Mr. Keene, contra, contended that the words used by the testator were sufficient to create a trust for the separate use of Mrs. Rycroft, who therefore became, as regarded the property, a feme sole, Prichard v. Ames (Turner & R. 222); and that if not, then that the effect of the disclaimer of her husband confirmed her previous disposition. That a valid executed trust had been created, which had become irrevocable and binding on the settlor, her husband and the trustee.

[241] Mr. Cooper, in reply.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. This case has been very ably argued by the counsel on both sides; and though I feel considerable difficulty, yet, on the whole, I cannot do otherwise than come to the same conclusion as the Master. The will gives the income to this lady and her assigns during her life, "for her and their own absolute use and benefit." I have, undoubtedly, very great difficulty in saying that, by the form of words contained in this will, the property is given to her for her separate use; when the circumstances are considered, it is very probable that the testator so intended it; but I cannot say that such is the effect of the words. At the testator's death, Mrs. Rycroft was living separate and apart from her husband; the income was at her disposal, to do as she pleased with it, for her husband, it appears, did not in any way concern himself therewith, and having afterwards been informed of the gift, he actually disclaimed all interest in it, and thus gave effect to that which his wife had done with it. The question, therefore, turns on that which Mrs. Rycroft had done in the meanwhile; she had executed this deed, which recites (upon what foundation in fact is not stated here) that it was the wish and intention of the testator, from whom she derived this income, that this child should be maintained and supported. What did she do? There was a sum of £500 in the hands of the trustee, to the income of which she was entitled, and which, when received, it was then the duty of the trustee to pay to Mrs. Rycroft; she executed an instrument which contains an express direction to Mr. Christy, the trustee, to pay a certain portion of that property to the child of Ann Elf. So far as Mrs. Rycroft had the power, she trans-[242]-ferred the trust from herself to the object she desired to be benefited, namely, to this child, and from the moment when that direction was signed and accepted by Christy, it became his duty to pay the sum directed to Ann Elf. This duty being imposed upon him, and there being no further instrument or formality to be executed, it became a trust binding on Mr. Christy to the extent of that direction. Then the question is, whether a trust, which is executed in this way, can be rendered executory back again by an accident which subsequently occurs, namely, by a transfer of this fund into Court? The duty which is once fixed is not to be changed by any circumstance which afterwards occurs. I do not think upon that part of the case there is any doubt, although there may be upon the other point; I think the Master's report ought to be confirmed.

[242] STRICKLAND v. STRICKLAND. August 5, 1840.

Where a Plaintiff, by amendment, abandons a part of his claim, and it appears he has in that respect acted vexatiously, the Court, on motion, will direct him to pay the costs thereby occasioned.

A Plaintiff having filed two bills, in which his claims were inconsistent, abandoned part of the relief originally asked. Held, that he had acted vexatiously, and he was ordered to pay the additional costs incurred by the abandoned claim.

The Plaintiff by his original bill claimed to be tenant for life of three estates which had been devised by the will of the testator, Sir George Strickland, to three different persons, with remainders over.

The Defendant having put in his answer, the Plaintiff amended his bill, by which he abandoned all claim to one of the three estates, which had been devised by [243] the testator to his son Charles. Though the amendments were not of any considerable length, yet a new engrossment of the bill had become necessary.

The Plaintiff, it appeared, had also filed a bill in the Vice-Chancellor's Court, in which (as was considered by the Master of the Rolls in this case) the claims of the Plaintiff were inconsistent with the claims which he put forward in this suit, i.e., he claimed under the will in this suit, and against it in the other.

It was now moved on the part of the Defendant, that the Plaintiff ought to pay all the costs of the original bill, and the costs of so much of the amended bill as related to the third estate.

Mr. Girdlestone and Mr. Shadwell, in support of the motion, cited Massarene v. Lydon (2 B. C. C. 291), Smith v. Smith (G. Cooper, 141), Bullock v. Perkins (1 Dickens, 110), Mavor v. Dry (2 Sim. & St. 113), and Monck v. The Earl of Tankerville (10 Sim. 284), and see Dent v. Wardel (1 Dickens, 339), Watts v. Manning (1 Sim. & St. 421), and Peel v. Cassens (1 Sa. & So. 176).

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Bethell, contra.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. I cannot help regretting that a motion of such a nature as the present should have been brought forward in this form. A great part of the motion is wholly groundless, and has been attempted to be sup-[244]-ported by reasoning which, if it were to prevail, would render it impossible to amend a bill with any, the least safety.

The Plaintiff has, by his bill, claimed estates which were originally devised by Sir George Strickland to three different persons. He has amended the bill, and continues his claim as to two estates, and has dropped his claim as to the third. It is said, and may be said truly, that if the claim which has been excluded from the amended bill had also been excluded from the original bill, the Defendant would have been spared some costs, both in the copy of the bill, and in answering these particular claims. That can hardly be otherwise on amending a bill, when any part of the relief is waived; but at the same time it is very advantageous for all parties, that where a Plaintiff finds he cannot sustain any part of his claim, he should abandon it at the earliest stage of the proceedings.

It is said that if a Plaintiff makes a claim, and strikes out the statement on which it is founded, the Court cannot, at the hearing, judge of the amount of expence occasioned thereby, as the matter is no longer on the record; there is that technical difficulty, but it is frequently overcome, and many cases have occurred in which relief in respect of costs has been given as to parts of the bill which have been abandoned; but is the Defendant to wait until the hearing of the cause, if vexatious amendments have been made? I have no doubt he is not, but is entitled to a speedier remedy. The question therefore comes to this, whether the Plaintiff has acted vexatiously.

As to the length of the amendments, there is nothing here to call for particular observation. I think there [245] is not, from quantity of matter, any proof of vexation. It is then said that the matter has been brought forward vexatiously, because, in another bill, the Plaintiff was asking relief quite inconsistent with his claim in this suit. I think, from the circumstances, that the claims are totally inconsistent; and the proceeding does, therefore, appear to be vexatious. All I can do, is to direct an inquiry what additional costs have been incurred by this claim, which has been abandoned. These costs must be taxed and ascertained; but I must refuse the costs of this application, on the ground that too much is asked by the notice of motion.

Extent of the jurisdiction of the Master of the Rolls to alter the enrolments of the specifications of patents.

Under the 5 & 6 W. 4, c. 83, a patentee by the authority of the Solicitor-General, entered a memorandum of alteration of the enrolment of the specification, and which it was alleged extended the patent and infringed upon another patent granted to the Petitioner. Held, that the Master of the Rolls had no jurisdiction to order such memorandum of alteration to be expunged.

On the 8th of October 1836 John Sharp obtained a patent for an alleged invention of machinery "for converting ropes into tow, and of improvements in machinery for preparing hemp or flax for spinning, part of which improvements were also applicable to the preparing of cotton, wool and silk for spinning." A specification of the invention was enrolled on the 8th of April 1837.

On the 31st of May 1838 the Petitioner, Joshua Wordsworth, obtained a patent for an alleged invention of improvements in machinery, "for heckling and dressing flax, hemp, and other fibrous materials."

[246] After the date of this patent, and before the specification of the Petitioner's invention had been enrolled, Mr. Sharp, in September 1838, obtained from the Solicitor-General an order or certificate, directed to the Clerk of the Patents, whereby it was certified that John Sharp had applied to the Solicitor-General for leave to enter with the Clerk of the Patents, certain memorandums of alteration of part of the specification of the invention for which letters patent had been granted to him; and that the Solicitor-General, on considering the said application, had directed the said John Sharp to advertise his said alterations in the London Gazette and certain other papers; that such advertisements had been duly made, and that no objection having been made to the said application, the Solicitor-General had accordingly granted leave to the said John Sharp to file his said memorandums, of alterations pursuant to the statute of the 6 W. 4, c. 83.

By this statute it is enacted, that any patentee may, if he think fit, enter with the Clerk of the Patents of England, "having first obtained the leave of His Majesty's Attorney-General or Solicitor-General in case of an English patent," certified by his fiat and signature, "a disclaimer of any part of either the title of the invention or of the specification, stating the reason for such disclaimer; or may with such leave as aforesaid, enter a memorandum of any alteration in the said title or specification, not being such disclaimer or such alteration as shall extend the exclusive right granted by the said letters patent; and such disclaimer or memorandum of alteration being filed by the said Clerk of the Patents, and enrolled with the specification, shall be deemed and taken to be part of such letters patent, or such specification in all Courts whatever." It then provides that any person shall have a right to enter a caveat, and be heard [247] before the Attorney or Solicitor-General, who before granting the fiat may require the disclaimer or alteration to be advertised.

The specification of the Petitioner's invention was enrolled on the 30th November 1838, before the Petitioner had been informed of the memorandum of alteration filed by Sharp.

The Petitioner Wordsworth now presented his petition to the Master of the Rolls, alleging that the machinery described in Sharp's memorandum of alteration, constituted a new machine, or arrangement of machinery, and extended the exclusive right granted by Sharp's patent; and was also in substance the same machinery which was invented by the Petitioner, and was described in his specification.

The petition prayed "That such portions of the said memorandums of alterations in the said specification of the 8th of April 1837, filed by Mr. Sharp, as were in substance descriptive of the same machinery, as was invented by the Petitioner, might be expunged from the memorandum of alterations and the Rolls of the Court," with costs.

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. James Russell, in support of the petition.

The alteration which has been made in the specification of the patent is such as the Act of Parliament does not warrant. The Act expressly provides that the alteration shall not extend the patent, but here it is extended in such a manner as to infringe upon the patent right of the Petitioner to his very great prejudice; from this he ought to be relieved.

[248] The statute provides that the alteration in the specification shall be taken as part of the letters patent in all Courts whatever; if this alteration, unwarranted by the statute, is to be considered as part of the records of the Court, then this Court has jurisdiction to expunge the irregular entry on its Rolls. The records of the different Courts have always been subject to their jurisdiction and authority, and if the Court finds they are not in the state they ought to be, it will correct them. In Redmond's case (5 Russ. 44) Sir J. Leach ordered an error in the enrolment of a specification to be corrected.

The Legislature could never have intended that the Attorney and Solicitor-General should have an uncontrolled authority to order any alteration whatever in a patent, or to direct any entry they pleased on the Rolls of the Court; for if they are to decide conclusively without giving parties, in whose absence they decide, the power of appealing, then, if the fiat of the Attorney-General were granted by fraud, accident or mistake, there would be no means of correcting the error. There is no other jurisdiction to which this application can be made, and if this Court ever had jurisdiction to correct its own records, it can only be taken away by express enactment; Attorney-General v. Aspinall (2 Myl. & Cr. 613), Attorney-General v. The Corporation of Norwich (2 Myl. & Cr. 430), Attorney-General v. The Corporation of Poole (4 Myl. & Cr. 17), and see Attorney-General v. Wilson (1 Cr. & Ph. 1); there is no exclusion of the jurisdiction of this Court in the statute in question, it must consequently still remain. The Court, therefore, has authority to control the dis-[249]cretion of the Attorney-General, and to judge whether, under the Act of Parliament, the memorandum is such as to be proper to be added to the record.

Again, the Attorney-General is only authorised to sanction such a memorandum as does not extend the patent. Here the memorandum does extend the patent. The Act of Parliament therefore does not apply, and the amendment may be treated as surreptitious, and as forming no part of the Rolls. It will be said, that in this view of the case, the Petitioner will not be prejudiced, as on the trial of an action at law, the fact will appear that the alteration was unwarranted; but the Act expressly provides that the alteration "shall be deemed and taken to be part of such letters patent or specification in all Courts whatever:" the altered specification will therefore be conclusive. Independently of this, the Petitioner has a right to try an action without these words; and as where a deed or other instrument forms a cloud over the title of a party, this Court will order it to be delivered up, so here the Court will relieve the Petitioner from the effects of an improper entry on the records of the Court made in his absence.

They cited Perry v. Skinner (2 Mes. & W. 471), in which it was held that where a patent is originally void, but amended under 5 & 6 W. 4, c. 83, by filing a disclaimer of part of the invention, that Act has not a retrospective operation, so as to make a party liable, for an infringement of the patent, prior to the time of entering such disclaimer.

Mr. M. D. Hill and Mr. Bacon, contra, contended that the Master of the Rolls had no jurisdiction to do that which was asked by the petition; that the alteration [250] was not even a record in its strict sense, and that, if it were, the Master of the Rolls, sitting as the Keeper of the Records, had no power to expunge the alteration sanctioned by the proper authority: for his jurisdiction, in this respect, was confined to the amendment of clerical errors only.

They admitted the principle laid down in the decisions on the Municipal Corporation Act, that an old jurisdiction was not excluded by the erection of a new tribunal; but contended, that before the Act relating to patents, this Court had, in reality, no jurisdiction whatever on the subject. That the right of disclaimer, and of effecting an alteration in the title in specification was a new creation, for the determination of the questions regarding which, the Legislature had created a special tribunal, from which there was no appeal to this Court; that if this Court could rehear the decision of the Solicitor-General, the same right applied to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council; that this petition was a mere contrivance for trying, all questions on alterations or disclaimers in patents, before the Master of the Rolls.

That no hardship existed, as in an action at law, a Defendant was not estopped by the statements in the patent, but might disprove the recitals therein that the invention was new and useful.

They also contended that the remedy, if any, was by scire facias, and not by petition to the Master of the Rolls.

Mr. Pemberton, in reply.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale] (after stating the circumstances). The Petitioner complains of this proceeding [251] as injurious to him, as it undoubtedly is, if the facts be as alleged; and he prays that such portions of the memorandum in Sharp's specification as are in substance descriptive of the machinery invented by the Petitioner, may be expunged from the memorandum of alterations and the Rolls.

The question now is, whether, supposing the facts to be as alleged, I have authority to do what is asked, and I am very clearly of opinion that I have not.

Patents for inventions are granted on condition of a specification of each invention being enrolled in a limited time, and except for the purpose of correcting mere verbal or clerical errors, proved to have arisen from mistake or inadvertence, I am of opinion that I have no authority to make any alteration in the enrolment of the patent or specification.

The party enrolling his specification does it at his own peril; and if in his specification he expresses something by which his patent is rendered invalid, he must submit to all the legal consequences; and those who have a right to take advantage of any error of his, must do so in a legal course: they cannot require the Keeper of the Records or Rolls to alter that which the patentee has claimed or disclaimed in his specification, and compel him, by such enforced alteration, to say something which he never intended to say.

There were very good reasons for relieving patentees from some of the risks and difficulties to which they were liable from errors in their specifications: and the statute 5 & 6 W. 4, c. 83 authorised disclaimers and memorandums of alteration to be filed and enrolled with the leave of the Attorney or Solicitor-General: and [252] enacted, that when filed and enrolled, the same should be deemed and taken to be part of such letters patent or specification, i.e., as the Act has been expounded (Perry v. Skinner, 2 Mees. & W. 471), shall be deemed and taken to be part of the letters patent or specification from the time of filing the memorandum of alteration.

And considering the memorandum of alteration as now being part of the specification, I conceive that it ought to be dealt with as such, and no otherwise.

If it were alleged that the enrolled memorandum of alteration, by mistake of the writer, contained verbal or clerical errors by means of which something was enrolled contrary to the true intent of the party, and if sufficient evidence were given of the fact, I should think myself authorised, by precedent, to correct the error and make the enrolment accord with the proved intention of the party at the time of the enrolment.

But it has never been supposed that the Master of the Rolls, as Keeper of the Records, had authority to permit or to order an erroneous claim to be expunged or amended. The party may have claimed too much, and thereby made his patent good for nothing, or may have omitted to claim something which he was justly entitled to; but on such grounds the Keeper of the Records could not interfere on his behalf or at his instance; and I apprehend that no attempt has ever been made to induce the Keeper of the Records to expunge by his authority some claim which the patentee desired to sustain, and was willing to defend in due course of law.

Under the late statute the disclaimer is not to be such as shall extend the exclusive right granted by the letters [253] patent. But the Keeper of the Records as such has no authority to decide whether there is any extension; nor has he, in that character, any means of investigating the truth and justice of the case. It is no part of his duty, when he receives the enrolment into his custody, to consider whether the Attorney or Solicitor-General has improperly given leave to file the memorandum, nor can he afterwards determine any such question.

I delayed my decision in this case for the purpose of inquiring what had heretofore been done in the amendment of enrolments in this Court; and from the information which I have received, it would seem that it has always been usual to amend clerical errors. When errors have been made in grants, as was said "per incuriam et ex mansi inadvertentiâ scriptoris," they have been amended by the Master of the Rolls; sometimes under the authority of a warrant from the Crown, sometimes with the consent of the Attorney-General, sometimes in consequence of a reference to him by the Lord Chancellor; and there is an instance of an amendment being made by an order of the Lord Chancellor, pursuant to an order of the king. The errors have been proved and rectified by comparison with the writ of Privy Seal, or with the signed bill, or with the original grant.

At an early period the enrolment of the acknowledgment of a deed was amended at the request of the grantor who had acknowledged it.

I have not been supplied with any early instance of amending the specification of a patent invention, but the recent instances of such amendments have been of this kind: In a case before Lord Gifford in 1824, the word "wire" had been written instead of "fire," and he ordered the specification to be amended. In the [254] case of Redmond, an erroneous transposition of numbers was amended by order of Sir John Leach, who, in a subsequent case, ordered to be amended two errors, by one of which the word "which" was written instead of "wheel;" and by the other, of which the word "increase" had been written instead of the word "inverse."

I have had some similar cases before me, in which there have been errors more or less numerous, but all of the same kind.

And in every case which has occurred, it has plainly been intended to do no more than to amend mere slips or clerical errors made by the parties, or the agents of the parties, who intending to make an accurate enrolment, have, by mere inadvertence, made an enrolment which was not what it purported to be, a true statement of that which the party intended at the time; and not only has strict evidence of error been required, but in order to enable any third party to dispute the validity of the amendment and of the order, it has been directed that the order itself should be endorsed on the enrolment.

It does not appear that the Master of the Rolls, as Keeper of the Records in Chancery, has ever exercised any greater authority than I have stated in matters of this kind; and being of opinion that I have no jurisdiction to make any such order as is asked by this petition; I must dismiss the petition with costs.

[255] THE ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. CHAPMAN. Nov. 25, 1840.

Payment of interest by an executor, commencing six years after the testator's death, and continuing seven years: Held to be such an admission of assets as to make the executor personally liable.

The testator, George Perkins, by his will, dated in 1799, directed his executors, therein named, to purchase out of his personal estate so much in the 3 per cent. consolidated Bank annuities as would produce a yearly sum of £20, and to stand possessed thereof upon trust to pay the dividends to the vicar and churchwardens for the time being of the parish of Barrow-upon-Soar, to be distributed by them on the 21st of December yearly amongst the necessitous poor of that parish; and the testator declared that the sum necessary to make such purchase should be the first charge on his personal estate, and should be paid before his debts and other legacies, which he thereby charged upon his real estates in the event of his personal estate being insufficient to satisfy them after such investment as aforesaid had been made; and after devising his real estates charged as aforesaid to William Chapman and Daniel Chapman, and directing his personal estate to be valued and divided between them, he appointed them his executors accordingly.

The testator died in the following year.

It could not be ascertained whether any investment had been actually made to answer the £20 a year, though it was supposed there had been, and that the amount had been sold out. No such investment, however, existed.

William Chapman, one of the executors, died in 1804, and Daniel Chapman, the other executor, died in 1820, having regularly paid the £20 down to the time of his death.

[256] Daniel Chapman appointed his son, the Defendant Joseph Chapman, his executor, and devised his real estate to his other sons. After Daniel Chapman's death, his devisees, considering the £20 a year to be a charge on the real estate, continued to pay it down to the year 1826, when they refused to make any further payments, whereupon the Defendant, Joseph Chapman, the executor of D. Chapman, continued to pay it down to the year 1833; but from that time he also refused to continue any further payment.

An information was filed by the Attorney-General against Joseph Chapman, to compel him to purchase, such a sum of stock as would produce £20 per annum, for the charity, and insisting that as executor of Daniel, he had, by his conduct, admitted assets of Daniel so as to make himself personally liable.

The information now came on for hearing.

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Blunt, for the Attorney-General, asked for a decree, with costs, in the first instance, on the ground that he had admitted assets, and made himself personally liable.

Mr. Kindersley and Mr. Messiter, for the Defendant Joseph Chapman, insisted that the Defendant was entitled to have an account taken of the assets of Daniel Chapman, possessed by him; and that his liability would be limited to the balance found against him.

Mr. Stevenson, for the vicar and churchwarden.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. The Defendant has, for seven years, paid the £20 to the charity, and the first payment was made six years [257] after the death of his testator. He had, therefore, ample time to ascertain the state of the assets. In this situation of circumstances he must be taken to have admitted assets, and is no longer entitled to have any account of them, but must be declared liable to make good the fund.

[257] PLATT v. ROUTH. Nov. 3, 4, 1840; Jan. 16, 1841.

[S. C. 10 L. J. Ch. 131; and in House of Lords (sub nom. Drake v. Attorney-General), 10 Cl. & F. 257; 8 E. R. 739; and see 6 Mee. & W. 756; 10 L. J. Ex. 105. Commented on, In re Hoskin's Trusts, 1877, 5 Ch. D. 233. See In re Power [1901], 2 Ch. 663.]

A testator gave his residuary estate in trust for his daughter for life, with remainder to such persons (other than A., B., and C. and their relations) as she should by will appoint, and in default, over; and if the daughter married or received visits from A. or any of his relations, then she was to forfeit her power. The daughter appointed the property by her will. Held, on her death; first, that under the Legacy Duty Act, she had a general and absolute power of appointment, and that, therefore, legacy duty was payable on the residue, under the first will; secondly, that no probate duty was payable on the probate of the daughter's will, in respect of such residue; and, thirdly, that legacy duty was also payable on the same residue so appointed under the will of the daughter.

The testator John Ramsden, by his will dated in 1825, devised and bequeathed his real and personal estate to his daughter Judith Ann Platt, J. Routh, and two other persons, whom he appointed executrix and executors, in trust to sell and convert and invest the produce in the funds, and pay the dividends to J. A. Platt for her life; and after her death upon trust, to pay two legacies of £3000 each; and the said testator thereby directed, that after such last-mentioned payments, his then surviving trustees should stand and be possessed of the said trust monies, stocks, funds, and securities, and the dividends, interest, and income thereof, and of the rents and profits of his said freehold and copyhold hereditaments and premises, until the sale of the same, upon trust for such person or persons (other than and except Joseph Woodhead, otherwise Woodward, of Russia Row, Cheapside, and his relations, Moses Hoper of Dorset Street Esquire, and his rela-^[258]tions, and the relations of the late husband of the testator's said daughter, and every of them), in such parts, shares, and proportions, for such intents and purposes, and in such manner and form as the said J. A. Platt, as well when covert or sole, and notwithstanding her coverture, by her last will and testament in writing, or any writing purporting to be or being in the nature of her last will and testament, or any codicil or codicils thereto, to be by her signed and published in the presence of and attested by two or more credible witnesses, should direct or appoint; and in default of such direction or appointment, and so far as any such direction or appointment, if incomplete, should not extend, upon trust for the next of kin of Dyson Ramsden, late of Waterclough, in the parish of South Oram, near Halifax, in equal shares and proportions, and to pay the same accordingly.

And by the testator's will it was provided, and he did thereby expressly declare his will and mind to be, that in case his said daughter Judith Ann Platt should at any time thereafter intermarry with the said Joseph Woodhead, otherwise Woodward, or with any of his relations, or in case she should reside with, or should visit, or receive visits from him the said J. Woodhead, otherwise Woodward, or any of his relations, then, and in any or either of the said cases, the said testator declared, that all and singular the gifts and bequests to, and the trusts contained in his said will in favour of, and the power of appointment thereinbefore given to, the testator's said daughter, should from thenceforth be absolutely null and void to all intents, and effects, and purposes; and then and from thenceforth the said testator directed that his said trustees, their executors, administrators, and assigns should stand and be possessed of all and singular the said trust ^[259]monies, stocks, funds, and securities, upon trust with and out of the said dividends, interest, and income thereof, to pay to his said daughter the weekly sum of 40s. and no more, during her life; and subject thereto, it was the testator's will, that the whole of his said trust monies, stocks, funds, and securities, and the dividends, interest, and income thereof, should go and belong to, and be held in trust for, the next of kin of the said Dyson Ramsden, to whom the said testator gave and bequeathed the same accordingly.

The testator died in May 1826, the estate was realized, and the income of the residue was paid to Mrs. Platt during her life. She married George Edward Platt, who survived her, and on the 27th of April 1837 she made a will in execution of the power given to her by her father's will, and thereby gave and appointed her father's residuary estate to various persons, and amongst other sums, gave £10,000 Bank 3 per cent. annuities, to the descendants of Dyson Ramsden, and she appointed the residue to Mr. Walter Drake.

All the persons named as cestui que trusts in the appointment made by the will of Mrs. Platt were strangers in blood both to Mr. Ramsden and to Mrs. Platt, except the descendants of Dyson Ramsden; Dyson Ramsden was a first cousin of the testator, John Ramsden.

Mr. Platt died in September 1837.

The estate was administered in this Court, and a question having arisen respecting the amount of probate and legacy duty payable upon the property bequeathed by the wills of John Ramsden and Judith Ann Platt, a sum of £40,000 3¹/₄ per cent. Reduced annuities was carried over to an account, entitled, "The Claims of ^[260] Probate and Legacy Duty Account," and a case was submitted for the opinion of the Judges of the Court of Exchequer upon the subject.

The Judges certified their opinion to be (6 Meeson & W. 756),

That, on the death of Judith Ann Platt, a legacy duty of one per cent. became payable in respect of the bequest in the will of John Ramsden of the residue of his estate and effects to the said Judith Ann Platt, after allowing any duty already paid in respect thereof.

That no probate duty was payable upon the probate of the will of Judith Ann

Platt in respect of the estate and effects of her late father, appointed by her in pursuance of the power given to her by his will; and

That legacy duty was payable in respect of the bequests contained in the will of the said Judith Ann Platt, at the same rate at which such duty would have been payable if the bequests had been mere legacies given by her payable out of her personal estate.

Both the Attorney-General and Mr. Drake, who was entitled to the fund in Court subject to the payment of the duty, were dissatisfied with the certificate, and each presented petitions to this Court on the subject.

Mr. Drake, by his petition, alleged that no legacy duty whatever was payable in respect of the residuary estate of the testator John Ramsden, which, by his will, was given after the death of Judith Ann Platt to her appointees; or, if any duty was payable thereon, that such duty only was payable as would have been payable, if the appointment made by Judith Ann Platt had been part of the will of John Ramsden, and the appointees [261] of Judith Ann Platt had been named in the will of John Ramsden, to take his residuary estate in the manner directed by the appointment and he submitted, that the certificate of the Court of Exchequer was, as to the opinion in respect of the legacy duty, erroneous.

The Attorney-General by his petition alleged, that according to the statutes in that behalf made and provided, not only legacy duty was payable in respect of the residuary estate of the testator John Ramsden, which was given by his will, but that probate duty was payable upon the probate of the will of Judith Ann Platt, in respect of the estate and effects appointed by her in pursuance of the power given to her by the will of John Ramsden.

The Attorney-General, by his petition, prayed that there might be paid to the Receiver-General of Stamps not only the legacy duty which the Judges certified to be due, but also the probate duty upon the probate of the will of Judith Ann Platt which the Judges certified not to be due. And Mr. Drake, by his petition, prayed either that the whole fund in Court might be transferred and paid to him without deducting anything for legacy or probate duty; or that the same fund might be transferred and paid to him, after deducting only such legacy duty as would have been payable if the appointees of Judith Ann Platt had been named in the will of John Ramsden.

The questions as to the legacy duty, turned on the statute of the 36 G. 3, c. 53. The second section of which enacts, "That upon every legacy, specific or pecuniary or of any other description, &c., given by any will, &c., of any person," &c., "out of the personal estate of the person so dying ; and also upon the clear residue [262] and upon every part of the clear residue of the personal estate of every person who shall die, &c. ; there shall be paid the several duties following (the section then enumerates the amount of duties, varying according to the relationship between the parties, but no duty whatever was by this Act charged upon children and their descendants).

By the seventh section of the same Act, which defines what shall be deemed legacies within the Act, it is enacted, "That any gift by any will or testamentary instrument of any person dying after the passing of this Act, which shall, by virtue of such will or testamentary instrument, have effect, or be satisfied out of the personal estate of such person so dying, or out of any personal estate which such person shall have power to dispose of as he or she shall think fit, shall be deemed and taken to be legacy within the intent and meaning of this Act, whether the same shall be given by way of annuity or in any other form," &c.

By the eighteenth section of the same Act, which regulates how the duty on legacies subjected to powers of appointment shall be charged with duty, it is enacted, "That where any legacy, or the residue or any part of the residue of any personal estate shall be subjected to any power of appointment to or for the benefit of any person or persons specially named or described as objects of such power, such property shall be chargeable with duty as property given to different persons in succession; and in so charging such duty, not only the person and persons who shall take previous or subject to such power of appointment, but also any person and persons who shall take under or in default of any such appointment, when and as they shall so take respectively, shall in respect of their several interests, whether previous, or [263] subject to, or under or in default of such appointment, be charged with the same duty, and in the same manner, as if the same interests had been given to him, her, or them respectively, in and by the will or testamentary disposition containing such power, in the same order and course of succession as shall take place under and by virtue of such power of appointment, or in default of execution thereof, as the case may happen to be. And where any property shall be given for any limited interest, and a general and absolute power of appointment shall also be given to any person or persons, to whom the property would not belong, in default of such appointment, such property, upon the execution of such power, shall be charged with the same duty, and in the same manner, as if the same property had been immediately given to the person or persons having and executing such power, after allowing any duty before paid in respect thereof; and where any property shall be given with any such general power of appointment, which property, in default of appointment, will belong to the person or persons to whom such power shall also be given, such property shall be charged with, and shall pay the duty by this Act imposed, in the same manner as if such property had been given to such person or persons absolutely in the first instance, without such power of appointment."

By the subsequent statute of the 45 G. 3, c. 28, legacy duty was first charged upon children and their descendants, and thereby it was enacted that there should be levied, &c., upon all legacies, and upon all residues or shares of personal estate left by any will, or divided by force of the Statute of Distributions, or by custom, the duties following, that is to say, "Upon every legacy, specifick, pecuniary, or of any other description, &c., given by any will, &c., for the benefit of any child, &c., [264] and upon the clear residue, and every part of the clear residue," the sum of 1 per cent.

This statute afterwards increased the amount of legacy duty payable by other persons; but it neither defined, as in the former Act, what should be considered legacies, or contained any clause regulating the charge of duties in cases of powers of appointment.

The schedule to 55 G. 3, c. 184, regulates the present amount of duties on probates, administrations, and legacies; but the body of the Act contains no clauses affecting the questions in this case.

The question of probate duty under the will of Mrs. Platt depended on the 55 G. 3, c. 184, the second section of which enacts that the duties in the schedule annexed to the Act shall be levied; and in the third part of the schedule containing the duties on probates of will and letters of administration, &c., it is stated as follows:—

"Probate of a will and letters of administration, with the will annexed, to be granted in England."

"Where the estate and effects for or in respect of which such probate, letters of administration, confirmation or oik respectively, shall be granted or expedied, or whereof such inventory shall be exhibited and recorded, exclusive of what the deceased shall have been possessed of or entitled to as a trustee for any other person or persons, and not beneficially, shall be above the value of £—— and under the value of £——."	<table border="1"> <tr> <th data-bbox="838 1161 979 1190">Duty.</th> </tr> <tr> <td data-bbox="838 1190 979 1325"> <table border="1"> <tr> <th data-bbox="838 1190 979 1218">£</th> <th data-bbox="838 1218 979 1247">s.</th> <th data-bbox="838 1247 979 1275">d.</th> </tr> <tr> <td data-bbox="838 1275 979 1325"></td> <td data-bbox="0 0 1 1"></td> <td data-bbox="0 0 1 1"></td> </tr> </table> </td> </tr> </table>	Duty.	<table border="1"> <tr> <th data-bbox="838 1190 979 1218">£</th> <th data-bbox="838 1218 979 1247">s.</th> <th data-bbox="838 1247 979 1275">d.</th> </tr> <tr> <td data-bbox="838 1275 979 1325"></td> <td data-bbox="0 0 1 1"></td> <td data-bbox="0 0 1 1"></td> </tr> </table>	£	s.	d.

[265] And by the thirty-eighth section no Ecclesiastical Court is to grant probate without requiring an affidavit, "that the estate and effects of the deceased, for or in respect of which the probate or letters of administration is or are to be granted," exclusive of trust property, or under the value of a certain sum to be therein specified, "in order that the proper and full stamp duty may be paid on such probate," &c.

The two petitions now came on for hearing together.

Mr. Tinney, Mr. Pemberton, and Mr. Teed, in support of the petition of Mr. Drake, and in opposition to that of the Attorney-General.

The certificate of the Court of Exchequer ought not to be confirmed. The defect in the reasoning on which it is founded is this, that the Court has applied an equitable construction to a revenue law, whereas such a principle is inapplicable to a case where, in the shape of taxation or imposition of duties, a charge is imposed upon individuals. The admitted rule of construction is this, that every charge upon the subject must be imposed in clear and unambiguous terms; Revenue Acts are to be construed strictly and favourably to the subject; and before the Crown can levy a shilling on an individual, the authority of some Act of Parliament must be produced, which, in plain and distinct terms, warrants it. It is idle to say that the Legislature contemplated all cases, or that if this particular case had occurred it would have been provided for; it is enough, in answer to observe, that the particular case is not comprised in the statute.

That Courts of law will not apply a revenue law to a case which does not strictly come within the letter of [266] the Act, appears from Tomkins v. Ashby (6 Barn. & Cr. 541), Denn dem. v. Diamond (4 B. & C. 243); in the latter case Justice Bayley says, "It is a well-settled rule, that every charge upon the subject must be imposed by clear and unambiguous language."

Bearing, therefore, in mind this rule of construction, the first question is, whether the property is liable to legacy duty except in respect of Mrs. Platt's life interest? That depends on the eighteenth section of the 36 G. 3, c. 52, which relates to legacy duty charged on property made subject to powers of appointment. There are three cases only enumerated, viz., where the power is for the benefit of persons specially named; secondly, where there is a general and absolute power of appointment; and, thirdly, where there is a general power of appointment, which, in default of appointment, would go to the donee of the power. The question is, under which of these three classes the present case ranges itself: if under neither, then no duty is payable. It is clearly not within the first, because there are no persons specially named, in whose favour the power is to be exercised; there is an exclusion of a certain class, but no description of any particular individuals in whose favour the power must necessarily be exercised. Nor is it under the second class; it is not a general and absolute power, because it could not be exercised in favour of Mrs. Platt herself, or in favour of Woodhead and his family, and the other individuals to whom the daughter was restricted from giving any benefits. The Act, by a general and absolute power, contemplated such a power as would be equivalent to ownership; here, during the life of Mrs. Platt, the power was in suspense; she could not exercise [267] it in her own favour; she could not mortgage or charge the property; and if she had married or visited Woodhead, she would have forfeited her power. The case does not come under the third class, because, in default of appointment, the property was to go over to different parties, viz., to the next of kin of Dyson Ramsden. The Court of Exchequer, though they admitted that it did not literally come within either of the descriptions, and "that some violence must be done to the language of the clause in question," thought that there was less difficulty in treating it as a general and absolute power, than as a power to appoint for the benefit of persons specially named or described. "The power," said the Chief Baron, "is one which might have been exercised by Mrs. Platt solely for her own benefit;" and his Lordship founded that opinion upon the decisions which hold that where a party has a power to appoint property by deed or will, and executes it in favour of volunteers, the volunteer appointees take, subject to the testator's debts. This, though a forced construction, is quite true when the power may be exercised by deed or will, because there the appointor has always the power of making the property his own, and the Court therefore regards him as the absolute owner of that property; but such a principle has never been extended to a case, in which the power was exercisable by will only, and in which, consequently, the appointor had never the power of taking the property himself beneficially. In Jenney v. Andrews (6 Mad. 264), there was no such decision; the power, it is admitted, was, in that case, to be exercised by will, but the contest was between the assignees of a bankrupt appointor who had obtained his certificate, and parties taking under the appointment in his will, and the creditors, who became such after the bank- [268] ruptcy, were not parties to the cause; the decision was, that the creditors anterior to the certificate were not entitled by reason of that certificate; but there was no decision that the subsequent creditors were entitled as against the appointees.

Secondly, as to whether probate duty became payable on this fund in respect of the will of Mrs. Platt. This depends on the statute of the 55 G. 3, c. 184. The affidavit thereby directed to be made, in order to determine the amount of duty to be paid is, as to the amount of the estate and effects in respect of which the probate is to be granted. (Sect. 38.) So the schedule to the Act, determining the amount to be paid, is regulated by the amount of the estate and effects for or in respect of which such probate shall be granted. The probate duty, therefore, can only be chargeable upon the property to be possessed and administered under the grant of probate. If it were otherwise, an executor would be personally liable to pay probate duty on assets which the probate would not authorise him to get in. The point has been decided by the highest authority. In The Attorney-General v. Dimond (1 Cr. & Jer. 356), the testator was possessed of French rentes, which the executors obtained after his decease; and it was held that probate duty was not payable thereon, on the ground that the probate had not been obtained in respect of these rentes. This decision was affirmed by the House of Lords in The Attorney-General v. Hope (1 Cr. M. & R. 530; and 8 Bligh, 44), in which it was held that property in a foreign country belonging to an English testator, brought to England to be administered, was not liable to probate duty.

[269] The question then is, was administration to Mrs. Platt's estate granted in respect to this property, or could the executors have obtained it under the grant of probate? clearly not; for the property never formed part of her estate, and her executors acquired no right whatever to meddle with it: it passed directly to the appointees, independent of the executors. A Court of Equity requires probate of a will executing a power, but this it regards merely as the best evidence of the testamentary appointment. In Palmer v. Whitmore (5 Sim. 178), which will be cited by the other side, the testator had a general power to appoint by deed or will, which was regarded as equivalent to the absolute ownership; and in The Attorney-General v. Staff (2 Cr. & Mes. 124), the original power was to be executed by deed or will, and by the first deed the donee of the power, by creating for herself a new power, had made the property her own. In Vandiest v. Fynmore (6 Sim. 570), a case not cited in the Exchequer, a testator gave to A., a power to dispose by his will of £5000, part of his estate, and on which probate duty was paid. A. exercised the power by will: it was held, that probate duty was not again payable in respect of the £5000.

Thirdly, no legacy duty is payable on this property under the testamentary appointment of Mrs. Platt. The second section of the 36 G. 3, c. 52 charges duty on legacies given "out of the personal estate of the person dying;" and the seventh section defines what shall be deemed legacies, describing them as gifts by will, to be satisfied out of the personal estate of the person dying, or out of the personal estate which such person "shall have power to dispose of as he or she shall think fit." Then was this property, thus subject to this restricted power, either the personal estate of Mrs. Platt, or property which she [270] had power to dispose of as she should think fit? clearly not; for she could not, for the reasons before stated, dispose of the property in her lifetime, nor could she appoint it in favour of the several individuals stated in the will of the original testator.

Mr. Romilly, in the absence of the Attorney-General, contra. The Crown is entitled to legacy duty of one per cent. on the whole estate which was bequeathed by the will of the original testator to his daughter for life, with a power of appointment by will; and to probate duty upon the fund appointed by her will, together with legacy duty thereon, at the rate of 10 per cent., the appointees being strangers to the appointor.

It is not necessary to discuss the question, whether the Court can apply equitable considerations to a fiscal statute which is for the benefit of the community, because the decision of the Court of Exchequer did not proceed on that ground, but on the fair construction of the whole statute; if, however, it were necessary to argue that question, it would be found that the principle referred to by the other side of construing statutes strictly, is one applicable only to penal statutes, and not to those concerning the revenue.

The statute of the 36 G. 3, c. 52, by the second section enacts, that all legacies given out of the personal estate of a testator shall be charged with certain duties; and the seventh section declares, that any gift by will to be satisfied out of the personal estate of a testator shall be deemed a legacy. So far the legacy duty was payable on every thing which passed under Mr. Ramsden's will. The eighteenth section merely regulates [271] the mode in which property subjected to powers is to be charged; for this purpose it adopts the usual classification, and regards all powers either as special or general, so that every power must fall within one of these two classes; if it be not special, it must be general. The other side have, however, introduced a third species of power, which they say is not comprised within either of these two classes, and then say that this peculiar species of power has not been provided for. No such third class of power has ever been recognised either in the cases or in the text books.

It is said, that because three families are excluded from becoming objects of the power, there is a restriction which prevents the power being general and absolute; all powers are subject to some restriction as to formality, or otherwise; but can it be said, because a power is so limited, that it can only be executed by will or at a particular time, or in a particular mode, or to the exclusion of a particular person, that, therefore, it is not a general power? If the distinction contended for were to prevail, then by excluding a single individual from becoming the object of a power, the legacy duties may be wholly evaded.

One test of the generality of a power is, whether the property, on the execution of the power in favour of volunteers, would or not be assets for the payment of the appointor's debts. The case of Jenney v. Andrews (6 Mad. 264) shews clearly that, in the opinion of Sir J. Leach, there was no distinction between a power exercisable by will and one to be executed by deed: he said, "Where there is a general power of appointment by will, and an appointment is made, the appointee is a trustee for credi-[272]-tors." In this case, then, there can be no doubt but that the creditors of Mrs. Platt would be entitled to take in priority to voluntary appointees, and according to this test, the power would be general.

Another mode of ascertaining whether a power is general or particular, is to see how an appointment under it would be affected by the doctrine of remoteness. It is clearly settled, that where an estate for life is limited to one with a power of appointing among a class of persons, the donee of the power cannot appoint to any person, who would have been too remote to take, if comprised in the deed creating the power; but where the power is general, the donee may appoint to persons to whom, if the same estate had been appointed to them by the original instrument, the appointment would have been void for remoteness. Examine the present power by this test, and see if Mrs. Platt could not have made a valid appointment to any persons in esse at the expiration of any lives existing at her death, though born after the decease of persons not living at the death of Mr. Ramsden; she clearly might have appointed the property to any person to whom she might have appointed her own absolute property.

As to probate duty, the point has been decided by the Vice-Chancellor in Palmer v. Whitmore (5 Sim. 178), and in Nail v. Punter (5 Sim. 563), and his decision has been followed by the Court of Exchequer in The Attorney-General v. Staff (2 Cr. & Mee. 124). In the first of these cases, a testator having a power to appoint by deed or will, executed it by his will, and the question was, whether a sum paid by the executor for probate duty in respect of the fund appointed was a proper payment; the Vice-Chancellor held that the [273] payment was proper, and that the probate duty was payable: His Honor observed, that the testator was at liberty to execute the power either by deed or will, and that having adopted the latter mode, "he made the fund, over which he had such general power, part of his general personal estate, and liable to be dealt with as part of his general personal estate;" and having adverted to the Acts of Parliament, His Honor added, "It was absolutely necessary that probate should be granted, for the purpose of giving effect to the execution of the power. The testator, therefore, has, by the instrument by which he exercised the power, created the necessity of having probate taken in respect of property, part of which was the fund in question. I think, therefore, that the payment made by the executor was right."

In Nail v. Punter, a wife had a testamentary power of appointment, and exercised it in favour of her husband, whom she appointed executor; the Vice-Chancellor held, that the husband who claimed as her executor was liable to pay probate duty. So, in The Attorney-General v. Staff, the testatrix, under a power, appointed property by her will; and it was held by the Court of Exchequer that probate duty attached.

Thirdly, as to legacy duty under the will of Mrs. Platt. It is plain, that as against parties taking the benefit of her disposition, legacy duty is payable; for, with respect to them, she "had power to dispose of the property as she thought fit."

She had a life estate with an absolute power of appointment restricted as against three families; but in effect, the whole dominion of the property was vested in her. She might have given it as part of her own estate to her executors, or to her creditors, and in case [274] of an appointment to volunteers, it would have been assets for the payment of her debts. Such a power over property is equivalent to ownership as regards the party having the power. Sir Wm. Grant, on this point, observes in Holmes v. Coghill (7 Ves. 504), there is an evident difference between a power and an absolute right of property: not so much with regard to the party possessing the power, as to the party to be affected by the execution of it. If our attention is to be confined to the former entirely, there is no reason why the money he has a right to raise should not be considered his property, as much as a debt he has a right to recover. But the latter can only be charged in the manner, and to the extent specified at the creation of the power."

The point is also settled by authority. In re Cholmondeley (1 Cr. & Mee. 149), it was held that legacy duty was payable in a case where a wife, having a power of appointment by will, executed it by her will:

Mr. George Turner, for the executors.

Mr. Tinney, in reply.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS. I must take some time to consider this case, because the points, though short, include a variety of important considerations. The Court of Exchequer evidently considered that this property was so situated as not to be property belonging to the testatrix, but merely subject to a power, and upon that consideration they have expressed their opinion that it was not subject to probate duty as belonging to her; but having regard to the nature of the power, as expressed in the will, they say [275] that, though this was not her property, so as to be subject to probate duty, yet, by the very words of the Act of Parliament, the power was of such a nature that the property ought to be charged with legacy duty as if it had belonged to her. They have accordingly certified, that the estate ought to pay the amount of duty which would have been payable if it had been an absolute legacy to her, and further, that the legacies given by her out of it ought also to be charged with the same duty as if they had been given out of her own property. It is argued for the Attorney-General, that the property being hers, probate duty is also payable on it. I have been asked, if I do not agree with the Court of Exchequer, to set at once in contradiction to it. I could not do that without the greatest hesitation; but if, as I understand, both parties have determined to proceed to the highest Court of Appeal, however reluctant I might feel to express an opinion differing from the unanimous certificate of the Court of Exchequer, I should think it a reason for not putting the parties to any further expense in the Courts below. I will not, at present, intimate my opinion on the points argued.

Jan. 16, 1841. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. In this case a question having arisen respecting the amount of probate and legacy duty payable upon the property bequeathed by the wills of John Ramsden and Judith Ann Platt, a sum of £40,000 3½ per cent. Reduced annuities was carried over to an account entitled "The claims of probate and legacy duty account," and a case was submitted for the opinion of the Judges of the Court of Exchequer upon the subject.

[276] The Judges have certified their opinion to be (6 Meeson & W. 756):—

First. That on the death of Judith Ann Platt a legacy duty of 1 per cent. became payable in respect of the bequest in the will of John Ramsden of the residue of his estate and effects to the said Judith Ann Platt, after allowing any duty already paid in respect thereof.

Secondly. That no probate duty is payable upon the probate of the will of Judith Ann Platt in respect of the estate and effects of her late father, appointed by her in pursuance of the power given to her by his will.

And, thirdly. That legacy duty is payable in respect of the bequests contained in the will of the said Judith Ann Platt, at the same rate at which such duty would have been payable if the bequests had been mere legacies given by her payable out of her personal estate.

Of this certificate complaint is made, both by the Attorney-General, claiming the probate and legacy duty for the Crown, and by Mr. Drake, who is entitled to the fund in Court, subject to the payment of the duty which ought to be paid.

Mr. Drake alleges that no legacy duty whatever is payable in respect of the residuary estate of the testator John Ramsden, which, by his will, is given, after the death of Judith Ann Platt, to her appointees; or that if any duty is payable thereon, that such duty is payable only as would have been payable if the appointment made by the said Judith Ann Platt had been part of the will of John Ramsden, and the appointees of Judith Ann Platt had been named in the will of John Ramsden to [277] take his residuary estate in the manner directed by the appointment.

The Attorney-General alleges that probate duty is payable upon the probate of the will of Judith Ann Platt, in respect of the estate and effects appointed by her, in pursuance of the power given to her by the will of John Ramsden.

And in this state of things petitions have been presented; one by the Attorney-General, praying that there may be paid to the Receiver-General of Stamps, not only the legacy duty which the Judges have certified to be due, but also the probate duty upon the probate of the will of Judith Ann Platt, which the Judges have certified not to be due. And the other petition by Mr. Drake, who prays, either that the whole fund in Court may be transferred and paid to him, without deducting anything for legacy or probate duty, or that the same fund may be transferred and paid to him after deducting only such legacy duty as would have been payable if the appointees of Judith Ann Platt had been named in the will of John Ramsden.

The doubts which attend the questions, and the amount of the sums in contest, have induced both parties to say that, whatever may be the decision here, the case must ultimately be brought under the consideration of the House of Lords; and I was therefore requested not to ask any further assistance from the Judges, but to make an order upon which the parties might proceed at once to the highest Court.

The case is that John Ramsden, by his will, dated the 10th of March 1825, gave his residuary personal estate to his executors and executrix, upon trust to permit his [278] daughter Judith Ann Platt to receive the interest thereof during her life, and after her decease (subject to certain payments), upon trust for such person (other than and except Joseph Woodhead and his relations, Moses Hoper and his relations, and the relations of Mrs. Platt's late husband and every of them), in such parts, shares, and proportions, and in such manner as she, whether sole or covert, should by will appoint, and in default of appointment in trust for the next of kin of Dyson Ramsden; and by a distinct clause in the will, the testator declared that if Mrs. Platt should intermarry with Joseph Woodhead or his relations, or should reside with, or receive visits from him or them, the bequests in her favour, with the power of appointment given to her, should from thenceforth be absolutely null and void.

The testator died in May 1835: the estate was realized, and the income of the residue was paid to Mrs. Platt during her life. She married George Edward Platt; and on the 27th of April 1837 she made a will in execution of the power given to her by her father's will, and thereby gave and appointed her father's residuary estate to various persons, and amongst other sums gave £10,000 Bank 3 per cent. annuities to the descendants of Dyson Ramsden.

The questions are:—

Firstly. Whether Mrs. Platt or her estate is liable to pay any legacy duty beyond that which was payable on the life interest given to her for her own benefit.

Secondly. Whether any probate duty is payable on the probate of her will in respect of her father's residuary estate thereby appointed.

[279] And, thirdly, what, if any, legacy duty is payable upon the sums appointed by her will.

The first and the last of these questions appear to me to be attended with considerable difficulty. The first depends on the construction which ought to be put upon the eighteenth section of the Act 36 G. 3, c. 52. It is argued on behalf of the Crown, and the opinion of the Judges of the Court of Exchequer is so declared, that the power given by the will of John Ramsden is a general and absolute power within the meaning of the Act. On the other hand, it is contended for Mr. Drake, that a power to be exercised only by will, which cannot be exercised in favour of certain excepted classes of persons, and the continued existence of which depends on the donee abstaining from certain specified Acts, cannot be deemed an absolute and general power; and then it is said that the Act, if it does not comprise the particular case, cannot be extended by construction: so that, if the present case be not specifically described, the duty is not imposed, and it is not competent to any Court to presume upon the intention of the Legislature, and say that, because it must have been intended, it must therefore be considered that the duty was imposed.

In this case the residue of John Ramsden's estate was given for a limited interest to Mrs. Platt. A power of appointment was also given to her; and she was not the person to whom the property would have belonged in default of her appointment. Under these circumstances, if the power of appointment were general and absolute, the case would fall within the express provisions of the Act; and the question comes therefore to this, whether the power given in this case is not a general and absolute power within the true meaning of [280] the Act (36 G. 3, c. 52, s. 18); and after some hesitation, and contrary to my first impression, I have come to the conclusion that it is. Provision was made for the duties payable on legacies which were subject to powers if the appointees were named or described by the testator (the donor of the power), and the proportions only were left to be determined by the donee of the power: the appointees were charged as legatees of the testator; but if the appointees were not named or described by the testator, but left solely to the disposition or selection of the donee of the power, in that case the property upon execution of the power, i.e., upon doing the act whereby the property is disposed of, or the appointees selected, is charged as if it had been given to the donee of the power, after allowing for any duty before paid in respect thereof.

The limited interest first given, and the interest vested by means of the execution of the power of appointment disposing of the whole remaining interest, make together the whole interest in the property, and it is the entire property which, in such a case as this, is partly possessed, and, as to the rest, disposed of by the donee of the power; and, considering the meaning of the words "general and absolute" in their application to such a case, I do not think that the power can be considered as otherwise than general and absolute within the meaning of the Act, because it could only be executed by will, or because the donee was not permitted to execute it in favour of three families named. A power which might be executed in favour of anybody in the world, except the members of three families, appears to me to be for this purpose a general power; and as, among the objects of it, the power of disposition is ab-[281]-solute, I think that the power is within the meaning of the Act a general and absolute power, and consequently I am of opinion that, upon the death of Mrs. Platt, which was the time when the execution of the power by will took effect, a duty of 1 per cent. became due upon the residuary estate of John Ramsden, after allowing any duty previously paid in respect thereof.

My opinion is not founded upon the notion, that the residue of John Ramsden's estate had become the property of Mrs. Platt, but upon the notion that property, circumstanced as this was, is so chargeable by the Act.

The next question is, whether the residuary estate of John Ramsden, appointed by the will of Mrs. Platt, is chargeable with probate duty upon the probate of the will of Mrs. Platt; and I am of opinion that it is not. It was not the property of Mrs. Platt, and could not be recovered by her executors by virtue of the probate. It would be singular that the rule of the Court, which requires a probate merely as evidence, to shew that the instrument of appointment is a will, should have the effect of subjecting the property to duty as if it had been the property of the testator, which the Court does not consider it to be. The question depends on the construction of the Act, 55 G. 3, c. 184, the schedule to which states the amount of probate duty payable upon the estate and effects for or in respect of which the probate is granted; and it was argued that, because probate was required in order to shew that the property now in question was appointed by will, the probate was granted for and in respect of this property, and therefore subject to the duty: but the thirty-eighth section of the Act appears to me to shew that the Act only relates to the estate and effects of the deceased for or in respect of which the probate is granted, and as this was not the [282] property of the deceased, I am of opinion that no duty is payable in respect of it.

The last question relates to legacy duty payable on the same appointed by the will of Mrs. Platt. This question appears to me to involve the same difficulty which affects the first. The Act 36 G. 3, c. 52, s. 7 provides that any gift by will which shall by virtue of the will have effect out of the personal estate of the testatrix, or out of any personal estate which the testatrix has power to dispose of as she shall think fit, shall be deemed a legacy. In this case the gifts by the will of Mrs. Platt are to take effect out of the personal estate of John Ramsden, which she had power to dispose of, and they are to be deemed legacies, unless the restrictions to which she was subject are to be held inconsistent with the words "as she shall think fit," according to the meaning which ought to be attributed to them in the Act. Upon the best consideration which I have been able to give the subject, it appears that, notwithstanding the restrictions imposed upon her, the testatrix had a power, of disposing of the property as she thought fit, within the meaning of the Act, and therefore upon this point also I concur with the opinions of the Judges of the Court of Exchequer.

Under the circumstances I think that I ought to confirm the certificate, and refer it to the Master to ascertain the amount of duty which is payable according to the certificate, with a stay of execution of the order, to allow the intended appeal to the House of Lords.

But Mr. Drake, though he acquiesces in the certificate so far as relates to the probate duty, has not prayed for a confirmation of that part of it. This may be done if Mr. Drake would amend his petition, and pray for con-[283]-firmation as to probate duty. And the Attorney-General only prays for a confirmation of that part of the report which is in his favour.

[283] TREZEVANT v. FRASER. Nov. 4, 1840.

An incumbrancer on a portion of an undivided fund in Court cannot obtain a stop order on it, without serving the other parties interested, with the petition for that purpose.

A party being entitled to an undivided share of a fund in Court, encumbered it, and then joined the assignee in a petition for the stop order.

The petition had not been served on the other parties to the suit.

Mr. Walker, in support of the petition.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. Here is a fund belonging to several persons, and one of such persons, in the absence of the others, comes and asks an order affecting it. I am of opinion that this cannot be done. [NOTE.—The practice has since been altered by the order of the 5th of April 1841.]

[284] BALLS v. MARGRAVE. Nov. 9, 10, 1840.

[For subsequent proceedings, see 3 Beav. 448; 4 Beav. 119.]

A bill for discovery, in aid of an action of covenant brought by the assignee of the lessor, stated that the lessor, at the time of granting the lease, was "seised or otherwise well entitled," &c. Held, that this was not a sufficient allegation that the lessor had the legal estate so as to shew the right of his assignee to sue at law on the covenant, and a demurrer on that ground was allowed.

The bill stated that Thomas Cheek was "seised or otherwise well entitled, to him and his heirs, for an estate of inheritance of or to the messuages, &c., thereafter mentioned, and that, being so seised or entitled," he by indenture, dated in 1794, demised them to Joseph Rowland for a term of ninety-nine years, at a rent of £26, and that Joseph Rowland, for himself, his executors, administrators, and assigns, covenanted to pay the rent.

That Cheek, having previously surrendered the property, which was copyhold, to the use of his will, devised it to his grandchildren, who were admitted; that Joseph Hewes, one of the grandchildren, purchased the property, which was duly surrendered to him, and that, being surrendered to the use of his will, he devised the property to the Plaintiffs, who were duly admitted.

The bill stated that the lessee Rowland died intestate, and that his administratrix assigned the property to Thomas Margrave; and that his executor, the Defendant, had entered into possession under the lease; that there being a large arrear of rent due from the Defendant to the Plaintiffs, they had commenced an action at law for the recovery thereof, but the lease being in the Defendant's possession, and there being no counterpart, the Plaintiffs could not proceed therein without a discovery. The bill prayed a discovery, and the production of the lease.

[235] To this bill the Defendant demurred, on the ground that it was not by the said bill shewn, or by any sufficient certainty or precision alleged or averred that the said Thomas Cheek was, at the time of his so granting or purporting to grant the said indenture of lease, seised to him and his heirs for an estate of inheritance of or to the said messuages or tenements and hereditaments; and it therefore did not, with any certainty, appear, that any covenant, on the part of the lessee, contained in the said indenture of lease, would run with the land, so as, under the circumstances stated in the said bill, to enable the said Complainants to sue the Defendant on such covenant, but any such covenant would, on the contrary, be a covenant in gross.

Mr. Kindersley and Mr. Evans, in support of this demurrer. There is no sufficient allegation on the face of this bill, that the lessor, at the time of making the lease, had the legal estate, and if there be any doubt, "the Defendant is entitled to put that construction upon the statements in the bill which is most against the interest of the person making them;" Vernon v. Vernon (2 Myl. & Cr. 171). The Defendant is, therefore, entitled to say that the lessor was not seised, but "was otherwise well entitled, to him and his heirs;" and this allegation, contrasted with the previous statement, amounts to this, that he had a mere equitable estate; in which case the covenant did not run with the land so as to bind the assignee; for by the common law, the right to sue on a covenant did not pass to the assignee, and the stat. of 32 H. 8, c. 34, only enabled the assignee of a legal estate to sue on a covenant, where therefore the estate is equitable the benefit of the covenant does not pass to the assignee, as in the instance of a lease granted by a mortgagor; Webb v. Russell (3 Term. Rep. 393), [236] followed by Whitton v. Peacock (2 Bing. N. C. 411). If, then, the Plaintiff has no right to sue at law, he cannot be entitled to any discovery, in equity, in support of an action which cannot be maintained. It would be the same as if an assignee of a chose in action, not assignable at law, were to bring an action thereon, and then come for a discovery, which would prove nugatory.

It is stated in 1 Saunders's Reports, p. 233a. note, "That, in an action by an assignee of the reversion, he must set out the title of the lessor to the demised premises, that it may appear he had such an estate in the reversion as might be legally assigned to the Plaintiff. Clift's Ent. 213, p. 7. Lil. Ent. 132, 135." The Plaintiff, therefore, has not set out his title with sufficient clearness and precision, and it is quite sufficient to shew that the discovery is immaterial. Redesdale, p. 191.

They also referred to Baring v. Nash (1 Ves. & Bea. 551) and Right dem. Jefferys v. Bucknell (2 Barn. & Ad. 288).

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. J. H. Taylor, contra, in support of the bill. It is not necessary to state, upon the face of the bill, all the circumstances necessary to maintain the action at law. Here the allegation does not amount to a statement of an equitable title only, for the other statements in the bill of the several surrenders and admissions may be called in aid; and it is very improbable that these took place on an equitable estate. The property, too, is copyhold, to which the statement of seisin does not accurately apply, and seisin is [237] not necessary; it is sufficient if the lessor had the immediate reversion.

Mr. Kindersley, in reply. There is no suggestion that Cheek was ever admitted; and the allegation of seisin is not improper, except that it does not allege seisin according to the custom, &c.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. I confess I have seldom seen a demurrer which is less likely to be of any real benefit to the parties than this; but, nevertheless, if it be founded upon principle, and can be sustained, it must undoubtedly be allowed.

The circumstances under which the demurrer in this case has been brought forward are these: an action of covenant has been brought, which could only be sustained upon the footing that the person granting the lease had a legal estate, and the Plaintiff has stated he was "seised or otherwise entitled." To this the Defendant alleges that, as the statement has been put in the alternative, seised or well entitled, he has a right to take it most against the pleader, and that it means "otherwise entitled," or that he had an equitable title only, in which case there would be no foundation for the action of covenant, and no use could then be made of the discovery.

The Plaintiffs, however, say this is only one of the expressions in the bill; and the simple rule that you are to take any expression most against the pleader, must not depend upon one detached expression, but upon the whole bill. I must, therefore, read this bill over, in order to see whether there are such controlling expressions in the bill as will alter the construction arising from the [288] former allegation. If there should be, then I think the rule which has been stated no longer applies. If, on the other hand, there are none, and I should be of opinion that the allegation is too uncertain, I must give the Plaintiff liberty to amend his bill, in order to set the matter right.

Nov. 10. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS. I have read over the bill in this case, and I do not think that the subsequent allegations in the bill at all assist the uncertainty of the other statement. It appears to me, that though the objection is of a frivolous nature, yet the Court requires greater strictness than is to be found in this bill. I think, therefore, that I must allow this demurrer, giving the Plaintiff leave to amend; but, under the circumstances, I will not allow any costs of the demurrer.

[288] HAWKE v. KEMP. Nov. 20, 1840.

Where a Defendant admits by his answer the possession of documents, and a balance of money, it is irregular to move for the production of the former, and payment into Court of the latter, by two separate motions. They ought to be included in one. In this case the Court ordered the Plaintiff to pay the extra costs occasioned by this irregular proceeding.

The Defendant, in his answer, admitted to have in his hands certain deeds and papers, and a balance of the estate.

Mr. Addis now made two motions in this case, the first for the production of papers, the second for the payment of the money into Court.

[289] Mr. Follett, contra, did not object to the production of the papers, or to the payment of the money into Court, but he insisted that the Plaintiff had been guilty of vexation in making this application by two separate motions when one would have been sufficient; he therefore contended that the Plaintiff ought to bear the extra expenses which had been incurred thereby.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale] said, that to mark his disapprobation of this course of proceeding, he must insert in the order, to be made in this case, a direction, that in taxing the costs of the suit, the extra costs, incurred in consequence of these two motions, should be paid by the Plaintiff.

[289] TARBUCK v. WOODCOCK. Dec. 4, 1840.

The same solicitor put in and set down for hearing two pleas for want of parties for two several Defendants, and they were both allowed: the Plaintiff was ordered to pay the costs of one only of such pleas.

Two pleas for want of parties were put in, to the bill in this cause, by several Defendants, and which being set down, were allowed with costs.

Mr. Kindersley afterwards observed, that these two pleas had been filed and set down for argument by the solicitor, and he contended that the costs of one same only ought to be allowed, as the several parties might have joined in one plea, and thus have saved the expenses.

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. B. Chapman, contra, contended that the course was regular, as the interests of the two parties were quite distinct.

[290] THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. I think that two such pleas ought not to have been filed by the same solicitor; I will allow the costs of one only.

[290] WOOD v. HARPUR. Dec. 4, 1840.

[See Duke of Northumberland v. Todd, 1878, 7 Ch. D. 777; Bourke v. Davis, 1889, 44 Ch. D. 126.]

Affidavits sworn before a Master Extraordinary, who was the clerk of the Plaintiff's attorney, rejected.

This was a motion to commit the Defendants for the breach of an injunction, and it was proposed to read certain affidavits, which were objected to, on the ground that they had been sworn before a Master Extraordinary of the Court, who acted as clerk to the Plaintiff's attorney.

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Lee, for the Plaintiff.

Mr. Kindersley and Mr. Dixon, for the Defendants.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale] rejected the affidavits on the ground stated.

[290] CHOWICK v. DIMES. Nov. 20, Dec. 8, 1840.

A sole Plaintiff having died, the Court on the application of the Defendant, ordered that the administrator should revive, or that the bill should be dismissed without costs.

This was a suit to redeem a mortgage and judgments; and the sole Plaintiff having died, the Defendant moved that his administrator might revive the cause, or that the bill might be dismissed without costs.

[291] Mr. Bacon, for the motion, pressed upon the attention of the Court the hardship of allowing a suit to continue in Court, the effect of which, according to the doctrine of lis pendens, would prevent the parties dealing with their estate.

Mr. E. Montagu, contra.

Canham v. Vincent (8 Sim. 277), Adamson v. Hull (1 Sim. & St. 249), and The Bishop of Winchester v. Paine (11 Ves. 194), were cited.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS said that he would make enquiry as to the practice in such cases.

Dec. 8. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. In this case the sole Plaintiff being dead, the Defendant moved that his administrator might revive the cause, or that the bill might be dismissed without costs.

As the administrator is at liberty to move at any time, and by doing so may give the effect of lis pendens to the whole continuance of the cause, and the uncertainty, whether he will do so or not, must be very inconvenient to the Defendant, the application appeared to me to be reasonable, and in conformity with the practice which the Court has adopted in similar cases; and I should have granted the application at the time, if I had not been informed that a like case had been under the consideration of the Vice-Chancellor, who had refused the motion. It appears that in Canham v. Vincent, which is the case referred to, the opinion of the Vice-Chancellor was not founded on any supposed want of authority in the Court, or on any supposed incon- [292]-venience likely to ensue from granting or refusing the application, but simply on the ground that no case was cited in which the application was granted after opposition.

I have made inquiries on the subject, and omitting those cases which have arisen in bankruptcy, which though strongly analogous, may be thought not strictly applicable, I find in Jones v. Massey (17th Dec. 1805; Reg. Lib. A. 1805, fo. 30) the two Plaintiffs were dead, and on affidavit of service of notice of motion by the Defendants, the Bank of England, on the executor of the Plaintiff who died last, it was ordered that the bill might be revived in a fortnight, or that an injunction that had been granted might be dissolved, and the bill dismissed with costs; that in Turner v. Cole (28th March 1808; Reg. Lib. B. 1807, fo. 495) an injunction to stay proceedings at law had been obtained, and continued on the merits confessed in the answer, and on the Plaintiffs bringing deeds into Court and paying a sum of money into the bank; the sole Plaintiff being dead, the Defendant moved against the executrix that she should revive the cause in a fortnight, or that the injunction should be dissolved, and it was so ordered: the Defendant then revived his judgment at law and levied execution, after which a balance remained due to him, and thereupon he moved in the abated cause that the executrix of the deceased Plaintiff might either revive the suit in a limited time, or that the Accountant-General might transfer to the Defendant the fund which arose from the money paid into Court by the deceased Plaintiff, and also that the title-deeds deposited by the deceased Plaintiff might be delivered to the Defendant's clerk in Court for his use, and it was so ordered.

[293] In Brown v. Warner (4th of February 1809) (Reg. Lib. A. 1808, fol. 194; and cited 4 Madd. 171, and 2 Madd. Pr. 368, 1st edit.), the Plaintiff had obtained an injunction to restrain the Defendant from proceeding in an action to recover possession of a messuage, and the injunction had been continued on the merits. The sole Plaintiff then died, and his widow took possession of the messuage; it was not then known whether the deceased had made a will, and no letters of administration had been granted; under those circumstances, it was ordered that the representative of the late Plaintiff should exhibit a bill of revivor in a fortnight, or in default thereof that the bill should be dismissed with costs: and it was ordered that service of the order on the late Plaintiff's clerk in Court and on his solicitors and on the widow should be deemed good service.

These orders were made by Lord Eldon; and although it does not appear that in any of them, the representative of the deceased party appeared and resisted the motion, yet I cannot suppose that orders so special passed without consideration, or that they are such as would not have been made, if the representatives had appeared and stated no sufficient reasons against them; and although there might, as I conceive, have been some modification of the orders as to costs, if the representatives had appeared, there seems no reason to dispute the regularity of the orders in any other respect; and I apprehend that if these orders had been brought to the attention of the Vice-Chancellor, he would have decided the case Canham v. Vincent differently. The inconvenience would undoubtedly be very great to the Defendant, if it were left to the option of the administrator of a deceased sole Plaintiff, to keep the Defendant in a state of uncertainty as to the prosecution of the suit, for an indefinite period: whilst, on an application of this kind, the administrator [294] appearing, may ask for a reasonable time to make up his mind whether he will go on with the suit or not.

The cases which I have mentioned, were all of them cases in which injunctions had been granted, but it does not appear to me, that that is a circumstance which makes any real difference in the question; having regard to these cases, and to the analogous cases of defect by bankruptcy and abatement by the marriage of a feme sole Plaintiff, I am of opinion that this motion should be granted, unless it should appear, that in consequence of the whole interest of the deceased Plaintiff not being vested in his legal personal representative, some further notice is yet wanting.

The following unreported cases relate to this subject:—

Johnson v. Horlock.—Upon motion this day (11th November 1708), made unto this Court by Mr. Moxon, being of the Defendant's counsel, it was alleged, that the said Plaintiff Elizabeth Johnson formerly exhibited her bill in this Court against the said Defendant, to which he put in his answer; and the said Elizabeth about a year since intermarried with one James Humphry, who had not thought fit to revive the suit; and, therefore, it was prayed, that the bill might stand dismissed out of this Court: whereupon, it was ordered, that the said Humphry do, within a week after notice hereof, procure this suit to be [295] revived, or in default thereof that the Plaintiff's bill should stand dismissed out of this Court, with costs, to be taxed by Sir Richard Holford, Knight, &c.

Reg. Lib. 1708, A. 134.

French v. Barber.—It appeared that after the answers had been filed, the Plaintiff became bankrupt, and that assignees had been appointed, "but had not stirred a step in the cause."

On motion by two of the Defendants made the 26th of June 1782, and on hearing counsel for the Plaintiff, it was ordered "that the assignees do file a supplemental bill, on or before the first day of next term, or that, in default thereof, the Plaintiff's bill as to the said Defendants Mary Bastin and Matthias Barber do stand dismissed out of this Court without costs."

Reg. Lib. 1781, A. 416.

Jones v. Massey.—Upon opening, &c., the 17th of December 1805, it was alleged that the Plaintiffs exhibited this bill and obtained an injunction against the Defendants, the Governor and Company of the Bank of England, to restrain them from permitting the Defendant Eyre Massey, or any person or persons, however authorised by him, to transfer the annuities in the bill mentioned, or to receive the interest and dividends thereof. That the said Defendants have put in their answer to the said bill. That the Plaintiffs are since dead, and the Plaintiff Michael Jones, having survived the Plaintiff Charles J. Morgan, by his will appointed John Jones sole executor thereof. That the said John Jones had not revived this suit; and therefore, it was prayed, that the Plaintiff's bill might be revived in a fortnight, or that in default thereof, the injunction issued against the said Defendants, the Governor and Company of the Bank of England, to restrain, &c., might be dissolved; and that the bill filed in this cause might stand dismissed out of this Court, with costs to be paid to the Defendants, the Governor and Company of the Bank of England; which, upon hearing an affidavit of notice of this motion to John Jones read, is ordered accordingly, and it is hereby referred to Mr. Harvey, one of the Masters, &c., to tax the said costs.

Reg. Lib. 1805, A. fo. 30.

Turner v. Cole.—Robert Turner filed his bill against Defendant for an account and an injunction to restrain an action at law. The common injunction had been obtained for want of answer; and the answer coming in, the injunction was, upon a motion to dissolve, continued, upon the Plaintiff leaving with his clerk in Court certain title-deeds, and paying into Court the sum of £200. The Plaintiff died, leaving Elizabeth Riley executrix; who not having revived the suit, the Defendant, on the 19th of May 1806, obtained an order, that Elizabeth Riley should revive within a fortnight, or, in default, that the injunction should stand dissolved. The suit not having been revived, the injunction [296]-tion became dissolved, "and the Defendant having revived his judgment in case, levied execution on the said late Plaintiff's effects; and the balance of the Defendant's demand under that judgment, after deducting the monies raised from the sale of the said late Plaintiff's effects, amounted to the sum of £486, 19s. 6d.; that the Defendant was advised that he was entitled to the custody of the title-deeds at present in the possession of the late Plaintiff's clerk in Court, on the ground that he had an equitable lien thereof, by way of further security, for the money he obtained judgment for in the action in case. Whereupon, and upon hearing the said order dated the 19th day of May 1806, and an affidavit of service of notice of this motion to the said Elizabeth Riley and to the clerk in Court of the said late Plaintiff, and the Accountant-General's certificate read, his Lordship ordered, that the said Elizabeth Riley, the executrix of the said late Plaintiff Robert Turner, should, on or before the first day of Easter term next, file a bill of revivor against the Defendant in this cause, to revive this suit; or in default of such bill of revivor being filed, then the £349, 7s., 3 per cent. consolidated Bank annuities (upon which the £200 had been invested), standing in the name of the Accountant-General of this Court, and the sum of £39, 16s. 8d. cash in the Bank placed to the credit of this cause should be transferred and paid to the Defendant John Cole, in part satisfaction of the judgment in case, obtained by him against the said Defendant, and in the pleadings of this cause mentioned; and in case the said Elizabeth Riley should not file such bill of revivor as aforesaid, by the time aforesaid, it was further ordered that the title-deeds, deposited by the said late Plaintiff Robert Turner with his clerk in Court, should be delivered over from the said late Plaintiff's clerk in Court to the Defendant's clerk in Court for the said Defendant's use."

Reg. Lib. 1807, B. 495.

Browne v. Warner.—An injunction had been granted to restrain an action of ejectment; the Plaintiff died, and there appeared to be no representative. The widow, however, retained possession of premises, and paid no rent. It was, on the 4th of February 1809, ordered, that the representative of said late Plaintiff do, within a fortnight after notice hereof, exhibit a bill of revivor in order to revive this suit; or in default thereof that the injunction awarded in this cause should be dissolved, and that the Plaintiff's bill should stand dismissed out of this Court, with costs; and it was further ordered that service of this order on the late Plaintiff's clerk in Court, and on the late Plaintiff's solicitor, and on the widow of the Plaintiff, be deemed good service.

Reg. Lib. 1808, A. 104.

Bromley v. Gregory and Others.—The Plaintiff Bromley became bankrupt, and no further proceedings having been taken, it was moved that the Plaintiff Bromley might file a bill of revivor and supplement in this [297] cause within fourteen days after the date of this order; or in default thereof, that the bill filed in this cause might be dismissed as against the Defendant moving, which, upon hearing an affidavit of service of notice of this motion read, was ordered accordingly.

Reg. Lib. A. 1812, fo. 1527.

Mills v. Fry.—The bill was filed in 1812, and a receiver had been appointed; the answer was filed in 1813. No further steps had been taken, and the sole Plaintiff had become bankrupt. Upon motion and on hearing counsel for the Plaintiff, it was ordered "that the Plaintiff do within three weeks file a supplemental bill in this cause against the Defendant; or in default thereof, that the Plaintiff's bill do stand dismissed out of this Court for want of prosecution, with costs to be taxed by Mr. Thomson, one of the Masters of this Court."

Reg. Lib. 1816, B. 83.

Wilkinson v. Charlesworth.—Caroline Wilkinson, the sole Plaintiff, married Robert Malcolm on the 30th of December 1830; and no further proceedings having been taken in the cause, it was ordered by the Master of the Rolls on the petition of the Defendants, "that the Plaintiff, and Robert Malcolm her husband, do file a bill of revivor against the Defendants, on or before the first day of next Michaelmas term; or in default thereof, it was ordered (after hearing both parties), that the original bill should stand dismissed out of this Court without costs."

Reg. Lib. 1831, B. 2359.

[297] THE ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. NETHERCOAT. Nov. 25, Dec. 8, 1840.

An application for the re-taxation of a solicitor's bill should be by petition, stating particularly the grounds of complaint, and not by motion.

On taxation, charges disallowed for want of authority, and charges reduced by limiting to one of several Defendants his aliquot part of a joint charge, ought not to be computed in determining on whom the costs of taxation should fall, semble.

In this case Mr. Aspinall had obtained an order for the taxation of the bills of his solicitor, Mr. Howes. Upon the taxation, the bills were (under the peculiar circumstances stated in the judgment of the Court) reduced from £310, 16s. 2d. to £46, 1s., which, after deducting a sum already paid on account, left £6, 4s. 8d. due to the solicitor.

Mr. Aspinall then obtained the usual order of course for taxing the costs of this taxation, and for payment [298] thereof by the solicitor, on the ground that more than one-sixth had been taxed off.

Mr. Pemberton, on behalf of Mr. Howes, now moved to discharge the order for taxation of the costs of taxation, and for a re-taxation of the bills of costs.

Mr. James Russell, contra, objected that the application ought to be by petition and not by motion. He argued that the objections to the certificate ought to be specifically pointed out; that the Court would not entertain jurisdiction as to the quantum of costs allowed: Attorney-General v. Brown (1 Myl. & K. 567), Alsop v. Lord Oxford (Ib. 564: Seton Decrees, 335); and further, that the Court could not interfere until the certificate of the Master had been previously discharged. He also referred to Muskett v. Hill (3 Beav. 301).

Mr. Pemberton, in reply.

Dec. 8. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. In this case a motion was made by Mr. Thomas Howes, a solicitor, to discharge an order, dated the 16th day of July 1840, for the taxation of costs occasioned by the taxation of Mr. Howes's bill under a former order, and for payment of such costs; and at the same time Mr. Howes moves that the Master may review his taxation.

The case seems to be, that Mr. Aspinall and seven other Defendants employed Mr. Howes as their solicitor in the cause; and that besides such employment on the behalf of the eight Defendants, Mr. Howes was employed as solicitor in some matters by Mr. Aspinall separately.

[299] Mr. Aspinall, desiring to discontinue the employment of Mr. Howes as his solicitor, on the 7th of September 1838 obtained the common order for the delivery of Mr. Howes's bill of fees and disbursements, claimed to be due to him in this cause and all other matters: for taxation of the bills: production of papers: and on payment of what, if anything, was due, for delivery up of all deeds, papers and writings belonging to Mr. Aspinall.

Pursuant to the order, Mr. Howes carried in three bills:—two of them for business done for Mr. Aspinall separately, and the third for business done for the eight Defendants, and purporting to be a charge against them.

No question is made respecting the proceedings on the two bills for business done by Mr. Howes for Mr. Aspinall separately.

But with respect to the third bill, it is said, that amongst the charges therein contained, were the costs of resisting a motion for a receiver; and it being alleged, and I presume, shewn to the satisfaction of the Master, that the resistance to the motion was not authorised by Aspinall, the charges made in respect thereof was not taxed, but wholly disallowed by the Master. By this disallowance, and by the sums taxed off other charges, the sum appearing due to the solicitor was very greatly reduced; and the Master, having divided this reduced sum into eight equal parts, charged Aspinall with only one of them; and after giving him credit for sums previously paid, what appeared to remain due to Howes was very small.

The certificate is dated the 11th of July 1840, and without stating any special circumstances, certifies, in substance, that the Master in taxing the bill (meaning [300] the three bills), amounting to £310, 16s. 2d., had reduced the same to £46, 1s., which, after deducting £39, 16s. 4d., admitted to have been paid, left the sum £6, 4s. 8d., which he found due to Howes in respect of the bill.

Upon this certificate, Mr. Aspinall obtained an order, as of course, dated the 16th of July 1840, for the taxation of the costs occasioned by the former taxation, and for payment thereof.

And now Mr. Howes makes his motion for a discharge of that order and a re-taxation of his bills.

Having regard to the certificate, I think that the order complained of is regular; and whilst the order and the certificate stand, I think I cannot regularly order a re-taxation of the bill, and that, on this form of proceeding, I cannot regularly refer it back to the Master to review his certificate. I must therefore refuse this application.

But if the facts be as I have understood them, it appears to me, that the certificate is not such, as, under the circumstances, ought to have been made. This is by no means the case of a bill of £310, 16s. 2d. reduced by taxation to £46, 1s., but a case, partly of reduction by disallowance of entire sums, objected to by Aspinall for want of authority, and partly of reduction, by limitation of the claim against one to his aliquot part, as if he were under no liability as to the remainder; and these are circumstances which ought to be considered.

If Mr. Howes be really aggrieved in this matter, I think that he has mistaken his mode of obtaining redress, and that he ought to have applied by petition, stating particularly the grounds of his complaint, and seeking to be relieved from the certificate.

[301] A case of Muskett v. Hill (see next case), resembling this in some of the circumstances, was brought before me in June last. In that case the special circumstances were stated in the certificate, but nevertheless the certificate itself appeared to me to be so expressed, as to make the order to tax the costs of taxation regular; and no application being made to be relieved from the certificate, the motion was therefore refused with costs.

Thinking the present application irregular, I must also refuse it with costs; but at the same time, seeing some reason to think that Mr. Howes may have a just ground of complaint, I refuse this motion, without prejudice to any other application which he may be advised to make, respecting the orders of the 7th of September 1838 and the 16th of July 1840, the taxation under the first order and the certificate of such taxation.

A solicitor was retained by A. B. and four other Defendants; A. B. having withdrawn his retainer, the solicitor delivered his bill against A. B., amounting to £19, 19s., which was referred for taxation; the Master, considering that A. B. was liable to one-fifth part only of several charges, struck off four-fifths thereof, and certified he had taxed the bill at £4, 10s. 6d. The client then obtained an order of course for payment by the solicitor of the costs of the taxation; a motion being made, on behalf of the solicitor, to discharge the latter order for irregularity, on the ground that more than one-sixth had not been struck off within the rule, but no application being made to be relieved from the certificate, which warranted the second order, the motion was, on that ground, refused with costs.

A solicitor was retained in this cause by Mr. Nicholls and four other Defendants. Mr. Nicholls having withdrawn his retainer, the solicitor delivered his bill of costs, amounting to £19, 19s. 2d. The principal items consisted of a charge of £13 for the office copy of the bill, and £5, 4s. 2d. for a close copy thereof.

[302] Mr. Nicholls obtained the usual order for the taxation of this bill, and the Master certified, that it appearing that certain items therein, amounting together to the sum of £19, 5s. 10d., concerned Mr. Nicholls jointly with four other Defendants, and that Mr. Nicholls's proportion thereof amounted to the sum of £3, 17s. 2d., and that the other items therein, amounting to the sum of 13s. 4d., related to Mr. Nicholls solely, he had taxed the bill at £4, 10s. 6d., which he found due to the solicitor.

Mr. Nicholls obtained an order of course, referring it back to the Master to tax Mr. Nicholls's costs of the taxation and of that application and incident thereto, and that the solicitor might pay such costs when taxed.

It was now moved on behalf of the solicitor, that the last order might be discharged for irregularity.

Mr. O. Anderson, for the motion, contended that there had not been a taxation off of more than one-sixth within the rule, so as to render the solicitor liable to pay the costs of the taxation; that there had been no taxation off of particular items, but the proportion to which the parties were liable had been settled by the Master, who had struck out such part as he considered other persons were liable to; that where items to which a party is not liable are struck out, such items are not taken into consideration in the computation of the one-sixth; Rigby v. Edwards (5 Mad. 20, and Beames on Costs, 301, 382), Marshall v. Oxford (5 Simons, 456). He also argued, that the retainer being joint, the five Defendants were jointly liable for the whole, as some might be unable to pay.

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Teed, contra, were not heard by [303] THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale], who said, that notwithstanding the special circumstances in the case, the Master had certified that he had taxed a bill of £19, 19s. 2d. at £4, 10s. 6d., and no application being made to be relieved from that certificate, which warranted the order for taxing the costs of the taxation, the motion must be refused with costs.

[303] HOLMES v. THE CORPORATION OF ARUNDEL. Dec. 9, 22, 1840.

By taking proceedings to expunge matter reported by the Master to be impertinent, a party adopts the report altogether, and cannot afterwards, unless by the special leave of the Court, take exceptions to the report as to passages reported pertinent.

The Defendants' answer having been referred for impertinence, the Master, by his report dated the 6th of November, reported some of the passages complained of to be impertinent, but he disallowed the remaining exceptions.

The Plaintiff caused the report to be filed on the 11th of November, and on the 16th of the same month he took out a warrant to expunge the impertinent matter, which warrant was returnable on the 19th.

On the 17th of November the Defendants filed exceptions to the Master's report, which they set down on the following day, and they duly served the order. On the 19th the parties attended before the Master on the warrant to expunge, when the Defendants' exceptions to the report, and the order to set them down, were shown as cause against expunging, and which cause was allowed by the Master. (See 11th General Order, Ap. 1828, 2 Russ. App. 7, and 22d General Order, Dec. 1833, 1 Myl. & K. App. xi.)

[304] After this, and on the 25th of November, the Plaintiff filed exceptions to the Master's report, as to the exceptions disallowed by the Master. He obtained an order for setting them down, and gave notice thereof on the 27th.

It was now moved on behalf of the Defendants, that the Plaintiff's exceptions might be taken off the file for irregularity; and that the order for setting them down to be heard might be discharged.

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Rogers, for the motion, contended, that the Plaintiff, having acted on the Master's report, by taking out the warrant to expunge, was not now in a situation to dispute its general accuracy; that he could not adopt it by expunging the matter reported impertinent, and at the same time reject it by taking exceptions thereto; they cited Beavan v. Waterhouse (2 Beavan, 58).

Mr. Wray, contra, for the Plaintiff, contended that the Plaintiff was right in the course he had adopted, and in his attempt to have the matter, reported by the Master impertinent, expunged; that he had not thereby in any way concurred in the finding of the Master on the other points; though it might have been different if the impertinent matter had been actually expunged; this the Plaintiff had been prevented doing, by the Defendants' exceptions to the Master's report, so that the record remained in its original state; in Norway v. Rowe (1 Mer. 135) it was held, that exception to a report of impertinence may be taken at any time until the impertinent matter has been expunged; Evans v. Owen (2 Myl. & K. 382) was cited.

Mr. Pemberton, in reply.

[305] Dec. 22. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. It is clear from the cases, that the Defendants were at liberty to file their exceptions, notwithstanding the warrant taken out and served by the Plaintiff; but I think, that the Plaintiff, having taken out and served the warrant, was not afterwards at liberty to file exceptions, without leave of the Court. The service of the warrant to expunge was a claim to have the answer made conformable to the report, and further implied a claim to the costs of the proceeding to have the answer so altered; and this proceeding appears to me to be inconsistent with the claim to have the answer further altered. It is very probable that the Plaintiff, when he took out the warrant, supposed that the Defendant would not except, and that if he had known that the Defendant meant to except, he would not have served the warrant, but instead thereof would have filed exceptions of his own, as he had a right to do; and it is possible, that there may have been circumstances which might have induced the Court to give the Plaintiff leave to except, notwithstanding the service of the warrant to expunge; but no leave having been obtained, I think, that after the service of the warrant to expunge, the Plaintiff was not at liberty to except to the same report. The cases of Norway v. Rowe, David v. Williams (1 Sim. 17), and Evans v. Owen, do not apply, because they all relate to the rights of parties, against whom the reports were made, and who had not, before the exception, adopted any proceeding of their own. This is a party seeking to avail himself of a report in his favour, though not to the extent he desired; and who, before taking the exceptions, had adopted a proceeding for obtaining the benefit to which the report entitled him.

This motion must therefore be granted.

[306] WEST v. SMITH. In re STEVENS AND OTHERS, Solicitors. Dec. 18, 22, 1840.

[For further proceedings, see 3 Beav. 492.]

An order intituled in a non-existing cause discharged for irregularity.

An order made upon petition on the merits cannot be discharged on motion, semble; but where the irregularity of an order, obtained on petition in open Court, consisted in its being intituled in a non-existing cause, the Court discharged it on motion.

An order had been obtained upon petition on behalf of Mrs. Maughan, for the taxation of her solicitor's bill. The petition was intituled in the above-mentioned cause and matter, and was duly served; the Respondents not having appeared, the order was taken upon an affidavit of service.

No such cause as West v. Smith existed in this Court, and though a bill in such a cause had been prepared, yet it had never been filed.

Mr. Pemberton, on behalf of the solicitors, now moved to discharge the order for irregularity on the ground that it was intituled in a non-existing cause.

Mr. Tennant, contra, contended, that the order having been obtained in open Court upon petition, could not be discharged on motion; Bishop v. Willis (2 Ves. sen. 113). That the order was intituled in the matter of the solicitors, and that this was sufficient to support it. (See Eastwood v. Glenton, 2 M. & K. 280; Lees v. Nuttall, 2 M. & K. 284.)

Mr. Pemberton, in reply.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. It is plainly irregular to intitle a petition in a cause which does not exist, and it appears beyond all question that such is the case here: but whether I can discharge the order on motion is a matter of practice which I will inquire into; the present [307] impression on my mind is, that I cannot on motion discharge an order made on petition upon merits. This order has however been made, on the suggestion that there is a cause bearing a particular title existing in Court, when the contrary appears; I will inquire whether this is an exception to the general rule.

Dec. 22. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS. This was a motion to discharge an order made on petition.

The objection to the order was, that the order itself, and the petition, on which it was founded, were intituled in a cause which never existed.

The order appeared to me to be clearly irregular, but it was argued that it could not be discharged on motion, because it was made in Court, and no irregularity appeared upon the face of it. That no cause was existing appeared only by affidavit.

On inquiry into the practice, I am of opinion that such an order as this may be discharged on motion. The motion does not in any way seek to impugn the judgment of the Court; and the only material part of the affidavit shews, that the title of the petition involved a false suggestion. It is clear that if this false suggestion had been known before the order had been pronounced, no order would have been made, and now that an error so material is known, the order must be discharged for irregularity on that ground alone, and without any consideration of merits. I find that in the matter of The Dovenby Hospital (1 Mylne & Craig, 279), the Lord Chancellor, after objection taken, discharged, on motion, an order [308] made in open Court upon petition, and this upon grounds which appear to me to make it proper to discharge this order on motion.

Discharge the order with costs.

[308] CHADWICK v. BROADWOOD. Nov. 9, 1840.

[S. C. 10 L. J. Ch. 242; 5 Jur. 359. See Real Property Limitation Act, 1874, 37 & 38 Vict. c. 57.]

Where property is under lease, adverse possession runs against the reversioner from the expiration of the lease, or from the time when the tenant pays rent to one claiming wrongfully to be entitled in immediate reversion.

A bill of discovery in aid of an action of ejectment, filed in 1840, stated that in 1776 A. B., being seised in fee, granted leases of the property which expired in 1825, and that the Plaintiff, as heir of A. B., was now entitled to the property, for the recovery of which he was about to bring an action of ejectment. The Defendant pleaded the Statute of Limitations (3 & 4 W. 4, c. 27), and averred that the Plaintiff had not been in possession or received rents for more than twenty years before the bill was filed: that the Defendant had entered into possession as purchaser in fee-simple in 1819, and had ever since remained in peaceable possession as tenant in fee. Held, that this plea could not, in law, be sustained; for there being no allegation that the rent had been paid to anyone wrongfully claiming to be entitled in reversion immediately expectant on the determination of the lease, the Plaintiff's right did not accrue until the expiration of the lease in 1825, or within twenty years from the filing of the bill.

This case came before the Court upon a plea to a bill of discovery, in aid of an action at law intended to be commenced by the Plaintiff.

The bill stated certain conveyances of December 1717 and July 1720, under which Sir Andrew Chadwick became seised in fee of certain premises in Broad Street, St. James's; that by indenture of lease, which was supposed to bear date the 2d day of June 1776, he demised a specified part of the property to F. Johnstone for sixty years, at a rent of £40 a year; and that he "executed divers other leases in writing, of such of the same premises respectively as were not comprized in the lease of the 2d June 1766, at and under divers yearly rents, each such rent exceeding 40s. by the year, and for long terms of years, commensurate or nearly commensurate with the number of years, which, at the respective dates of such other leases, was then to come in [309] the said term of sixty years granted by the lease of the 2d of June 1766; or at least the term of years, granted by such other leases respectively, were granted in such manner as that they would respectively expire at or about the time when the term of sixty years, granted by the lease of 2d of June 1766, would expire, or within one or two years prior or subsequent to that time."

That the Plaintiff was unable to set forth with precision the date of such indenture of lease, supposed to bear date the 2d of June 1766, or the dates of the other leases granted by the said Sir Andrew Chadwick, or the terms of years for which such other leases were granted, or the rents thereby respectively reserved; or the particular dimensions, boundaries, &c., of the pieces or parcels of ground thereinbefore described, as comprized in the indentures of bargain and sale and release of the 31st of December 1717 and the 22d of July 1720 respectively, or in the leases respectively, or of the messuages or tenements and buildings thereon, by reason of the Plaintiff not having in his possession or power the thereinbefore-mentioned leases, or any of them, or any counterparts or counterpart thereof."

The bill stated, that Sir Andrew Chadwick died in March 1768, intestate and without issue; and it then proceeded to state the pedigree of the Plaintiff, and to shew that he was the heir at law of Sir Andrew Chadwick; and stated, "That the said term of sixty years expired on the 24th of June 1825, or about that time; and that the other terms of years, granted by said Sir Andrew Chadwick as aforesaid, respectively expired at some time or times within two years, either prior or subsequent to the 24th of June 1825."

It also stated that the property had become vested in the Defendants for the residue of the said term; and [310] that the term having expired, the Plaintiff was seised and entitled thereto in fee, as the heir at law of Sir Andrew Chadwick. The bill further stated that the Plaintiff was about to bring an action of ejectment against the Defendants to recover possession, but that he was unable to proceed without a discovery. It charged that the Defendants had the leases and other documents in their possession, and prayed a discovery.

To this bill the Defendant pleaded the Statute of Limitations of the 3 & 4 W. 4, c. 27, whereby, after setting forth the second, third, seventeenth, and twenty-fourth sections of the statute, (1) the Defendant by his plea [311] averred as follows; that the Complainant or any person under whom he claims, or any other person or persons for his or their or any of their use; or in trust for him or them or any of them, was not, nor were within twenty years next before the filing of the said Complainant's bill, in the possession, or in the receipt of the rents or other profits of the brewhouse, messuages, tenements, lands, grounds, and hereditaments, or other the premises in

(1) The second section of this Act is as follows:—"And be it further enacted, that after the 31st day of December 1833, no person shall make an entry or distress, or bring an action to recover any land or rent, but within twenty years next after the time at which the right to make such entry or distress, or to bring such action, shall have first accrued to some person through whom he claims; or if such right shall not have accrued to any person through whom he claims, then within twenty years next after the time at which the right to make such entry or distress, or to bring such action, shall have first accrued to the person making or bringing the same."

The third section enacts, "That in the construction of this Act the right to make an entry or distress, or bring an action to recover any land or rent, shall be deemed to have first accrued at such time as hereinafter is mentioned; (that is to say) when the person claiming such land or rent, or some person through whom he claims, shall, in respect of the estate or interest claimed, have been in possession or in receipt of the profits of such land, or in receipt of such rent, and shall, while entitled thereto, have been dispossessed, or have discontinued such possession or receipt, then such right shall be deemed to have first accrued at the time of such dispossession or discontinuance of possession, or at the last time at which any such profits or rent were or was so received;" (this section, after providing for the case of a person claiming under a deceased person, and of one claiming under an instrument unaccompanied by possession, proceeds) "and when the estate or interest claimed shall have been an estate or interest in reversion or remainder, or other future estate or interest, and no person shall have obtained the possession or receipt of the profits of such land, or the receipt of such rent in respect of such estate or interest, then such right shall be deemed to have first accrued at the time at which such estate or interest became an estate or interest in possession."

The ninth section enacts, "that when any person shall be in possession or in receipt of the profits of any land, or in receipt of any rent, by virtue of a lease in writing, by which a rent amounting to the yearly sum of 20s. or upwards shall be reserved, and the rent reserved by such lease shall have been received by some person wrongfully claiming to be entitled to such land or rent in reversion, immediately expectant on the determination of such lease, and no payment in respect of the rent reserved by such lease shall afterwards have been made to the person rightfully entitled thereto, the right of the person entitled to such land or rent, subject to such lease, or of the person through whom he claims, to make an entry or distress, or to bring an action after the determination of such lease shall be deemed to have first accrued at the time at which the rent reserved by such lease was first so received by the person wrongfully claiming as aforesaid; and no such right shall be deemed to have first accrued upon the determination of such lease to the person rightfully entitled."

the said bill mentioned, or any of them, or any part thereof; and that no rent for or in respect of the said premises or any of them, or any part thereof, had at any time since the year 1815, or within twenty years next before the filing of the said bill, been paid to the said Complainant, or to any other person or persons for his use or benefit; and that if the said Complainant ever had any right to make any entry or distress in or upon, or to bring an action for the said [312] premises or any of them, or any part thereof, the same right accrued more than twenty years before the time of filing of his said bill; and that the said Defendant was not at any time, within upwards of ten years before the filing of his said bill, under any of the disabilities mentioned and described in the said Act of Parliament. And the plea averred, that, in the year 1815, Defendants Henry Broadwood and one James Goding entered into possession of all the said premises, except the houses in the said bill mentioned and described as No. 46 in Broad Street, and Nos. 13 and 14 in New Street respectively; and that in the year 1817 they entered into possession of that part of the said premises in the said bill described as the house No. 46 in Broad Street; and that in the month of April 1819 they entered into possession of the remaining part of the said premises in the said bill described as the houses numbered respectively 13 and 14 in New Street; and that when they so entered into the possession of the said premises respectively at the times aforesaid, they entered into the possession as the purchasers of the fee-simple and inheritance thereof respectively; and that from the respective times aforesaid to the month of January 1836, when Defendant Henry Broadwood became entitled to the entirety of the said premises, and was left in the possession thereof, and until he was so left in such possession, the said James Goding and Defendant H. Broadwood were in the continual peaceable and uninterrupted possession and enjoyment of the said premises as tenants thereof in fee-simple; and that in the month of January 1836 the possession of the entirety of the said premises was given by the said James Goding to Defendant Henry Broadwood, who entered upon the same as tenant in fee-simple thereof, and he hath ever since been, by himself and his tenants, in the continual, peaceable and uninterrupted possession and enjoyment thereof; and that since [313] that time he hath agreed to grant a lease of all the said premises to a trustee for all Defendants as partners in trade, and that all the Defendants are in the occupation of the said premises under such agreement. And Defendants, therefore, pleaded the said Act of Parliament, and such possession and enjoyment as aforesaid, and the matters aforesaid to the said bill, and humbly prayed the judgment of the Court whether they ought to make any answer to the said bill.

Mr. Girdlestone and Mr. Teed, in support of the plea, contended that there had been a clear adverse possession for more than twenty years; and notwithstanding the alleged leases, and any legal remedy the Plaintiff might have, still that he was not entitled to any assistance in equity; Cholmondeley v. Clinton (1 Turn. & R. 107). Secondly, that this case was brought within the third section of the Act pleaded, and that the right of the Plaintiff, and of those through whom he claimed, accrued, at the time at which rent had been last received by them, which was more than twenty years before the filing of the bill. That if the existence of the alleged lease brought the case within the ninth section, then time began to run when rent ceased to be paid to the party claiming in fee. They argued also, that the plea was right in form, in stating the particular facts on which the Defendants meant to rely as constituting the adverse possession; Hardman v. Ellames (2 Myl. & K. 732): and they referred also to Crouch v. Hickin (1 Keen, 385).

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Bird, contrâ. The statute of the 3 & 4 W. 4, c. 27 (sect. 24) does not apply to bills of discovery; but, even if this were a bill [314] for relief, the circumstances pleaded would not be a defence. Before the statute, an action of ejectment could not be brought after twenty years' adverse possession; but if there were an outstanding lease, ejectment could not be brought by the landlord until its expiration, and from that time, therefore, adverse possession began. As the mere non-payment of rent would not entitle the landlord to re-enter, so it would not create an adverse possession. Lord Eldon, it seems, in Cholmondeley v. Clinton says, that Lord Redeadales entertained some doubts as to the accuracy of the decisions at law on the point; but however that may be, the Legislature, by the ninth section of the Act referred to, has adopted the principle laid down by the Courts, and has expressly provided for the case of property being on lease; it is enacted, that in such a case, the right to bring an action to recover possession shall be deemed to have accrued, at the time when the rent shall be paid to a person wrongfully claiming the land in reversion, expectant on the determination of the lease. The lease in the present case expired in 1825, and the bill was filed in 1840, and within the twenty years. The plea nowhere states that the rent was ever paid to any person claiming adversely, quite the contrary, it avers that no rent at all has been paid; the case, therefore, does not come within the statute, and independently of the statute, the mere non-payment of rent by a tenant can never create an adverse possession.

They argued, secondly, that the plea did not bring the case to one single point, as it ought, but was multifarious as raising many issues:

And, thirdly, that it ought to be supported by an answer denying the possession of documents tending to prove the allegations in the bill, and to disprove the plea.

[315] Mr. Girdlestone, in reply.

Nov. 9. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. The Plaintiff, in this case, alleges himself to be the heir at law of Sir A. Chadwick, and he states that the property which he claims was subject to leases which expired in the year 1825, when his right to possession accrued; and that he is about to commence an action of ejectment, in aid of which he files this bill for a discovery. The Defendants plead the late Statute of Limitations, and aver that they have had adverse possession of the property for more than twenty years before the bill was filed; and the plea has been argued, as if it were a mere question, whether there had been adverse possession against a person, who, supposing he had the right, was entitled to proceed to recover the possession. Now, whether that were so or not, depends on the real, or, on the present occasion, the assumed, existence of the leases alleged in the bill. If there were no such leases, or if, from the frame of these pleadings, the leases ought not in any way to be taken into consideration; then, for anything that appears to the contrary, the Plaintiff might have proceeded to recover possession at any time since 1801; but if such leases are to be assumed to have existed as they are stated in the bill, then the Plaintiff's right to possession did not commence till the year 1825, and, in such case, he could not by any means have recovered possession before that time. This bill does not make such distinct allegations as might be desired; but taking the bill and the plea together, I am of opinion that, on the present occasion, I must assume that the leases were in existence, and consequently, that the Plaintiff's right to recover did not accrue until the year 1825, unless there are other circumstances in the plea which ought to determine [316] the matter in another way. What the Defendants allege is, that they purchased about the year 1815, 1816, or 1817, and having purchased, they entered into possession as tenants in fee, as owners of the fee and inheritance. What does the statute say in that respect? When is the right to recover possession of land, subject to a lease, to be considered as having accrued? Not from the time when any person dealing with the leases or dealing with those who are entitled to the leases, gets possession, and claims to be entitled in fee, but from the time when the person claiming under a lease pays rent to a party claiming wrongfully in reversion immediately expectant on such lease; for then the adverse title of the person who receives the rent under such circumstances is first really brought into operation against the party who claims on the expiration of the lease. We come then to the simple question on this plea (though very many others have been argued), whether the facts which are alleged on this plea, are such as to bring the case within the protection of the statute. The Defendants say, that they have paid no rent; that they entered into possession in the year 1815, 1816, and 1817, as persons entitled in fee; but they do not state that which the statute requires, namely, when the rent was first paid to a party claiming adversely, which is the time at which the right is to be deemed to have accrued. I think, therefore, the plea cannot be sustained.

Being of that opinion, I do not enter into the other points, it being unnecessary so to do.

On overruling a plea liberty given the Defendant to plead de novo, and to the Plaintiff to amend his bill.

Mr. Girdlestone applied to amend the plea, or to plead de novo.

Mr. Pemberton, contrà, contended that this was contrary to the usual practice; he cited 2 Dan. Pr. 231.

[317] THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS gave liberty to the Plaintiff to amend his bill, and to the Defendant to plead de novo.

NOTE.—An appeal was presented to the Lord Chancellor as to the liberty to plead de novo, but, after argument, the decision on that point was affirmed.

[317] HOPE v. HOPE. Dec. 3, 8, 1840.

[S. C. 10 L. J. Ch. 70; 4 Jur. 1124.]

An application for an order to examine a witness de bene esse, on the ground that he is the only witness to a material fact, ought to be made upon notice, and not ex parte.

The affidavit in support of such an application ought to shew the facts on which it is proposed to examine the witness.

An affidavit in support of such an application on belief only, that the witness is the sole witness to a particular fact, is not sufficient: it ought to state the reasons for such belief.

This was a motion to discharge an ex parte order, made on the application of the Plaintiff, whereby it was ordered "that the Petitioner should be at liberty to examine Mr. Bram Hertz as a witness for the Petitioner in this cause de bene esse, saving all just exceptions. And it was further ordered that notice of the order should be given to the Defendant Adrian John Hope, or a copy thereof be left at his dwelling-house or usual place of abode, with his servant, agent, or person residing there, six days before the said witness should be examined. And notice of the order was to be given to the other Defendants forthwith."

This order was obtained upon petition, supported by the affidavit of the Plaintiff's solicitor, who stated "That this cause had been instituted for the administration of the estate and effects of Henry Phillip Hope, Esq., deceased, the testator in the pleadings named, and particularly for trying the validity of a certain indenture or deed of gift bearing date the 9th of April 1838, made between the said Henry P. Hope, of the one part; the Plaintiff Alexander James Beresford Hope, of the other part; whereby H. P. Hope assigned, &c., unto [318] Alexander J. B. Hope, certain diamonds, precious stones, jewels, gems, and minerals, contained, on the said 9th day of April 1838, in a certain mahogany cabinet in the said deed mentioned and described; and that he had been informed and verily believed that Bram Hertz was a person of skill and knowledge in diamonds, precious stones, jewels, gems, and minerals: that the said Bram Hertz was intimately acquainted with the said testator for ten years previously to his death, and was employed and consulted by him with reference to the collection of diamonds and precious stones formed by him; that the said Bram Hertz made and arranged, under the immediate direction of the said testator, a catalogue descriptive of the diamonds, precious stones, jewels, gems, and minerals contained in the said cabinet mentioned and described in the said deed of gift. That the said Bram Hertz knew what diamonds, precious stones, jewels, gems, and minerals were in the said cabinet on the said 9th day of April 1838: that it was essentially necessary to the case of the said Alexander J. B. Hope to shew what diamonds and precious stones were in the said cabinet on such day, and to specify and identify such of the diamonds, precious stones, jewels, gems, and minerals then in the possession of the Defendants, the executors of the said testator in England, as were contained in the said cabinet on such day, and to shew the intention and views of the said testator in executing the said deed of gift of the 9th of April 1838; and that to the best of the knowledge, information, and belief of deponent, the said Bram Hertz was the only person who could depose to the several matters before mentioned, as essentially necessary to the case of the said Alexander J. B. Hope, and that such matters lay in the knowledge of the said Bram Hertz only."

[319] Mr. Turner and Mr. John Baily, on the part of the Defendant Henry

Thomas Hope, and Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Gardner, in the same interest, now moved to discharge this order. They argued, that the Court never permitted an examination of a witness de bene esse, unless in cases of absolute necessity; and had always shewn great jealousy of such an application, as a witness would stand pledged to re swear what he had sworn in his examination de bene esse; Bellamy v. Jones (8 Ves. 31). They contended that the order was irregular on several grounds: First, that it had been obtained ex parte, whereas it ought to have been applied for upon notice to the Defendants, in order to enable them to contest the truth of the allegations on which the order was founded; Shelley v. — (13 Ves. 56), Pearson v. Ward (1 Cox, 177), Bellamy v. Jones (8 Ves. 31), where the application had been made on notice. Secondly, that the affidavit, which was the foundation for the order, did not shew with sufficient certainty, as it ought, that Hertz was the sole witness of the facts as to which it was proposed to examine him; Bellamy v. Jones (8 Ves. 31); the affidavit merely stating, that "to the best of the knowledge, information, and belief" of the deponent, Hertz was the only person who could depose to the several matters. That the facts, on which such belief was grounded, ought to have been stated in the affidavit; for, as the case stood on this affidavit, it did not appear that the deponent had any knowledge or information on the subject. In Rowe v. — (13 Ves. 261), a motion was made to examine witnesses de bene esse "upon the affidavit of the agent, that he was informed by the witness that he could prove the particular fact, and believed he was the only person who could prove [320] it;" but Lord Erskine would not grant the order on an affidavit "not shewing the ground of the agent's belief that no other person could prove it." This affidavit ought also to explain how it happened that Hertz was the sole witness; Parsons v. Ward (1 Newl. Pr. 451). In Pearson v. Ward (1 Cox, 178) the Court "thought the affidavit did not go far enough, inasmuch as it was thereby only sworn generally that the Plaintiff had no other witness to support her demand, and did not specify in what particular manner his testimony affected the case, or that he was the husband's book-keeper, &c.; and if the Defendant insisted on the insufficiency of the affidavit, would make no order until a fuller affidavit should be made." Thirdly, that the affidavit did not sufficiently define the facts as to which it was proposed to examine the witness; according to the affidavit, the witness was to be examined as to "the intention and views of the testator," which was far too general, and did not enable the Defendants to cross-examine him as to the points on which he was to be examined.

Fourthly, that the order for the examination of the witness was too extensive, being for his examination generally, and not to those points exclusively as to which, as was alleged, he was the sole witness. If such an order could be supported, then when a person was a sole witness as to one fact, he would be allowed to prove de bene esse any number of other facts which many other individuals were capable of proving, and as to which, therefore, no pressing necessity existed for an examination otherwise than in the ordinary way. Frere v. Green (19 Ves. 319) was also referred to.

[321] Mr. Tinney and Mr. W. H. Clark, contra, contended that in case of a single witness, it was a motion of course to examine him de bene esse; that the practice was so stated by Sir John Leach in Tomkins v. Harrison (6 Mad. 315), and was so understood in the profession (2 Dan. Pr. 546; 2 Mad. Pr. 250), and was so stated in M'Kenna v. Everitt (2 Beavan, 188). That the fact of Hertz being the sole witness, was sufficiently proved by the affidavit of the solicitor, and that it must necessarily be on belief only, as the solicitor could have no personal knowledge on the subject; and that the affidavit in M'Kenna v. Everitt was on knowledge and belief only. That the facts on which he was to be examined were sufficiently defined, and were limited to the case made by the bill, and that the Defendants would have the same facility for cross-examining the witness as if he were examined in the ordinary way; and, lastly, that all orders of this description were in the form of the present, viz., to examine generally, saving just exceptions.

Mr. Turner, in reply.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS said he would not decide this case before he had had an opportunity of enquiring into the practice; but that he should not consider himself bound by anything which had fallen from him in M'Kenna v. Everitt on a point which had not been brought to his attention.

Dec. 8. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. This was a motion to discharge for irregularity an order obtained ex parte for the examination de bene esse [322] of a person alleged to be the sole witness of certain facts which the Plaintiff desires to prove in the cause.

Several objections are stated, first, that the order ought to have been made upon notice; secondly, that the affidavit does not sufficiently shew that the person proposed to be examined is the sole witness; thirdly, that the affidavit does not sufficiently define the facts upon which it is proposed to examine the witness; and, fourthly, that leave is given to examine the witness generally, and not merely upon the facts of which he is stated to be the sole witness.

It appears that in Hankin v. Middleditch (2 Bro. C. C. 640), Lord Thurlow made such an order ex parte, on an affidavit that the proposed witness was, as one James White was informed and believed, the only witness who could speak to the facts and circumstances to which he was to be interrogated; and for several years past the practice, as I am informed, has been, to pass such orders as of course both in the Registrar's Office and in the office of the Secretary at the Rolls; and the practice was so understood by Sir John Leach in Tomkins v. Harrison (6 Mad. 315), and was so stated by me in M'Kenna v. Everitt (2 Beav. 188), in consequence of information, which is correct, that such orders had frequently been made ex parte; but notwithstanding the practice which has thus prevailed, the case of Hankin v. Middleditch is the only reported case in which the order has been granted upon an ex parte application; and besides the reported cases of Shirley v. Earl Ferrers (3 P. W. 77) and Pearson v. Ward (2 Dick. 648), there are several unreported cases in which the applica-[323]-tion has been made on notice; and no case has been found in which the question whether the order should be made on an ex parte application has been raised and decided. Under these circumstances, I have thought myself at liberty to consider whether the order ought to be made ex parte; and considering the nature of the order, and that, in the case of a sole witness in good health, the order is not required suddenly, as may be the case when a witness is very old, or in a dangerous state of health, or under orders to leave the kingdom, whilst, on the other hand, the affidavit may state circumstances, of the sufficiency of which to warrant the order, the Court ought to judge, and for that purpose to have the assistance of the parties interested to oppose, I think that the application should be made on notice; and this is a sufficient reason for discharging the order. I ought, however, to add, that even if the order could have been sustained as an ex parte order, the affidavit does not appear to me to be sufficient, either to shew what the facts are upon which it is proposed to examine the witness, or that he is the sole witness of such facts; and I concur with Lord Erskine in Rowe v. — (13 Ves. 261), that the reasons for the belief ought to be stated.

The Plaintiff may now move, upon notice, to examine the same proposed witness de bene esse, and it may then be necessary to consider whether the leave to examine should be general.

The order is discharged; but considering the practice which has for a long time prevailed to grant such orders ex parte, I think that it must be discharged without costs.

The following authorities on the subject are placed in chronological order:—(1730, Michaelmas), Shirley v. Earl Ferrers, 3 P. [324] W. 77, on notice; (1785, February), Pearson v. Ward, 2 Dick. 648, on notice; (1787, July 15), Rochard v. Bosanquet, on notice, but foreign commission; (1788, January 19), Bridges v. Hatch, on notice; (1788, November 28), Jenkins v. Tucks, on notice; (1789, July 14), Hankin v. Middleditch, 2 Bro. C. C. 640, without notice; (1792, December 17), Cholmondeley v. Oxford, 4 Bro. C. C. 157, on notice, two witnesses; (1814, January 20), Gilbert v. Boyds, on notice; (1814, February 12), Watson v. Fosbrooke, on notice; (1838, September 17), Burton v. Blakemore.

[324] HALES v. DARELL. Nov. 10, 1840.

Annuities of £900 and £500 respectively, bequeathed by a testator to his two sisters, held not to be a satisfaction of annuities of £300 each granted in his lifetime, by him to them for valuable consideration.

E. H., for valuable consideration, granted to his two sisters annuities of £300 a year each, during their lives, payable in January, April, July, and October. By his will he gave his widow an annuity in lieu of the annual sum payable to her under her marriage settlement, and of dower; and he directed his debts to be paid, and bequeathed to his sisters respectively, annuities of £900 and £500 each for their separate use, payable on the usual quarterly days of payment. Held, that the annuities of £300 each were not satisfied by the annuities given by the will, and that the sisters were therefore entitled to both annuities.

Whether parol evidence of declarations of the testator, is admissible in such a case, to prove his intention, quære.

By indentures of lease and release, dated the 29th and 30th of March 1814, the release being made between Sir Edward Hales Bart., of the first part, Barbara de Jouchere widow (a sister of Sir Edward Hales) of the second part, and John Raphael of the third part; in consideration of £3000, Sir Edward Hales conveyed certain hereditaments to Raphael to the intent that Barbara de Jouchere might receive thereout an annuity of £300 per annum during her life by equal quarterly payments, on the 16th day of January, the 16th day of April, the 16th of July, and the 16th of October in every year, together with a proportionate part of the said yearly rent, up to the day of her decease, without any deduction; with powers of distress and entry in case of non-payment; and subject thereto to the use of Raphael, [325] upon certain trusts to secure the annuity; and Sir Edward Hales thereby also covenanted to pay the annuity.

By another indenture of the 13th of June 1814, and made between Sir Edward Hales, of the first part, Charles Bernard de Morlaincourt and Mary his wife (another sister of Sir Edward Hales), of the second part, Edward Darell of the third part, and the Honorable Philip Roper of the fourth part; Sir Edward Hales for the valuable consideration therein mentioned, and in consideration of natural love and affection, granted to Darell during the life of Mary de Morlaincourt, in trust for her separate use, an annuity of £300 per annum, by four equal quarterly payments, on the 6th of April, the 6th of July, the 11th of October, and the 6th of January, in each year; and after her decease, he granted an annuity of £150 to Charles Bernard de Morlaincourt during his life; with powers of distress and entry, in case of non-payment; and by the same indenture, Sir Edward Hales conveyed certain hereditaments to a trustee to secure these annuities; and also covenanted to pay them, and to convey certain estates to their issue. And Charles Bernard de Morlaincourt and his wife assigned to Sir Edward Hales all their claims to certain monies charged on the estates of Sir Edward Hales, in favour of Mary de Morlaincourt and her children; and C. B. de Morlaincourt also covenanted for the execution of similar assignments by their children.

Sir Edward Hales, by his will, dated the 2d of May 1826, devised his freehold estates to trustees, to the intent that his wife might receive during her life, in lieu of any annual sum payable to her under the marriage settlement and of her dower, an annual sum of £1500. He then created a trust for payment of his debts, and [326] devised his estates to trustees, upon trust, to pay an annuity of £900 unto his sister Barbara de Jouchere, for her life, and to pay an annuity of £500 to his sister Mary de Morlaincourt, for her life, and to pay other annuities. And he directed, that each of the annuities given by his will should be paid by four equal quarterly payments, on the four most usual days of payment in the year; the first of such payments to be made on such of the said quarterly days of payment as should first happen after his decease; and he also directed that the said yearly sums limited to Lady Hales, Barbara de Jouchere, and Mary de Morlaincourt, should be paid to them respectively for their separate uses.

Sir Edward Hales, the testator, died in March 1829. The Master, upon a reference made to him, certified that the annuities of £300 each granted to Madame Jouchere and Madame de Morlaincourt were not satisfied by the bequests of the two annuities of £900 and £500 respectively given by his will.

The Master in the course of the enquiry had admitted the evidence of Lady Hales, and of the gentleman who had prepared the testator's will, to shew that it was the testator's intention that the bequests should be in addition to the annuities previously granted by him to his sisters for valuable consideration.

The accuracy of the conclusion of the Master, and the admissibility of the above parol evidence was contested on behalf of the infant Plaintiff, who was entitled to the estates subject to the charges; and the questions now came on for argument upon the petitions of the infant and Lady Hales.

Mr. Stuart, Mr. George Turner, and Mr. Calvert, for the infant Plaintiff.

[327] Mr. Kindersley, Mr. G. Richards, and Mr. Prescott White, for the annuitants.

Mr. Pemberton, for the widow.

[328] Nov. 16. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. In this case, Sir Edward Hales, the testator in the cause, granted annuities of £300 each to his two sisters Madame de Jouchere and Madame de Morlaincourt, for their respective lives; and afterwards, by his will, gave to his sister Madame de Jouchere an annuity of £900 for her life, and to his sister Madame de Morlaincourt an annuity of £500 for life.

By his will he also gave an annuity of £1500 a year to his wife, for her life; and in the progress of the cause, it having become desirable to ascertain whether the annuity to the widow could be safely paid, it was referred, on the 30th of July 1839, to the Master, to inquire whether there were any and what charges affecting the estates devised by the will prior to the widow's annuity; and some further inquiries being authorized by a subsequent order of the 7th of March 1840, the Master, on the 13th of March 1840, reported that the charges, affecting the devised estates prior to the widow's annuity, were, amongst other things, the annuities of £300 each, granted by the testator to his sisters Madame de Jouchere and Madame de Morlaincourt.

The confirmation of this report was opposed by the infant Plaintiff, who presented a petition, praying for a declaration that the annuities of £900 and £500, given to the testator's sisters by his will, were given in satisfaction of the annuities of £300 each, which he had granted to them in his lifetime; and it being alleged that the circumstances had not been fully investigated, it was, on the 3d of April 1840, referred back to the Master to inquire further as to the two annuities of £300 each, and the two annuities of £900 and £500, and to state the result of his inquiry, with his opinion thereon, to the Court.

[329] Under this order he has made the inquiry directed, and on the 23d of July 1840 certified, that by indentures of the 29th and 30th days of March 1814, an annuity of £300 per annum was granted to Madame de Jouchere; and by an indenture of the 13th of June 1814, an annuity of £300 was granted to Madame de Morlaineourt; and he has stated his opinion that those annuities were not satisfied by the bequests contained in the will of the annuities of £900 and £500; but that the two annuities of £300 continued to be subsisting charges on the estates of the testator, subjected to the payment thereof, notwithstanding the bequests of the annuities given by the will.

In conducting the inquiry, the Master received parol evidence of the declaration made by the testator, which was tendered in evidence, for the purpose of shewing that the testator intended the annuities given by his will to be in addition to the annuities previously granted; and the petition now presented on behalf of the infant Plaintiff objects to the reception of some parts of the evidence which the Master has admitted, and objects to the conclusion to which the Master has arrived.

The consideration of the parol evidence objected to, is not material, if a just conclusion can be arrived at upon the grants of annuity and the will alone; or upon the grants and will, together with the evidence which is not objected to.

The deeds of the 29th and 30th of March 1814, referred to by the Master, were made for valuable consideration; and convey certain estates to a trustee, to the use and intent that Madame de Jouchere might, out of the premises, receive and take for her life an annuity of £300, to be paid quarterly, on the 16th days of Ja-[330]-nuary, April, July, and October, with a proportionate part up to the day of her death; and subject thereto, to the use of the trustee, in trust for better securing the same, with usual powers for that purpose; and, in the deed, the testator covenanted to pay the annuity.

The deed, of the 13th June 1814, was made in consideration of an assignment and certain covenants; and also purports to be made in consideration of the love and affection which the testator had and bore to his sister Madame de Morlaineourt. It is a grant to Mr. Darell, during the life of Madame de Morlaineourt, of a rent charge of £300, issuing out of, and charged on, certain estates, and to be received by Mr. Darell, in trust for the separate use of Madame de Morlaineourt, and to be paid on the 6th days of April, July, October, and January in every year, with a proportionate part up to the day of her death. The estates were then conveyed to a trustee for securing the payment of the annuity, and the testator covenanted for payment thereof.

In the argument, it was urged for the Plaintiff, that these deeds ought to be considered only as covenants, which, at least as to payments to be made after the testator's death, were merely executory. I need not observe, that the deeds, although containing covenants, are not of the character thus imputed to them. All that could be done by the testator for securing future payments was done.

The testator, being under the obligations imposed upon him, and his estates being thus charged by these deeds, executed as they were for valuable consideration, made his will, dated the 2d May 1826. He thereby, as is stated on both sides, made provision for the payment of all his debts, and devised his estates to trustees. As [331] to his freehold estates, to the intent that his wife might receive during her life, in lieu of any annual sum payable to her under the settlement, and of her dower, an annual sum of £1500; and subject thereto, and to the trusts for securing the payment of that annuity, upon trust to pay an annuity of £900 to his sister Madame de Jouchere, for her life; and to pay an annuity of £500 to his sister, Madame de Morlaineourt, for her life; and then to pay other annuities; and he directed the annuities given by his will to be paid quarterly on the usual quarter days, and that the annuities, payable to his sisters, should be for their separate use. Subject to the charges, the estates were to be limited to the son of Madame de Morlaineourt, with remainders, under which the Plaintiff is now entitled.

For the Plaintiff it is argued, that the covenants in the deeds were executory and have been performed, and more than performed by the gifts contained in the will.

A covenant to grant, or to secure an annuity, may be performed by provisions purporting to be a gift in a will; but having regard to the contents of the deeds, whereby the annuities of £300 each were granted and secured, I am of opinion that the question here is, not whether the covenants into which the testator had entered have been performed by his will, but whether the obligations into which he had entered, and the charges to which he had subjected his estates, were intended to be, and ought to be, deemed satisfied by the provisions contained in the will.

The question, therefore, appears to me to be a question of satisfaction; and although there are, unfortunately, inconsistent authorities which seem applicable to this subject, it sufficiently appears that, prima facie, the testator must be taken to have intended bounty; and that gifts, even more than equivalent in beneficial interest to satisfy the obligations, are not to be deemed satisfaction if there are circumstances, even slight circumstances, which lead to a different conclusion. Now here, the testator has directed the payment of all his debts, and amongst his debts are the annuities secured by the deeds. In his will, intending the annuity given to his wife to be in lieu of other annual payments to which she might be entitled, he has expressly said so; but he has used no such expression with reference to either of the annuities secured to his sisters. Again, the annuities secured by the deeds appear, by the Master's report, to be the first charges on the estates comprised in the deeds, but the annuities given by the will are subject to prior charges on the testator's estates; the times of payment are not the same, and the charges are of different natures; and, under such circumstances, it appears to me, independently of any parol evidence, that the annuities given by the will cannot be taken as a satisfaction of the annuities secured by the deeds.

Much greater doubt than there is in this case would, I think, be removed by the evidence, which is not objected to; but having formed my opinion upon the instruments themselves, it is unnecessary to consider the questions raised upon the admissibility and effect of the parol evidence.

The petition of the Plaintiff must be dismissed. Upon the other petition, confirm the Master's report, and let the Master inquire what is due in respect of the annuities of £300 each, and also in respect of the annuities of £900 and £500 respectively, and state the amount thereof in his general report.

[333] WEYMOUTH v. LAMBERT. Nov. 19, 1840.

Substituted service of a subpoena to appear ordered in a creditor's suit on one, who, acting as the attorney of the executor and general devisee and legatee resident in India, had obtained administration here, and had entered into receipt of the rents of the real estate.

By his will, dated in September 1828, the testator devised and bequeathed unto William Lambert, of Allahabad, in the East Indies, all his real and personal estate, and appointed him executor.

The testator died in November 1838. The executor, who resided in India, sent to his son, who was resident in England, a letter of attorney to enable him to procure letters of administration, and to receive all monies and give receipts.

In April 1839 administration was granted to the son, who took upon himself the receipts and administration of the personal estates of the testator; and on behalf of his father, entered into and was in the receipt of the rents and profits of the real estates, devised by the will of the testator.

This was a creditor's suit against the father and son, its object being to obtain payment of the testator's debts out of his real and personal estate. William Lambert was still resident in the East Indies, and his son was resident in this country. The son having appeared, it was now moved that the service of a subpoena on the son might be good service on the father.

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Dixon, for the motion. Mr. Kindersley, contra, contended that there were no cases in which service on one had been held to be good service on another, except where a party living abroad [334] was suing at law, and the Defendant at law applied for protection in equity; in which case, the Court had ordered service on the attorney of the Plaintiff at law to be good service. That with respect to the personal estate the son, who was administrator, represented the personal estates to all intents and purposes; and, as regarded the real estate, the subpoena might be served under the recent statute of 2 W. 4, c. 33.

Mr. Pemberton, in reply, relied on Kinder v. Forbes (2 Beavan, 503), and 1 Dan. Pr. 268, and the cases there cited. He stated that the statute referred to had proved ineffectual in practice.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS said, that perhaps the statutes might, on consideration, be found sufficient for the Plaintiff's purpose; he however considered the Plaintiff entitled to the order asked, which must be made, unless the Plaintiff should mention the case again. (See Hobhouse v. Courtney, V.-C. July 7, 1841.)

[334] HYDE v. WRENCH. Dec. 8, 1840.

[S. C. 4 Jur. 1106. See Stevenson v. M'Lean, 1880, 5 Q. B. D. 350.]

The Defendant on the 6th of June offered in writing to sell his farm for £1000; but the Plaintiff offered £950, which the Defendant on the 27th of June, after consideration, refused to accept. On the 29th the Plaintiff, by letter agreed to give £1000, but there appeared to be no assent on the part of the Defendant, though there had been no withdrawal of the first offer. Held, that there was no binding contract within the Statute of Frauds.

This case came on upon general demurrer to a bill for specific performance, which stated to the effect following:—

[335] The Defendant being desirous of disposing of an estate, offered, by his agent, to sell it to the Plaintiff for £1200, which the Plaintiff, by his agent, declined; and on the 6th of June the Defendant wrote to his agent as follows:—"I have to notice the refusal of your friend to give me £1200 for my farm; I will only make one more offer, which I shall not alter from; that is, £1000 lodged in the bank until Michaelmas, when the title shall be made clear of expenses, land tax, &c. I expect a reply by return, as I have another application." This letter was forwarded to the Plaintiff's agent, who immediately called on the Defendant; and, previously to accepting the offer, offered to give the Defendant £950 for the purchase of the farm, but the Defendant wished to have a few days to consider.

On the 11th of June the Defendant wrote to the Plaintiff's agent as follows:—"I have written to my tenant for an answer to certain enquiries, and, the instant I receive his reply, will communicate with you, and endeavour to conclude the prospective purchase of my farm; I assure you I am not treating with any other person about said purchase."

The Defendant afterwards promised he would give an answer about accepting the £950 for the purchase on the 26th of June; and on the 27th he wrote to the Plaintiff's agent, stating he was sorry he could not feel disposed to accept his offer for his farm at Luddenham at present.

This letter being received on the 29th of June, the Plaintiff's agent on that day wrote to the Defendant as follows:—"I beg to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 27th instant, informing me that you are not disposed to accept the sum of £950 for your farm at [336] Luddenham. This being the case, I at once agree to the terms on which you offered the farm, viz., £1000 through your tenant Mr. Kent, by your letter of the 6th instant. I shall be obliged by your instructing your solicitor to communicate with me without delay, as to the title, for the reason which I mentioned to you."

The bill stated, that the Defendant "returned a verbal answer to the last-mentioned letter, to the effect, he would see his solicitor thereon;" and it charged that the Defendant's offer for sale had not been withdrawn previous to its acceptance.

To this bill, filed by the alleged purchaser for a specific performance, the Defendant filed a general demurrer.

Mr. Kindersley and Mr. Keene, in support of the demurrer. To constitute a valid agreement there must be a simple acceptance of the terms proposed. Holland v. Eyre (2 Sim. & St. 194). The Plaintiff, instead of accepting the alleged proposal for sale for £1000 on the 6th of June rejected it, and made a counter proposal; this put an end to the Defendant's offer, and left the proposal of the Plaintiff alone under discussion; that has never been accepted, and the Plaintiff could not, without the concurrence of the Defendant, revive the Defendant's original proposal.

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Freeling, contra. So long as the offer of the Defendant subsisted, it was competent to the Plaintiff to accept it; the bill charges that the Defendant's offer had not been withdrawn previous to its acceptance by the Plaintiff; there, therefore, exists a valid subsisting contract. Kennedy v. Lee (3 Mer. 454), Jackson v. King (2 Bing. 270), were cited.

[337] THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. Under the circumstances stated in this bill, I think there exists no valid binding contract between the parties for the purchase of the property. The Defendant offered to sell it for £1000, and if that had been at once unconditionally accepted, there would undoubtedly have been a perfect binding contract; instead of that, the Plaintiff made an offer of his own, to purchase the property for £950, and he thereby rejected the offer previously made by the Defendant. I think that it was not afterwards competent for him to revive the proposal of the Defendant, by tendering an acceptance of it; and that, therefore, there exists no obligation of any sort between the parties; the demurrer must be allowed.

[337] PEARSE v. BROOK. Nov. 9, 1840.

Pending a reference of affidavits for impertinence, they cannot be used. The Court, however, will in such a case put the parties under terms, so as to meet the justice of the case.

This was a petition to discharge an order for taxation. Affidavits, which had been made in opposition to the application, had been referred for impertinence, and no report had yet been obtained.

Mr. Pemberton, for the Petitioner, observed that these affidavits could not be used by the Respondent; and he therefore proposed that the petition should stand over, on the Respondent's undertaking that all proceedings on the taxation should be stayed in the meantime.

Mr. Girdlestone and Mr. Terrell declined giving any undertaking, and insisted that the affidavits might be used notwithstanding the objection for impertinence, otherwise the mere referring a Respondent's evidence [338] for impertinence would operate as an injunction until the Master's report could be obtained.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale] said, that affidavits, while under reference for impertinence, could not be used in Court; that the Respondents must therefore either proceed without them, or give the undertaking, in which case the Petitioner would be put on terms to get the Master's report in a week. This he thought would meet the justice of the case.

[338] In re SHERWOOD. Nov. 4, 1840.

A solicitor, who is trustee, is not entitled to charge for his professional services, which must be assumed to have been rendered in his character of trustee; but under a contract properly entered into, he may be entitled to his professional charges.

This petition prayed for the taxation of the bill of costs of Robert Slee, a solicitor; and that in the taxation the Master might be directed to disallow all costs as solicitor, for business done by Robert Slee in his character of trustee under a deed of the 23d of May 1839.

It appeared from the affidavits made in the matter, that there being some dispute between John H. Short and Edward Richardson Slee (the brother of Robert Slee), as to whether Edward Richardson Slee was a purchaser or mortgagee of one-seventh of a reversionary sum of money standing in the name of trustees in the funds, which had, however, lately fallen into possession; and the deed of the 23d of May 1839 was in consequence executed. It was made between William Howard Short of the first part, Edward Richardson Slee of the second part, and Robert Slee of the third part; and thereby the property was assigned to Robert Slee upon trust, in the first place, to deduct and retain to [339] himself and themselves all costs, charges, and expenses incurred or paid by him or them in getting in, receiving, suing for, and recovering the said monies and premises, stocks, funds, and securities or otherwise, in or about the execution of the trusts thereby created; then to pay Edward R. Slee £200 which had been lent by him to W. H. Short; and to divide the remainder between William H. Short and Edward R. Slee; and the deed contained a proviso as follows:—

“And lastly, that he, the said Robert Slee shall; and he is hereby authorized and empowered to retain and receive, by and out of the monies and premises which shall or may come into his hands, under or by virtue of the trust hereby in him reposed, his usual professional costs and charges which may arise or be incurred in carrying into execution the trusts of these presents, or in prosecuting or defending any suit or suite or otherwise that may happen, as if he had not been the trustee of these presents, but had been employed and retained by them, the said William Howard Short or Edward Richardson Slee, their executors, administrators, or assigns, as their attorney or solicitor in the matters of the trusts hereby created.”

This deed was settled by counsel on behalf of Short.

A suit has been instituted in this Court, in respect of the property, which has been compromised, and in respect of which, Robert Slee the trustee incurred some costs.

On the 5th of September 1839 Robert Slee received the amount of the one-seventh share of the trust fund, and he prepared a release to the original trustees thereof, which was executed.

[340] Robert Slee (the solicitor and trustee), delivered to the Petitioner Sherwood, who was the legal personal representative of Short, three bills of costs, amounting to £12, 1s. 8d., £25, 9s., and £6, 5s. respectively; the first being the costs of the release to the trustees, the second the costs in the suit, and the third for the costs of a release which it was agreed should be executed by the Petitioner Sherwood to Robert Slee. Robert Slee, with the assent of the Petitioner, retained these sums, and paid over to the Petitioner his share of residue of the amount received, and on the 17th of September the Petitioner Sherwood executed to Robert Slee a general release of all claims, &c. The release had been approved of by a solicitor who acted in the matter on behalf of the Petitioner.

In July 1840 Sherwood presented this petition, alleging that Robert Slee, the trustee, being a solicitor, was not entitled to make any professional charges against his cestui que trust, and alleging that the above bills contained many excessive and improper charges; and it enumerated four charges of £4, 10s., 6s. 8d., 10s., and 5s., which it alleged ought to be disallowed, or partly disallowed. The Petitioner prayed a reference to the Master to tax the bills, with a direction to disallow all costs and charges for business done by Robert Slee, in his character of trustee.

Mr. Edward Younge, in support of the petition, relied on New v. Jones (9 Bythwood, 337), and Moore v. Froud (3 Myl. & Cr. 45.)

Mr. Randall, contrâ, relied on the special contract; the settlement of accounts; and the release deliberately executed by the Petitioner with the assistance of a professional adviser.

[341] THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. This is a petition for the taxation of the bill of costs of a solicitor which had been paid, on the ground, first, that the solicitor being a trustee, is not entitled to charge for professional business; and, secondly, that there are overcharges. As to the first, there is no doubt whatever as to the law on the subject:—A solicitor, who is a trustee, is not entitled to charge for professional services which must be assumed to have been rendered in his character of trustee, unless there be some special contract authorising him to make the charge, but under a deed or contract properly entered into and expressed, he may be entitled to his professional charges as a solicitor, though he act as a trustee. In several cases of wills, and amongst them that of Lord Thurlow, a solicitor has been authorised to make his professional charges. In Moore v. Froud it was considered clear from the form of the instruments, that the professional costs of the solicitor were not comprised in the costs to be allowed; but in the present case there is a special contract, and there is no allegation that it was obtained by fraud or any improper means; there are, therefore, no grounds for granting this part of the petition.

With respect to the other ground of complaint, it seems that this bill of costs was not delivered until after the time when the relation of trustee and cestui que trust has been brought to a close, otherwise it might have been open to greater question. It did not end there, for on the 5th of September a release was prepared on the behalf of the gentleman who now complains, and which was executed with the advice of his solicitor twelve days after the draft had been submitted; this settlement ought not to be opened unless there are errors to a considerable amount, or, as it has been said in some cases, [342] unless the overcharges be such as to amount to evidence of fraud. [His Lordship here referred to the bill of costs, in which there were several charges of about 6s. 8d. each, which he considered manifestly wrong, and proceeded.] Though there are some charges which I consider ought not to be allowed, there is no considerable error. Ought I after the parties have had a fair opportunity of examining the bills before the execution of the release, to open this matter? I think I ought not, and therefore the petition must be dismissed.

[342] STEPHENSON v. DOWSON. Dec. 7, 8, 13, 1840.

A testator bequeathed to A. B. all his ships and money due to him at the time of his decease: Held, that freight, earned by a ship under a charter-party executed after the date of the will and in respect of a voyage not completed until after the testator's death, did not pass to A. B. either as "money due," or as incident to the ship. Testator bequeathed the dividends, &c., of all stocks he should be entitled to at the time of his decease, in the public funds. He had £10,000 consols at his death, Held, that this was a specific bequest of that sum.

Two questions arose in this cause, which were discussed upon exceptions to the report of the Master; first, whether the freight passed to the legatee of a ship; and, secondly, whether upon the terms of the will, a sum of consols was a specific or general bequest.

The testator being the owner, amongst others, of a ship called the "Borodino," by his will dated the 29th of March 1822, directed all his just debts, funeral, and testamentary expenses to be, in the first place, fully paid and satisfied by his executors thereafter named, as soon after his decease as conveniently might be: and he bequeathed to his son John Row, "all his ships and shares of ships and money which at the time of his decease should be due and owing to him from Govern-[343]-ment, or from any person or persons whomsoever, to and for his own use and benefit absolutely; and he gave and bequeathed unto his said son John Row, for and during his life, the use and wearing of all his household furniture and plate; and he also gave and bequeathed to his said son John Row and his assigns, for and during his life, for his and their use and benefit, all the dividends, interest, and annual proceeds which should accrue due and become payable after his decease, for and in respect of all such stock and property as he should have or be entitled to at the time of his decease, in the Government or public funds or securities; and he devised unto and to the use of his said son John Row and his assigns for his life, all his real estate, and after the decease of his said son, he devised and bequeathed his real estate and his furniture, plate, and stock and property in the Government or public funds or securities upon certain trusts, for the benefit of the children of his said son. But in case his said son should die without having issue, then the testator devised and bequeathed his said real and personal estate upon certain trusts for the benefit of the Plaintiff.

The will contained no bequest of the residue of the testator's estate. John Row and the Defendant Dowson were the executors of his will.

After this, and on the 29th of July 1822, the testator executed a charter-party of the ship the "Borodino," to Messrs. Sheddon in consideration of certain freight to be paid when the voyage was completed. The ship proceeded on her voyage to St. John's, New Brunswick, and was engaged therein at the time of the death of the testator.

The testator died in September 1822, and in January 1823 the voyage of "Borodino" was completed, and the [344] freight then payable amounted to £827.

The first question, under these circumstances, was whether this sum passed to John Row the legatee of the ship, or formed part of the testator's general estate.

The Master having considered this sum of £827 a specific legacy, the question now came before the Court on exceptions to his report.

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Purvis, for the Plaintiff, contended, that the £827 did not pass to John Row, either as incident to the ship "Borodino," or as money which at the time of the decease of the testator was due and owing to him; for the bequest of the ship could not carry the freight which was not earned at the death, and which the legatee of the ship was not in a condition to recover. That even supposing the executor to have assented to the legacy of the ship, the legatee had no means of recovering the freight; for there being a charter-party, the lien of the owner became lost by the special contract; Cornell v. Simpson (16 Ves. 275), Schack v. Anthony (1 M. & S. 573). The legatee even after the executors' assent could not avail himself of the benefit of the covenant in the charter-party; Splidt v. Bowles (10 East, 279).

That the bequest of a ship subject to charter-party, was like a gift of a reversion subject to a lease; the charterer had a species of ownership which prevented the legatee taking possession until the expiration of the charter-party; Trinity House v. Clark (4 M. & S. 288); and that in the case of Kerwill v. Bishop (2 Cr. & J. 529) and Dean v. McGhie (4 Bing. 45), relied on by the other side, there was no charter-party, and [345] possession had been taken by the mortgagee. They argued, secondly, that the money payable for freight, did not become due and payable till the voyage had been completed, which happened after the death of the testator; and that this sum could not therefore pass as money due to the testator at the time of his decease; and that at all events, the legatee was not entitled to the proceeds of the voyage without defraying the expenses in respect of the ship, for which the testator's executors were liable, and adopting all the liabilities under the charter-party.

Mr. Kindersley and Mr. Lewis, contra. The amount of the freight passed to the legatee, John Row, as incident to the property of the ship; Case v. Davidson (5 M. & S. 79). In Morrison v. Parsons (2 Taunt. 407) it was held, that "If the owner of a ship, having chartered her for a voyage, assigns her before the voyage, though he afterwards assign the charter-party to another, if she earns freight, the assignee of the ship is entitled to the freight, as incident to the ship. But he cannot sue on the charter-party otherwise than in the name of the assignor."

A gross sum became payable for freight after the death of the testator, and, like the rent of a house or the dividends on stock, the whole passed to the legatee. The case of Splidt v. Bowles merely decided that the assignee of a ship could not sue in his own name on the charter-party entered into by his assignor; that did not, however, determine the equitable right; the assignor, on being indemnified, would have been bound to have allowed the assignee to sue in his name.

If John Row is not entitled to the £827, as incident to the ship, he is entitled thereto as a debt due at the [346] testator's decease; they cited, on this point, Carr v. Carr (1 Mer. 541).

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS said, that the case was certainly not free from difficulty; but that he was of opinion, that the amount payable for freight was not a debt due to the testator at the time of his death, for no debt accrued until the service which the testator had contracted to perform had been completed, and which did not happen till after his death.

That it had been argued, that the prospect or expectation of a debt to arise from the use of the ship under the charter-party, was to be considered annexed and incident to the ship; and though it had been decided that, under certain circumstances, freight would pass to a mortgagee in possession, and to the vendee of a ship, and though his Lordship thought the freight might be the subject of a specific bequest, yet that this was not the question here; the real point being, whether, under a will, not mentioning freight at all, freight, which became due after the testator's death, passed to the legatee of the ship. That, here, the ship was subject to a contract made after the date of the will, and which contract it was the duty of the executor to see performed, and for the performance of which the testator's estate was liable; and, under these circumstances, he could not suppose that the testator intended that the freight, which was to be earned at the expense of his estate, should pass to the legatee.

That, upon the best consideration that he could give to the case, he thought that the freight of the ship did not appear to be so incident or so annexed to the [347] ship, in this case, as to pass to the legatee as part of his specific legacy.

The second question was as follows:—There was standing in the bank books, in the name of the testator at the time of his decease, a sum of £10,600, 19s. 3d. consols; and the question was, whether the sum passed as a specific legacy under the bequest contained in the testator's will, of "all the dividends, interest, and proceeds which should accrue due and become payable after his (the testator's) decease, for and in respect of all such stock and property that he should have or be entitled to at the time of his decease, in the Government or public funds or securities."

The Master considered it a specific legacy, and exceptions were taken to his report.

Mr. Kindersley and Mr. Lewis, in support of the exceptions, argued that this was a general and not a specific legacy; for it was not a gift of any particular stock which the testator had at the time of making his will, but of the stock which he might happen to have at his death. That it, therefore, wanted the quality necessary for constituting a specific legacy, viz., a capability of being adeemed. They insisted that the case of Parrott v. Worsfold (1 J. & W. 594) was precisely in point: there a testator reciting that he had £1500 5 per cents., gave it to A., and then gave to B. all other his stocks that he might be possessed of at his death. The latter bequest was held not specific: and Sir Thomas Plumer, in giving judgment, said, "The deficiency of the residuary estate to satisfy the debts, which gives rise to the question whether the gift of the residue of the stock is specific [348] or not. Now the words are in their nature general, comprehending not only the stock that he had at the time of making his will, but all that he might subsequently acquire; if he had sold out and bought more, that would have been included. But has it ever been decided that such words would constitute a specific legacy? The ordinary criterion of a specific bequest is, that it is liable to ademption; that if the thing bequeathed is once gone, it is lost to the legatee. That criterion fails here; for it would equally pass stock acquired afterwards. Can it be said that a will made now, can contain a specific bequest of what may be bought hereafter; of what does not now exist? In a certain sense, it may be said that legacies of this kind are specific; as, a legacy of all the testator's cattle, or all his personal property at his death; but it is not specific unless you can fix on the individual thing given. But here it is general; the testator did not mean it to be confined to the stock he had at the time; he meant this daughter to be more largely provided for."

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Purvis, contra, contended that this legacy was a specific legacy. That the possibility of ademption was not an accurate test of a legacy being specific; for in many instances bequests of property which the testator might possess at his death had been held specific; thus, a bequest of all the testator's furniture, plate, or property at a particular house or place at the testator's death, had repeatedly been held specific; so a gift of all the horses which a testator might have in his stable at his death. Fontaine v. Tyler (9 Price, 98). That the quality necessary to constitute a specific legacy was, that it should be separated from the testator's other property; and that the instance of the ship, which had [349] been discussed in this very case upon the former exceptions, was decisive of this question. On this point Sibley v. Perry (7 Ves. 528), Simmons v. Vallance (4 Bro. C. C. 345), Bromsdon v. Winter (Ambler, 57), and Williams on Executors, 744, were cited.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. This bequest has been found by the Master to be a specific bequest, and his finding is objected to because the testator refers to such stock as he might have at his death, and not to that which he had at the date of his will. It was said, in argument, that there could not be a specific legacy of anything which the testator had not at the date of his will. I am of opinion that the proposition cannot be maintained: for a specific legacy is something distinguished from the rest of the testator's estate; and it is sufficient if it can be specified and distinguished from the rest of the testator's estate at the time of his decease. The question whether a legacy is specific implies the question of ademption, or, at least, very much so; but I think it has never been laid down, that there can be no such thing as a specific legacy, in a case in which the testator himself sufficiently specifies and distinguishes it from the rest of his property at the time of his own death. There are certainly continued instances of specific things of that nature being given; and in which, I believe, no doubt has ever existed of their being specific, as the case put by Chief Baron Richards (Fontaine v. Tyler, 9 Price, 98) of a bequest of the horses which the testator had in his stable at the time of his death: the common case of a bequest of all the plate which should be at a certain house at the time of the testator's death; or a library or collection of books [350] which the testator should have in a particular room: or of all the testator's wearing apparel and things of that sort. (See the cases 1 Roper on Legacies, 215, 216.) These cases seem directly in point. The particular quality which constitutes their specific nature, being this, that they are things which the testator has clearly distinguished and separated from the rest of his estate at the time of his death. I am therefore of opinion that this is a specific legacy.

[350] BECKE v. WHITWORTH. Nov. 12, 1840.

Under the 12th Order (1828), the Master has authority to enlarge the time for making his report more than once; and a second enlargement, made after the expiration of the fortnight, but before the expiration of the time limited by the first certificate, is regular.

On the 7th day of July 1840 the Defendant's answer was referred for impertinence upon exceptions taken thereto by the Plaintiff.

By the 12th General Order (1828) (Ord. Can. 8), where any order is made referring any pleading for impertinence, &c., it is to be considered as abandoned, unless the Master's report be procured within a fortnight, "or unless the Master shall within the fortnight certify that a further time, to be stated in his certificate, is necessary in order to enable him to make a satisfactory report."

The fortnight, in this case, would have expired on the 21st of July, but previous thereto, on the 20th of July, the Master certified that a week's further time was necessary to enable him to make a satisfactory report.

[351] On the 27th of July 1840 the Master again certified that a fortnight's further time was necessary to enable him to make a satisfactory report.

On the 8th of August the Master was attended by counsel for the parties, when it was objected he had no jurisdiction to enlarge the time twice. He, however, overruled the objection, and certified that the answer was impertinent.

It was now moved on behalf of the Defendant, that the certificate of the 8th of August, and if necessary the certificate of the 27th of July, might be discharged and taken off the file.

Mr. Loftus Wigram, in support of the motion. By the 12th Order, the Master has jurisdiction to enlarge the time for making his report but once, and by the 12th Order the exceptions are to be considered as abandoned if the report be not obtained within the further time stated. Having once enlarged the time, the Master had no further power to enlarge it, for it had been now decided that the Master has no jurisdiction to dispense with or relax the General Orders of the Court; Smith v. Webster (3 Myl. & Cr. 244), Lloyd v. Wait (4 Myl. & Cr. 257). At any rate, by the express terms of the order, the Master has only the power of certifying "within the fortnight." If any other construction were put upon the 12th Order, the Master might indefinitely postpone deciding the question, and the inconvenience which this General Order was intended to remedy would be continued.

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Stinton, contra, contended, first, that it was too late to object to the certificate of [352] the 27th of July, after the Master had made his report, and had certified that the answer was impertinent; and that the Defendant had by his conduct therefore waived the objection.

Secondly, that the Master had not exceeded his power by making a second certificate to extend the time; this was the opinion of the Court in the case of Davis v. Franklin (2 Beavan, 369). They also cited Burrell v. Nicholson (6 Sim. 212), and Millbank v. Stevens (8 Sim. 160).

Mr. Loftus Wigram, in reply.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale] said, that the objection as to jurisdiction having been raised before the Master, and having been overruled by him, the Defendant could not now be considered as having waived it, and it was therefore competent for him now to raise it; but upon the construction of the 12th Order his Lordship considered that the Master had authority to make the second order: he therefore refused the motion with costs.

[353] FELLOWES v. DEERE. Nov. 20, Dec. 23, 1840.

Liberty being given to amend, the bill was amended by striking out the names of several Co-plaintiffs, and suing by one on behalf, &c., of the others. Held, irregular: but the Court allowed the amendment to stand, security being given for costs. Plaintiffs ordered to give security for the costs, allowed to deposit money instead of giving such security, and a reference made to Master to approve of a proper sum.

Liberty being given to the Plaintiffs to amend their bill with costs, an amendment was made, whereby the names of thirty Co-plaintiffs were struck out, and the remaining Plaintiff was made to sue on behalf of himself and all other the parties to a certain agreement, mentioned in the pleadings, except the Defendant.

Mr. Grove now moved that the amended bill might be taken off the file with costs of suit, on the ground that the amendment was unwarranted by the order.

Mr. Wray, contrâ.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. It is clear what ought to be done in this motion; the Plaintiffs obtained liberty to amend their bill, and in doing so they have struck out some of their own names; by which means the persons, who, before the amendment, were liable to the payment of the costs of the suit, have rendered themselves free. This proceeding was clearly irregular, but if leave had been asked to amend in this form, it would have been granted upon terms. As the irregularity complained of is such as may be repaired, I think that no other order should be made, except that security should be given for the costs of the suit. There seems no other way of setting the matter right.

Dec. 23. Mr. Wray moved for liberty to pay £120 into Court, instead of giving security for costs, in order to save the [354] expense of giving a bond. He stated that the usual amount for which security for costs was given being £100, the sum proposed (£120) would cover the expense of making the deposit, and of taking the money out of Court again.

Mr. Grove, contrâ. This is not the case of security being given for costs by a party out of the jurisdiction, which, by the General Orders, is limited to £100, but of a security for all the costs already incurred in the suit; it does not, therefore, appear that the £120 would be sufficient. He cited Witts v. Campbell (12 Ves. 492).

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. The only question is as to the amount to be paid into Court, for it can never be contended that security for costs is better than the money itself. If the parties cannot agree on the amount, it must be referred to the Master to approve of a proper sum to be paid into Court as a security for the costs; that sum must be paid into Court, and carried to the credit of the cause to an account of costs.

[For subsequent proceedings, see 4 Beav. 386.]

A bill for redemption cannot be sustained by a party having a partial interest in the equity of redemption, in the absence of the other parties interested in it.

A person partially interested in an estate, may maintain a suit to set aside a conveyance of such interest fraudulently obtained from him, without making the other persons interested in the estate parties.

A person having a partial interest in a real estate which was subject to a mortgage alleging that such partial interest had been fraudulently acquired from him by the Defendant, who had also got from the mortgagee an assignment of the mortgaged interest, filed a bill for relief in respect of the fraud, and for a redemption. Held, that all the persons interested in the equity of redemption were necessary parties to the suit.

The bill stated that Thomas Grayling, being possessed of an estate which was subject to a mortgage for the sum of £200, devised it to Rye and Marchant upon trust, to permit Mary Middleditch to enjoy it for life, with remainder to the use of the Plaintiff in fee.

That Stone under a power of attorney fraudulently obtained, collusively sold and conveyed the property to Mrs. Thurley. That Mrs. Thurley paid off the mortgage of £200, and had it assigned to a trustee for her. The bill prayed that the power of attorney, and the conveyance by Stone might be declared fraudulent, and that on payment of the £200 and interest, the property might be reconveyed to the Plaintiff.

Marchant, the surviving trustee, was not made a party to this bill.

The Defendant put in a plea to the whole bill, setting forth the will of the testator, whereby it appeared, that the first trust of the real estate was to raise a sum of £150, and pay it to the executors or administrators of John Grayling Richardson. It averred, that this sum had not been raised or satisfied, and pleaded that the Plaintiff had not made Marchant, in whom the legal estate subject to the mortgage was vested, or any per-[356]-sonal representatives of J. G. Richardson parties to the bill.

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. James Russell, in support of the plea.

Mr. Kinderley and Mr. Mylne, contra.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. The plea in substance is this, that the trustees of a charge on the estate anterior to the interest claimed by the Plaintiff, and the persons beneficially entitled to that charge are not parties to this bill. If this had been a bill merely for relief in respect of the particular fraud imputed to the Defendant, I conceive it clear, that the other persons would not be necessary parties; but the bill is not so confined; the property was vested in a mortgagee, who was prevailed on to assign it to a trustee for the benefit of Mrs. Thurley; and the Plaintiff, not content with asking relief with respect of the interest which she says was fraudulently dealt with by the Defendant, asks also an assignment of the mortgaged interest from Mrs. Thurley; so that this bill, besides being for relief in respect of a fraud, is also a bill for obtaining an assignment of the mortgaged premises, on payment of the money due, and which I cannot distinguish from a bill for the redemption of the mortgage. If this be a bill for redemption, we are to consider whether the other persons are necessary parties, and whether this suit can go on in their absence? It is said, that no harm can result from one of several persons interested in the equity of redemption, being allowed to redeem in the absence of the others. I cannot say I am satisfied of that, but I am warranted in saying, that a compulsory bill for redemption cannot be maintained in this Court by a party [357] having a partial interest in the equity of redemption, in the absence of the other parties interested therein; and no authority for such a proceeding has been produced. It is contended, that the alleged fraud makes this case an exception to the rule, but in the argument of pleas and demurrers, allegations of fraud are only assumed for the purpose of arguing the question raised by the plea or demurrer; it can never be assumed, that the party has in fact been guilty of a fraud which is merely charged, for when it comes to the proof it may ultimately turn out to be without any foundation; I cannot therefore say that the particular charges of fraud, contained in this bill, are to be brought into consideration in determining the question, whether, in point of law, this plea can be sustained. Considering this to be a bill partly for redemption, the plea must be allowed, with liberty to amend.

[357] ORD v. WHITE. Dec. 16, 17, 1840.

The assignee of a chose en action, the assignment of which is available only in equity, takes subject to all the equities which subsist against the assignor.

On shewing cause against dissolving the common injunction, affidavits are admissible to prove facts alleged by the bill, but which are neither admitted nor denied by the answer. Semble.

This cause came before the Court on a motion to dissolve the common injunction, obtained for want of answer, the Plaintiff having undertaken to shew cause on the merits.

So far as appeared from the admitted statements, the facts of the case were as follows:—On the 19th of August 1825 the Plaintiff executed a bond to Mr. Attenborough for securing the repayment of a sum of £3000, and contemporaneously he executed a deed for keeping up a policy of assurance on his life.

[358] By a deed of the 19th of November 1830, made between the executors of Attenborough of the first part; the Plaintiff of the second part; and Mr. Shuttleworth, the solicitor of the Plaintiff, of the third part; after reciting that the sum of £3000 was still due, and that the Plaintiff had applied to and requested Shuttleworth to pay off the same, the executors of Attenborough, in consideration of £3000 expressed to be paid to them by Shuttleworth, assigned to him the bond and policy, and the Plaintiff thereby covenanted with Shuttleworth to pay the £3000, and interest and the premiums.

The execution of this deed was attested by two witnesses, described as clerks of Mr. Shuttleworth.

On the 1st of June 1835 Shuttleworth assigned this bond and policy to Dawson, as a collateral security for a sum of £3000, which he also secured by a mortgage of his real property, and by a policy for £1000; the bond, policy, and deed were thereupon delivered over to Dawson.

In February 1840 Dawson's solicitor gave notice, by letter, to the Plaintiff of this assignment, in answer to which the Plaintiff's solicitor wrote to say that the bond had been paid off many years ago.

In August 1839 Shuttleworth had mortgaged some other property not comprised in the deed of 1835 to the Defendants Messrs. White and Borrett, to secure the repayment of £2500; and in September Shuttleworth mortgaged the whole of his real property to the Defendants Messrs. White and Borrett, for securing moneys not exceeding £2000. These securities being inadequate, Shuttleworth assigned to the Defendants Messrs. White and Borrett the policy for £1000, previously assigned to Dawson, as [359] a further security for the sums of £2500 and £2000, which were due to them.

Messrs. White and Borrett, having notice from Dawson that the Plaintiff alleged that the bond had been paid, negotiated with Dawson for a transfer of his securities; and on the 23d of May 1840, in consideration of £2800, Dawson assigned to Messrs. White and Borrett the bond and policy for £3000, and the mortgage securities.

In June 1840 Messrs. White and Borrett sold the property comprised in the deed of June 1835 for £2027, which, after payment of the expenses amounting to about £50, they retained in discharge of their debt.

The Defendants, Messrs. White and Borrett also received a sum of £1000 in respect of the policy assigned to them. They afterwards commenced an action at law against the Plaintiff upon the bond, in the name of Attenborough, to recover the amount, and in which they recovered judgment pending this suit.

The Plaintiff Ord filed this bill, alleging that between the month of May 1828 and July 1829, he had furnished Shuttleworth and his partners, who were his solicitors, with moneys amounting to £3188, for the purpose of being applied in payment of the amount due on the bond to Attenborough. That it was paid, and that the bond ought to have been, and that Shuttleworth had informed him that it had been, cancelled. That he had no recollection of having executed the deed of November 1830, which, he alleged, must have been executed four or five years after the date, as the witnesses who represented themselves to be the clerks [360] of Shuttleworth were not in his service until many years after the date of that deed.

The Plaintiff prayed a declaration that the assignment of August 1839 of Shuttleworth to Dawson might be declared fraudulent and void; that it might, together with the bond and policy, be delivered up, and for an injunction to restrain the action at law.

The Plaintiff obtained the common injunction for want of answer. The Defendants, Messrs. White and Borrett, put in their answer, whereupon they moved to dissolve the injunction, and against which the Plaintiff now shewed cause.

The Defendants, by their answer, disavowed any knowledge of any fraud, and stated that they did not know whether the Plaintiff had employed Shuttleworth & Co. as his solicitors, or whether he had made the payments stated in the bill; but they said that the deed of November 1830 appeared to be executed by the Plaintiff, and that there was nothing in it to excite suspicion: and that a receipt for £3000, as paid to Attenborough by Shuttleworth appeared indorsed thereon; they alleged, that the Plaintiff, being a party to and executing the deed of November 1830, enabled Shuttleworth to deal with it as a genuine and bona fide deed and assignment of the bond and policy; but they said they did not know, &c., and they neither admitted nor denied the allegation as to the attesting witnesses to the deed of November 1830; they, however, admitted that before completing their arrangements with Dawson, they had notice that the Plaintiff disputed his liability on the bond; but they alleged that Dawson had no notice at the time of advancing the £3000, and that, therefore, they were entitled to protect themselves by Dawson's [361] want of notice. There were other facts of which they were ignorant, and which they neither admitted nor denied.

Affidavits were made on behalf of the Plaintiff by the two attesting witnesses of the deed of November 1830 (being the assignment from Attenborough to Shuttleworth, in which they were represented as being the clerks of Shuttleworth) to shew that they entered the service of Shuttleworth, the one in April 1834, and the other in January 1835. An affidavit was also made by the Plaintiff, which it was proposed to read as to facts and circumstances alleged by the bill, but of which the Defendants, by their answer, professed themselves ignorant, and which they neither admitted nor denied.

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Bird, in support of the injunction.

To support the injunction, it is not necessary that the Court should find a case which would entitle the Plaintiff to relief at all events. It is quite sufficient, if the Court finds upon the pleadings and upon the evidence, a case which makes the transaction a proper subject of investigation in a Court of Equity, Glascott v Lang (3 Mylne & Cr. 455); and, though, "if there be a legal debt and only some equitable circumstances upon which the injunction is sought, the Court will not allow the debtor to retain the money in his own hands;" yet where the question is, whether there is a debt at all, the Court will continue the injunction without obliging the Plaintiff to bring the money into Court; The Earl of Milltown v. Stewart (18). An assignee of a bond, or other chose in action not assignable at law, takes sub-[362]ject to all the equities subsisting between the obligor and obligee; Hamill v. Stokes (4 Price, 161), Coles v. Jones (2 Vern. 692), Priddy v. Rose (3 Mer. 86). And if the bond has been paid, a purchaser even without notice cannot avail himself of it; Turton v. Benson (1 P. Wms. 495), where it was said, "Supposing a man should assign over a satisfied bond as a security for a just debt, the assignee could not set up this bond in equity, which, being satisfied before, could receive no new force from the assignment. That it was incumbent on anyone who took an assignment of a bond, to be informed by the obligor concerning the quantum due upon such bond, which, if he neglected to do, it was his own fault, and he should not take advantage of his own laches."

Shuttleworth was subject to all the equities between the Plaintiff and Attenborough, and in addition, to those to which, as solicitor to the Plaintiff, he had rendered himself liable. In the next place Dawson and the Defendants, taking but a chose in action, are liable to all the previous equities; the Defendants also, who had notice of the Plaintiff's disputing the debt, were bound to make proper inquiries and obtain the concurrence of the obligor of the bond, and they cannot shelter themselves either by the want of notice in Dawson or by their own wilful ignorance. The Defendants have received from the sale of the estates and from the policy, nearly sufficient to discharge the debt.

If the affidavits be admitted, the whole of the allegations in the bill would be proved; and by the practice of the Court, they are admissible to prove circumstances neither admitted nor denied by the answer. In Addis v. [363] Campbell (1 Beavan, 258), affidavits were admitted, to this extent, on a motion for the production of papers; so in Farrer v. Hutchinson (3 Younge & Coll. 706), affidavits were admitted to the same extent on a motion to pay money into Court. The rule is, that affidavits cannot be used to contradict the answer; but allegations, which the answer neither admits nor denies, or which are not noticed by the answer, may be proved by affidavit, Morgan v. Goode (3 Mer. 10), Jefferys v. Smith (1 Jac. & W. 298).

There is, therefore, enough of doubt and suspicion in this case to induce the Court to continue the injunction, and that without putting the Plaintiff upon any terms.

Mr. Kindersley and Mr. G. Turner, contra, contended that even if the bond had been really paid, still the Defendants would be entitled to recover; for the Plaintiff, by executing the deed of November 1830, had thereby recognized the existence of the debt, and, by concurring in its assignment, had precluded himself from disputing it, they insisted nevertheless, that there was no evidence whatever of its having been paid, except the affidavit of the Plaintiff, which was inadmissible in evidence.

That this was not the case of assignees of a chose in action, for the obligor joined in the original assignment: nor was the bond in its nature available only in equity, for at law the Defendant had a right to sue in the name of the obligee, and a Court of law would set aside a release executed by the obligee to defeat the assignee. Legh v. Legh (1 Bos. & P. 447), Spicer v. Todd (2 C. & Jer. 165), White [364]-head v. Hughes (2 Cr. & M. 318), Emery v. Mucklow (10 Bing. 23). That the payments, if made, must have been made to Shuttleworth generally, on account of a general balance; and that if paid in discharge of the bond it would have been a defence at law, instead of which defence the Plaintiff had pleaded non est factum. Dawson clearly had no notice, and an assignee with notice may avail himself of the want of notice in his assignor.

That the affidavits were inadmissible on the present occasion, and were admissible only to verify documents, Taggart v. Hewlett (1 Mer. 499); the rule was expressly laid down by Lord Eldon in Barrett v. Tickell (Jacob, 157), he says, "I do not recollect that the exception to the rule as to affidavits has been carried further than this; that if deeds or letters be stated in the bill, and the Defendant says he does not know whether the statement is correct or not, then you may verify them by affidavit; but as to facts and circumstances which the Defendants do not know of, if you cannot have the benefit of them from the Defendants' consciences, you cannot have the benefit of them at all, except so far as you may be able to prove them at the trial." At all events, as the Defendants have a legal right, the injunction ought only to be continued on the terms of the Plaintiff bringing the money into Court.

Mr. Pemberton, in reply.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. In this case the question is, whether an injunction obtained to restrain an action at law, shall or shall not be continued on the merits now disclosed to the Court.

[365] The Plaintiff is the obligor of a bond for £3000, executed on the 19th of August 1825, to Mr. Attenborough to secure the sum of £3000. The Defendants Messrs. White and Borrett are the persons who hold the bond as assignees from the executors of Dawson, who was the assignee of the bond from Shuttleworth, who was the assignee of the bond from the executors of Attenborough, the obligee. The contest is therefore between the obligor, and the assignee several times removed, and the Plaintiff prays to be relieved from the bond, on the allegation that it has been fully satisfied by him, and afterwards dealt with in fraud of his rights. He alleges that the bond being executed in 1825, he caused payments in satisfaction of the bond to be made, from May 1828 to July 1829; and that in July 1829 the final sum was paid which ultimately closed the account of the bond. The statement of the Defendants is, that they know nothing of these matters, but they allege that they have now in their possession a deed dated the 19th of November 1830, purporting to have been executed by the executors of Attenborough the original obligee, by the Plaintiff and by Shuttleworth, by which it is recited that the amount of the bond was paid to the executors of Attenborough by Shuttleworth, and contains a covenant on the part of the Plaintiff to pay the amount of the bond to Shuttleworth and other covenants; this they say is a recognition of the money being due on the bond at the time of the date of the deed; and they state also that there was nothing to excite the least suspicion of its validity, and, therefore, they insist they ought not to be prevented prosecuting their proceedings at law.

I have always understood that the assignee of a chose in action, assigned by an instrument which is available [366] only in equity, must take subject to all equities which subsist as against the assignor. Shuttleworth, the first assignee, being subject to the previous equities, assigned the bond to Dawson, who, being an assignee of a chose in action, took it subject to all the equities existing as against Shuttleworth. At the same time, however, he took other securities, namely, a mortgage of freeholds and an assignment of a policy of assurance. All these transactions took place without any intervention or knowledge on the part of Messrs. White and Borrett; but, in the year 1839, the transactions between Messrs. White and Borrett occurred; Shuttleworth, being considerably indebted to them, executed certain securities dated in August, September, and November 1839: and it was about this time that they seem to have become acquainted with the transaction between Shuttleworth and Dawson; for it appears that Shuttleworth having become bankrupt in December 1839, inquiries were made by Capron, the solicitor of the representatives of Dawson, as to the transactions between the Plaintiff and Shuttleworth, and the result was, that a statement was made by the solicitor of the Plaintiff that he disputed the validity of the bond, and the right of any person to claim payment, on the ground that the bond had long since been satisfied by him.

This information was communicated to Messrs. White and Borrett, before they had acquired any interest in the bond. Their own securities being defective, they were anxious to improve them by obtaining a transfer of Dawson's securities; which they had a right to do, so far as it was consistent with the rights of the other parties. They had notice that the claim on the bond was disputed by the Plaintiff, but they were advised that they might obtain a right to stand in the place of Dawson, who had [367] no notice whatever, and so obtain the benefit of the security. They accordingly obtain an assignment of the bond, &c., for the purpose of making good the deficiency on their other securities; it appears they have realised large sums of money from the real property mortgaged to Dawson, and which the Plaintiffs insist ought to be applied in satisfaction of their claim as assignees of Dawson. The question then is, whether, under these circumstances, the injunction ought to be continued; I am of opinion on these facts, that there is so much doubt, that it must be continued.

It is not necessary to decide the question as to the admissibility of the affidavits, but the point having been argued, I think it right to state my present opinion; which is, that where facts of this nature, essential to the Plaintiff's case, are alleged in the bill, and the Defendant, by his answer, says he knows nothing respecting them, and neither admits nor denies them, it is competent to the Plaintiff to prove them by affidavit. I should submit with the greatest respect to what Lord Eldon said in Barrett v. Tickell, if I could see that his attention had been called to the former cases in which he is reported to have expressed a contrary opinion. It is not however necessary to decide the point in this case, but I state the present inclination of my opinion, in order that parties may be aware of the impression which they will have to remove from my mind in cases similarly situated. If the affidavits were to be received in the present case, there could be no doubt of the propriety of continuing the injunction.

Another point discussed was as to proceedings of Courts of law in such matters, but the very circumstance that an action can only be brought in the name of [368] Attenborough, shews plainly that the Defendants have not got an effectual legal assignment.

The injunction, therefore, must be continued; the question remains whether I should impose any terms on the Plaintiff; and considering the circumstances and the amount of the money already realised on the collateral security, I think I ought not to order the money to be paid into Court; but if the Defendants have been prevented entering up their judgment or registering it, they ought to have the opportunity of doing so.

[368] BIEDERMAN v. SEYMOUR. Nov. 19, 1840; Jan. 16, 1841.

Where real estates are devised to the heir, although for certain purposes he takes by descent; yet, as between him and the devisees of other parts of the testator's estates, the estates devised to the former are not to be applied in payment of the debts in priority to the estates devised to the latter.

Though the creditors of a testator have a right to resort to the estate devised to the heir, in priority to the other devised estates, yet the heir is entitled to contribution from the other devisees, to the extent to which his estate may be exhausted by debts.

The testator in this case, who died prior to the 3 & 4 W. 4, c. 106, had devised certain real estates to his heir at law, subject to the payment of an annuity of £50 to the testator's sister during her life, and after her death to the payment of £1000 to her two children. He also devised other real estates to other persons. There being a deficiency of personal assets, the question was, whether the estates devised to the heir, which in law would be considered as descended, should be first resorted to, in exoneration of the estates devised to the other persons.

[369] Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Cankrien, for the other devisees. The devise to the heir is absolutely void. He takes by descent (Dyer, 124, pl. 38, 1; Hargrave Co. Lit. 12 b. note), and cannot elect to take by devise (Preston v. Holmes, Styles, 148); the descended estates must, therefore, be applied in payment of the debts before the devised estates. Hurmoord v. Oglander (8 Ves. 124), Davies v. Topp (1 Bro. C. C. 524). The descended estates would be first liable in a Court of law, and there is no reason for altering the rule in a Court of Equity. They referred to Scott v. Scott (1 Eden, 458; and Ambler, 383; and to Seton on Decrees, 98; and Ram on Assets, 374).

Mr. Dixon, for the heir at law. The heir takes by descent, only for certain purposes, and not to the extent of charging him with the testator's debts in exoneration of the other devisees. The question is one of intention, and the testator has expressed his intention of bounty in favour of his heir, as much as in favour of the other devisees. The order in which assets are to be applied, is a mere regulation of equity, and the reason that descended estates are first applied, is to give effect to the testator's intention of bounty in favour of his devisees; but where the rule would defeat the expressed intention in favour of the heir, it has no longer any application. He cited Nottingham v. Jennings (1 P. Williams, 23), Chaplin v. Chaplin (3 P. Williams, 367, note a.), and Bailey v. Ekins (7 Ves. 323).

Jan. 16, 1841. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. In this case the question reserved was, whether the real estate which the testator devised to his heir at law, [370] is to be taken as real assets, for payment of debts, in priority to real estates, by the same will devised to other persons.

The devise to the heir is made subject to the payment of an annuity of £50 to the testator's sister during her life, and after her death to the payment of £1000 to her two children.

Notwithstanding the devise, and notwithstanding the charges, the heir takes by descent, Chaplin v. Leroux (5 M. & S. 14; and see Fearn's Posthumous Works, 229). For the purpose of making him take otherwise than by descent, the devise is said to be void; and it is argued for the Defendants that the devise is void for all purposes: that no intention can be applied to it: that the attempted devise must be treated as a mere nullity, and the estate therein comprised be considered merely as descended estates, and therefore as assets to be applied for the payment of debts, in priority to estates effectually devised.

By whatever may be the origin of the rule, which gives to the heir by descent, that which the testator has intended to devise; whether the rule be derived from the supposed application of a principle that a man shall not have by gift that which is his own without gift, as some have supposed; or whether the rule be adopted for the benefit of third persons, as of the lord for the preservation of tenure, or of creditors for the payment of their debts; or simply, as Mr. Justice Bayley said in Chaplin v. Leroux, because it is convenient that the property should be assets in the hands of the heir; there seems to be no reason, why, as against the heir, the rule should be extended further than the principle requires.

[371] It cannot be said of estates expressed to be devised to the heir, as of estates not mentioned in the will, that they are "quite out of the scope of the testator's intention, perfectly beside and independent of it" (2 Bro. C. C. 262); it is indeed clear that an estate which the testator says he devised to the heir, is within the testator's intention, and meant to be a benefit to the heir. There is nothing illegal in that intention, and if the rule be founded on the regard due to third persons, as creditors or otherwise, there seems no reason for its application between the heir and other objects of the testator's bounty; and if the effect of the devise, be to procure for the heir a contribution from the other devised estates towards payment of debts, which would otherwise have had to be borne by descended estates alone, it cannot be said that the heir obtains by gift something which was his own, without gift.

Courts of Justice ought to carry into effect the intentions of testators as far as they can consistently with the rules of law; and in this case, although the rule of law makes the devised estates assets in the hands of the heir, and the creditors may, therefore, resort to this estate in priority to others, and without being embarrassed with the necessity of seeking contribution from other devisees; yet, as it appears by the expressions which the testator has used, to have been his intention that the devisee, who is heir, should partake of his bounty as well as other devisees, there seems to be no reason why, without prejudice to the claims of creditors or others, the heir should not enjoy the like benefit which is given to other devisees; or why those who claim under the will, and do not appear to be more [372] objects of the testator's bounty, should be permitted to defeat the expressed intention in favour of the heir.

I do not think that the testator's intention can be excluded from the consideration of this question. The intention is not to prevail against the rule of law for the benefit of third persons. A testator cannot, as against creditors, exempt his personal estate from payment of his debts, or prevent his real estates from being assets, by devising them to his heir; but we may collect from his will an intention, that, as amongst those claiming under the will, the personal estate, or any portion of the real estate, shall be exonerated; and if there be an equal intention to give to devisees named, and the gift must be encroached upon by the liability of the subjects of them to pay debts, I think the doctrine that the heir, who is devisee, shall take by descent, does not afford a sufficient reason for saying, that the burden of the debts should not be borne rateably by the devisees, although one of them is heir; and I am of opinion that although the creditors have a right to resort to the estate devised to the heir, in priority to the other devised estates, yet that the heir will be entitled to contribution from the other devisees to the extent in which his estate may be exhausted by debts.

NOTE.—Since the 3 & 4 W. 4, c. 106, s. 3, the heir would not take by descent.

[373] WILLSON v. LEONARD. Dec. 5, 7, 9, 1840.

Assignee of leaseholds accepting the benefit of an assignment, Held, in equity, liable to the covenants on his part contained in the assignment, though he did not execute it.

Testator charged his real estate with his debts, Held, that the real estate was subject to damages, accrued after his death, under an equitable liability to indemnify.

Devisee not bound by the amount of a claim substantiated against the executors in an action at law to which he was not a party.

By indenture of lease dated the 7th of April 1818, Thomas Parkinson demised certain property to George Mordaunt from the 25th of March 1818, for the term of sixteen years wanting seven days, at a rent of £115, and Mordaunt thereby, for himself, his heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns, covenanted with Parkinson to pay the rent and certain taxes, to keep in repair during the term, and to deliver up possession at the end thereof.

Mordaunt retained possession till 1821, in which year, by an indenture dated the 28th of April 1821, he assigned the property to the Plaintiff Willson, for the remainder of the term, and the Plaintiff thereby covenanted for himself, &c., during the continuance of the lease, to perform the covenants in the original lease, and to indemnify Mordaunt.

On the 9th of April 1823 the Plaintiff entered into a written contract with Adam Chadwick, whereby the Plaintiff agreed to assign to Chadwick the above lease, "subject to the specifications in the said lease;" and Chadwick "agreed to take the said house and premises upon the said terms." In pursuance of this agreement the Plaintiff afterwards executed an assignment of the lease, subject to the rent and covenants, and thereby Chadwick purported to covenant with the Plaintiff to pay the rent and perform the covenants of the lease, and to indemnify the Plaintiff therefrom. This assignment was indorsed on the original lease, and was executed by the Plaintiff alone, and was delivered over to [374] Chadwick. Chadwick took possession under the contract, but he never executed the assignment.

In October 1824 Chadwick assigned the leasehold property to Surtees, subject to the rents and covenants. Surtees entered into possession, but neglected, during the term, to pay the rent and perform the covenants. The lease expired in 1834, at which time the rent was in arrear, the premises were dilapidated, and possession was afterwards held over by Surtees.

In consequence of the default of Surtees, Parkinson the lessor commenced several actions against Mordaunt his lessee, both before and after the expiration of the lease, and in which he obtained judgment for damages and costs.

The representatives of Mordaunt sued Willson at law for the recovery of the amount of the damages and costs incurred by Mordaunt and his representatives, in the several actions brought against them by Parkinson; and they ultimately obtained judgment against Willson for £830, 5s., for which sum he gave them a security on his property.

Chadwick died in January 1833, having, by his will, executed so as to pass real estate, "ordered his debts, funeral charges, and testamentary expenses in all things to be paid." And he appointed Leonard and others executors, and devised his real estate for the benefit of several persons who were Defendants to this cause. Chadwick, in his lifetime, and his representatives after his death, had notice given them of the proceedings on the several actions at law, but failed to indemnify the Plaintiff Willson in respect of these actions. The Plaintiff brought an action against the executors of Chadwick for [375] the recovery of the damages and costs they sustained. In this action the Defendants pleaded several false pleas; but they afterwards withdrew them all, except that of plene administravit, and ultimately judgment quando, &c., was obtained against them, and damages were assessed before the sheriff at £1245, and £152, 17s. costs. A considerable portion of the sum of £1245 was composed of the costs both of the Plaintiffs and Defendant in the several preceding actions. Though the devisee was not a party to the action, his solicitor attended before the sheriff to watch the proceedings.

The Plaintiff then filed this bill against the executors of Chadwick and the devisees of his real estates to obtain payment out of his personal estate, and in case of a deficiency, out of his real estate, which the testator had by his will charged with his debts.

Mr. Pemberton, Mr. Girdlestone, and Mr. L. Wigram, for the Plaintiff. The principal defence relied on by the Defendants is this, that as Chadwick, the testator, did not execute the assignment, he was not liable on the covenants in the lease, or to indemnify the Plaintiff; but the answer is obvious, he accepted an assignment of the premises, took possession under that assignment, and afterwards assigned over the term itself, taking an indemnity. Having thus taken the benefit of the conveyance to himself, he is subject to the covenants, although he never executed the deed. But even under a mere contract for the assignment of a term, whether from the original lessee or a mesne assignee, the purchaser must covenant for indemnity against payment of rent and performance of covenants; Staines v. Morris (1 Ves. & B. 8).

[376] The amount of the damages and costs recovered against the Plaintiff, and of the costs of defending the action, is the proper measure of the damages occasioned to the Plaintiff; Neale v. Wyllie (3 Barn. & Cr. 533); and the testator Chadwick having charged his real estate with his debts, that estate is liable for the amount of the Plaintiff's demand, which has been ascertained before a jury in the presence of the devisees.

Sir C. Wetherell and Mr. Craig, for Dr. Chadwick the devisee of the real estate.

Though the testator Chadwick agreed to take, "subject to the specifications in the said lease," and was liable during his possession; yet he was not liable to the covenant to indemnify contained in an indenture which he never executed. He accepted the conveyance under the contract, but refused to execute the indemnity. By his will the testator directed his debts to be paid: this, it must be admitted, in equity, would amount to a charge on his real estates of his debts existing at his death; but the claim now made, did not constitute a debt at the death of the testator; Farley v. Briant (3 Ad. & El. 839); it was a mere contingent equitable liability; the real estate is not liable, at least, for the portion accruing after the testator's death.

The claim against the devisee for the costs both of the Plaintiffs and Defendants of the several actions at law cannot be sustained; because the costs cannot be considered as "specifications in the said lease," and because it was the duty of the several parties, if they had no defence to the several actions, to have paid the amount; they had no right to permit the actions to proceed, [377] and then charge the aggregate of all the costs against the real estate of Chadwick. With regard to the present Plaintiff, he ought, originally, to have filed his bill in this Court, and not to have proceeded at law, after he had been informed of the state of the assets. The judgment obtained against the executors, though binding as against them, is not conclusive against the devisees, who were no parties to the action.

They also argued, that the superior landlord, by receiving rent from the last assignee, had accepted him as his tenant, and that there had been such laches on the part of the Plaintiff as to deprive him of his remedy; for if he had brought his action against the testator in his lifetime, the latter would have had an opportunity of prosecuting his remedy over against Surtees, and which might then have been made effectual.

Mr. Kindersley and Mr. Keene, for the executors.

Mr. Pemberton, in reply.

Dec. 7. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. This, in principle and in substance, appears to me to be by no means a difficult case. The circumstances between these parties are these:—In the year 1818 Mordaunt became the lessee of the property in question for a term of years. He assigned that term in April 1821 to Willson, and in April 1823 Willson agreed to assign it to Chadwick. All the assignments previously made contained a covenant on the part of the assignee to perform the covenants and indemnify his assignor; but when it came to the transaction between [378] Willson the Plaintiff, and Mr. Chadwick, there was, in the first instance, an agreement, by which it was provided that Chadwick should take the lease subject to the specifications contained in the lease; and afterwards an instrument was executed which purported to be an indenture or assignment to Chadwick, and purported to contain a covenant on the part of Chadwick to precisely the same effect as the covenants contained in the former assignments. This instrument was executed by Willson alone, and not by Chadwick. In this state of things, Chadwick, having signed the agreement but not having executed the assignment, took possession of the property, and it cannot be doubted that he took possession of this property by means of that assignment. Whatever might be his liability at law, he became, in this Court at least, bound to perform the covenants in the assignment. This is not all: having for some time retained possession of this property, his only title to possession being under the assignment, he disposed of it to a person of the name of Surtees, and he took from Surtees a covenant, to indemnify him against the non-performance of the covenants. Having done this, he delivered possession to Surtees, who for some time afterwards paid the rent; whether to the superior landlord, or to whom he paid it, does not distinctly appear. It has been suggested in the ingenious argument that has been used, that he might have paid the rent under such circumstances and in such a manner as would have made Surtees alone responsible; but any facts warranting such a suggestion have not been stated to me with any distinctness.

The matter seems to have gone on without difficulty between any of the parties down to the year 1831; when the rent being in arrear, claims were made on behalf of the lessor against the lessee, by the lessee against [379] his assignee, and so on. They made a regular succession of claims till they came to Mr. Chadwick, who, by his assignment, had put into possession the very person who had made the default.

Mr. Chadwick declined to give any sort of answer to the application, and took no notice whatever of it. Various attempts were made to induce him to come to some arrangement, by which the expense of legal proceedings might be avoided; but he does not seem to have thought proper to assist in that respect: he neither denied nor admitted his liability, but left the parties to take such steps as they thought fit. The consequence was, that an action was brought by Parkinson, the lessor, against Mordaunt, his lessee, which was commenced in November 1831, and upon that a judgment was recovered. Mr. Chadwick died in January 1833, and this matter not being settled, Mr. Mordaunt, being under the liability to pay the amount recovered against him, commenced, in November 1833, an action against Willson, his assignee. Mr. Mordaunt died, and another action was brought by the executors of Mordaunt against Mr. Willson, in which they recovered; and a succession of actions, making in all seven actions, were brought, the last being brought by the present Plaintiff against the executors of Mr. Chadwick.

In the course of these proceedings various applications were made to the executors of Mr. Chadwick, and the only answer that could be got from them was, that they had nothing to do with the matter, except that upon one occasion they stated and gave notice that they had no assets. It would appear from the evidence produced by the Plaintiff, that from time to time during these proceedings, the solicitor who acted for the executors, communicated the claims which were [380] made against them to the devisees, and that the devisees did not think fit in any way to interfere. It became therefore absolutely necessary that these claims should be investigated in a legal course. It was very easy for Mr. Chadwick to say, "You ought to have paid the demand made against you at once. You had nothing to do but put your hand in your pocket and pay the rent in arrear." True, they would have had nothing but that to do at one period, provided Mr. Chadwick had said, "if you do so I will perform my duty hereafter;" but instead of that Mr. Chadwick rendered them no assistance whatever, put them at arm's length, and left them liable to actions without any protection at all.

The action proceeded against the executors, and the sum ultimately recovered was £1245 for principal money, and £152, 17s. for costs; and that sum was found to be due on a writ of inquiry, which, it is said, was attended by the solicitor of Dr. Chadwick the devisee, on his behalf. With respect to that point, I cannot perfectly satisfy myself without reading the depositions, which I will do before I determine that part of the case. The question is, whether there is any liability on the real estate? I am clearly of opinion, that under the circumstances of the case, there is; and whether the debt be legal or equitable, or whether it be only a contingent debt as to a portion of it, and an absolute debt as to another portion of it, it seems to me a clear proposition that there is a demand against the assets, and that the real property of Mr. Chadwick, which he has by his will constituted assets for the payment of his debts, is liable. As to the breaches of covenant in his lifetime, there was clearly a debt incurred; whether a legal or an equitable debt, I must say does not appear to me important. After his death a further liability [381] arose under the covenants; and it appears to me immaterial, whether such liability was legal or equitable, for it was a liability under a covenant, which, whether legally violated or equitably violated, this Court, in the administration of the assets, would see satisfied. Whether those debts were absolute debts at the time of his death, or only contingent debts, it seems to me that the Court must apply the assets in satisfying them.

I am, therefore, of opinion, that the loss incurred by the non-performance of the covenants by Mr. Surtees, the assignee of Mr. Chadwick, is a loss which, when the amount of it is ascertained, is a charge on his real assets.

With respect to the amount of the debt, I have some doubt, whether Dr. Chadwick, though he has conducted himself in the manner I have stated, ought to be held bound, in this Court, by the proceedings which have taken place for the purpose of ascertaining the amount; I mean to reserve that question, and to look carefully through the evidence as to the course he has pursued, for the purpose of determining that point. The effect of determining that he is not bound by the finding will be, that an enquiry will be necessary, in which the amount will have to be investigated. If it appears that the amount has been substantiated against the executors without any fraud or collusion, the amount will then be the same as before, and the expense of the enquiry will fall on Dr. Chadwick; at the same time it is his right to have the thing strictly investigated, and to say he is not bound to submit to that which is not legally found to be due from him. If he thinks fit to be at the expense of an enquiry, he has a right to it, and it must [382] be directed if the circumstances of the case render it necessary. He is also entitled to have the account of the personal estate taken; but after the evidence given, it does surprise me to be told he now denies the state of the assets. No doubt he has a right to have the account investigated; and if he can protect the real estate by a discovery of personal estate in the hands of the executors which they have not duly accounted for, he will in such case have the benefit of that enquiry. If, on the other hand, the account turns out as the executors state it to be, Dr. Chadwick will have to bear the expense of the enquiry.

Dec. 9. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS. I have read over these papers in Willam v. Leonard, with a view to the only question I had reserved. It certainly appears to me that there is abundant evidence of the costs and expenses having been incurred; but the evidence is derived from the proceedings in certain causes to which Dr. Chadwick, the devisee, was not a party; and they consist in part of bills of costs which have not been taxed, and with respect to the rest, it seems to be a question, whether the evidence in the action in which the executors alone were Defendants can be used against the devisee. I am not aware of any authority on that point; and if there be none, then (notwithstanding the satisfactory evidence that these costs, charges, and expenses have been incurred) I am not prepared to say that Dr. Chadwick is not entitled to have an inquiry in that respect.

I have also read the statements as to the assets, and I do not think he admits that the personal assets have [383] been exhausted. The Plaintiff must have a declaration that he is entitled to be indemnified his costs, damages, and expenses out of the estate of Chadwick, the testator; and it must be referred to the Master to ascertain what costs, damages, and expenses have been incurred; and Dr. Chadwick not thinking fit now to admit that the personal assets are exhausted, and it being alleged by the executors that he has released and indemnified them, I think the first inquiry will be, whether he has indemnified them. If he has not, the account of the personal estate must be taken; but if he has, then the Master must proceed to take an account of the real estate, with consequential directions for raising the amount.

[383] WHITTAKER AND ANOTHER v. HOWE. Jan. 13, 18, 1841.

[Questioned, Tallis v. Tallis, 1852, 16 Jur. 746 (n.). See Rousillon v. Rousillon, 1880, 14 Ch. D. 368; Davies v. Davies, 1887, 36 Ch. D. 366; Nordenfelt v. Maxim Nordenfelt Company [1894], A. C. 545, 563. Cf. Dubowski v. Goldstein [1896], 1 Q. B. 478; Underwood v. Barker [1899], 1 Ch. 300; Haynes v. Dolman [1899], 2 Ch. 13.]

An agreement by a solicitor, for valuable consideration, not to practise as solicitor in any part of Great Britain for twenty years, held valid.

Injunction granted to restrain a solicitor, who had sold his business on those terms, from practising in any part of Great Britain, and from endeavouring to induce any persons who were clients of the former and present firm, to cease to employ the latter as their attorneys or solicitors.

The Plaintiffs in this case moved for an injunction to restrain the Defendant from detaining and keeping possession of or destroying certain documents; and also to restrain him from practising or carrying on the business of an attorney and solicitor. The circumstances which gave rise to the suit and motion were as follows:—

In the year 1831 the Plaintiff Mr. Whittaker, being about to procure himself to be admitted an attorney and solicitor, and to form a partnership with the Co-plaintiff, [384] Mr. Tatham, desired to purchase the business which was then carried on by the Defendant Mr. Howe and by his then partner Mr. Heptinstall; and for these purposes an agreement, dated the 4th of August 1831, was made and executed between and by the Plaintiffs, and Howe & Heptinstall; whereby it was agreed, that Whittaker, upon his admission in Michaelmas term then next, should become a partner with Howe & Heptinstall for two years, and should give £5000 for the partnership, and as the consideration for the absolute purchase of all their interest in the business during and after the expiration of the term of two years. And Howe & Heptinstall agreed to put Whittaker into possession of all the profits of the business from the time that the £5000 should be secured as therein mentioned; but they were nevertheless to continue in business as the co-partners of Whittaker for two years from such time; and were during such two years to attend at the chambers wherein the business should be carried on; and it was agreed that Howe & Heptinstall should carry on, and in all things aid and assist Whittaker in carrying on the same, as they had been accustomed to do (Whittaker or Whittaker and Tatham, finding the necessary capital). And that Howe & Heptinstall should also respectively use their utmost endeavours to retain their then present clients, and secure the possession of the said business, as the same had been and was carried on by them, to Whittaker, during the term of two years and after the expiration thereof: and further that neither of them, Howe and Heptinstall, should afterwards practise as solicitors or attorneys in any part of Great Britain for the space of twenty years without the consent of Whittaker. And it was also agreed, that the Plaintiff Tatham should, from the admission of Whittaker as attorney, become a co-partner with Whittaker for nine years, and receive a fixed portion of the profits; and "that all books and [385] accounts which had been theretofore kept in respect of the said business, should be kept at the chambers where the business should be carried on, with liberty for any of the parties to the agreement, or their representatives, to have access thereto."

Mr. Whittaker secured the payment of the £5000 as required on the 7th of November 1831; and he became admitted as an attorney and solicitor. The agreement was acted upon, and the business carried on under the firm of Howe, Heptinstall, & Whittaker.

The money was actually paid in the month of June 1832, and Mr. Howe received £3000 as his share of it.

During the progress of the two years, at the end of which Messrs. Howe and Heptinstall were to retire, Mr. Whittaker began to apprehend that even after the expiration of two years it might be very important to him to have the advantage of being assisted by the greater experience and the established character of Mr. Howe; and in May 1833 he wrote a letter to Mr. Howe, thereby, very earnestly, requesting him to continue his assistance in the business after the end of the two years. After some treaty, Mr. Howe agreed to do so, in consideration of his receiving £500 a year as a remuneration, which was some time afterwards increased to £700 a year.

Mr. Heptinstall retired from the business altogether at the end of two years. Mr. Howe continued to act under the new arrangement, under which a question arose, whether he was a partner with Whittaker & Tatham. This question did not appear to have arisen out of any dispute as to the emoluments of the business, but seemed rather to be one of liability and feeling, and particularly whether the Defendant stood, in relation to [386] Messrs. Whittaker & Tatham, in the capacity of clerk or in some superior station.

On the 12th of August 1840 the Defendant sent to the Plaintiff Whittaker a letter, stating, amongst other things, "that all intercourse in the nature of partnership and otherwise must cease at the expiration of the nine years from whence he entered partnership:" which occurred on the 7th of November 1840.

In August 1840 the dispute as to the partnership still continued. Mr. Howe insisted upon its being dissolved. Mr. Whittaker thought there was no partnership to dissolve; but at last they agreed to sign and publish a notice of dissolution of the partnership; and at the same time Mr. Howe signed an acknowledgment, that Mr. Whittaker's signature of the notice of dissolution, should not prejudice any question between them as to a partnership having actually subsisted.

About the same time, the name of the firm painted on the door of the chambers was altered, and the name of Howe, being separated from its former connection with the others, was painted on the door separately from them.

On the 25th of December 1840, in the absence, and without the knowledge of Whittaker & Tatham, Mr. Howe removed a great many books, deeds, documents, and papers from the chambers in Lincoln's Inn, where the business was carried on, to his own chambers, amongst which were some of those included in the articles of August 1831, and others belonging to the clients of the partnership.

Mr. Howe took chambers in the neighbourhood, for the purpose and with the intention of carrying on business as an attorney and solicitor, and, as was stated by [387] the Plaintiffs' affidavit, he threatened and intended to solicit the clients of Plaintiffs' partnership, and to induce, or endeavour to induce, such clients to take away their business from the Plaintiffs' firm, and to employ him, the Defendant, in respect of their business; and he intended to make use of the documents and papers, which were so as aforesaid surreptitiously obtained by him from the chambers of said partnership, for the purpose of furthering his said designs, and of preventing the Plaintiffs from transacting the business of their said clients, and of otherwise embarrassing the Plaintiffs in the conduct of such business. It was also alleged by the Plaintiffs, that the Defendant intended to practise in the name of a third person in such manner as to evade his agreement.

The Plaintiffs thereupon filed their bill, and now moved for an injunction "to restrain the Defendant Howe from detaining and keeping possession of the books, &c., from the chambers occupied by the Plaintiffs," and from permitting the same to remain away from the office of the Plaintiffs, &c.: and "from practising or in any manner carrying on business as a solicitor or attorney in any part of Great Britain," &c.; and to restrain him from soliciting the clients of the late firm of Howe & Heptinstall, to transfer their business from the Plaintiffs to any other solicitor or attorney, or to cease to employ them; and from acting as the solicitor or attorney of any such clients.

Mr. Pemberton, Mr. Romilly, and Mr. Freeling, in support of the motion, contended, that as the Defendant was clearly acting in contravention of the agreement, for which he had received a large consideration, the Court would endeavour to prevent him; and that whatever doubt might exist as to the jurisdiction to grant an in-[388]-junction directing a restoration of the papers, yet that there was ample authority for the proposition, that the Court could effect it by an injunction in a negative form; Robinson v. Lord Byron (1 B. C. C. 588), Lane v. Newdigate (10 Ves. 192), and Rankin v. Huskisson (4 Simons, 13), where the Defendants were restrained "from permitting such part of the buildings as had been already erected on the garden or plot of ground mentioned in the pleadings, from remaining thereon;" and Spencer v. The London and Birmingham Railway Company (8 Simons, 193), and Taylor v. Davis (1)

Mr. G. Turner, and Mr. Bacon, contra, consented to deliver up all the papers except those which the owners had given the Defendant notice not to part with. They contended, however, that the agreement not to practise as attorney in any part of Great Britain for twenty years, was void at law; secondly, that it was such an agreement as a Court of Equity would not specifically perform; and, thirdly, that if, in any case, a Court of Equity could direct a specific performance, yet, that under the particular circumstances of this case, it would decline so to do. On the first point, they argued that the agreement being generally in restraint of trade in Great Britain, was void, as contrary to public policy: Mitchel v. Reynolds (1 P. Williams, 181), Homer v. Ashford (3 Bing. 322), Horner v. Graves (7 Bing. 735; and see Hitchcock v. Coker, 6 Ad. & Ellis, 438; and Archer v. Marsh, ib. 959); that it was clearly contrary to the public interest to [389] permit an individual to disable himself by contract from earning his livelihood, whereby he would be doomed to live in idleness, and his labour be lost to the State. In such a case the Plaintiffs had no right of suit or action; Thomson v. Thomson (7 Ves. 470). On the second point, that if not strictly void at law, still a Court of Equity would not enforce the agreement, as it was unreasonable, and "publicly detrimental;" Hanington v. Du-Chatel (1 Bro. C. C. 125); and that this

(1) Taylor v. Davis. Rolls, November 1834, where a partner had abstracted a partnership book from the counting-house of the firm, contrary to an express covenant contained in the deed of partnership, Sir C. C. Peppys, Master of the Rolls granted an injunction restraining him from continuing to violate the covenant; and this was continued by Lord Langdale; at the hearing of the cause, on the 28th of February 1838.

Court would give such a contract no encouragement; Prosser v. Edmonds (1 Younge & C. 481); and, thirdly, that the Plaintiffs had waived the agreement by permitting Howe to practise on his own account.

Mr. Pemberton, in reply.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. With respect to that part of the motion which applies to the deeds and papers, I shall, on the faith that Mr. Howe will carry into effect the intention which has been declared on his part by his counsel, reserve any order I have to make on this occasion; an opportunity will thus be given of making some communication in the meantime. Finding it necessary therefore to reserve the order I may have to make on that part of the case, I think it would be better not to make any order whatever at present. I will, however, state my present opinion as far as it is now formed, and will take an opportunity in the meantime of considering the nature of the injunction which I ought to grant.

I confess there is something in all contracts of this nature of which I have entertained some doubt. Where clients rely on the professional skill and knowledge of [390] the individual they have long employed, I have some doubt as to the policy of sanctioning the purchase of their recommendation of the clients to other persons. These doubts have not originated with myself, because I recollect very well their being long dwelt upon, and commented on by Lord Eldon, not only in the case of a solicitor and his clients, but in the cases of medical men and their patients. I perfectly recollect a case in which the professional practice of one physician had been sold to another, wherein the policy of permitting such arrangements was the subject of great discussion and consideration. It is not, however, for me to act upon any doubts I may entertain of that nature, because agreements of this description have been too often sanctioned to be now questioned. [After referring to the painful circumstances of this case, his Lordship said] I think, notwithstanding the able argument in this case, that there must to some extent be an injunction against the Defendant with regard to the practice which it seems he now intends to carry on; but as some time must elapse before a final judgment can be pronounced on this motion, I will in the meanwhile read over the affidavits and refer to the authorities, and I will consider the extent of the injunction which must be granted. I trust, that in the meantime Mr. Howe will act bonâ fide in accordance with the instructions he has given his counsel with respect to the papers.

Jan. 18. Affidavits being now produced as to the delivery up of the papers, &c.,

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS said. In order that I may make an order applicable to the papers and boxes under the present state of circumstances, I think it will be necessary to examine minutely the additional [391] affidavit now produced; and perhaps it may be necessary for the Plaintiffs to afford some explanation thereon. In the meantime, I think it my duty to do all that the jurisdiction of the Court enables me to do to protect these Plaintiffs; and I will proceed to state my opinion as to the injunction I must pronounce.

The motion is for an injunction to restrain the Defendant from detaining and keeping possession of, or destroying certain documents, and also to restrain him from practising or carrying on business as an attorney and solicitor. [His Lordship stated the agreement between the parties, and the circumstances under which it was entered into, and the subsequent arrangement between the Plaintiffs and the Defendant Mr. Howe, and proceeded.] Mr. Howe continued to act under the new arrangement; and a question arose whether, under that arrangement, he was a partner with Whittaker & Tatham, or not. That he was subject to the liabilities of a partner as between the firm and other parties appears to me evident from the use which was made of his name, and the nature of his employment. Whether he was to be called a partner as between himself and Whittaker & Tatham is not very material; because, if a partner, he was to have the fixed sum of £500 and afterwards £700 a year, as and for his share of profits; and if not a partner, he was to receive the same sum as a remuneration for his services. Nominally, at least, he was a partner, and with that name he was employed as the assistant and adviser of the Plaintiffs, and not in any inferior capacity.

In August 1840 the dispute as to the partnership continued. Mr. Howe then insisted on its being dissolved; Whittaker thought there was no partnership to dissolve; but at last they agreed to sign, and did sign and publish a notice of dissolution of the partnership, but at [392] the same time Mr. Howe signed an acknowledgment that Whittaker's signature of the notice of dissolution should not prejudice any question between them as to a partnership having actually subsisted between them. About the same time the name of the firm, painted on the door of the chambers, was altered, and the name of Mr. Howe being separated from its former connexion with the others was painted on the door separately from them.

In all this I confess that I see nothing in the conduct of Mr. Howe which the Plaintiffs are entitled to complain of; it was optional with him whether he would permit his name to continue in the firm or not, or whether he would or not continue to give his personal aid in carrying on the business. He might put an end to his separate agreement for that purpose when he pleased.

But upon a careful perusal of the affidavits, I find nothing upon which I can safely conclude, or from which it appears probable, that Mr. Whittaker had in any way released Mr. Howe from the obligations into which he had entered on the 4th of August 1831: for additional consideration Mr. Howe was to render additional aid in carrying on the business; but the duty for which the former consideration was actually paid was not altered. If Mr. Howe thought that he was at liberty to practise for himself notwithstanding that agreement, I think that he has not shewn any sufficient grounds for that opinion, and that whatever his own view might be, it is not justified by the facts which he has stated; neither does it appear to me to be shewn by the evidence now before me, that after August 1840 he so acted for himself as solicitor as to acquire a right to do so by the acquiescence and consent of Whittaker. Nevertheless, on the 25th of December, in the absence and without the knowledge of Whittaker & Tatham, [393] Mr. Howe removed a great many documents from the chambers where the partnership business was carried on to chambers of his own, where he now insists he has a right to carry on business for himself; and his defence is, that the agreement he entered into is void, or if not void, that it is such as this Court cannot specifically perform; and therefore he, with the consideration in his pocket, has a right to act in violation of the contract for which the consideration was given.

With respect to the validity of the agreement, it is not now made a question whether attorneys and solicitors can lawfully agree to secure their clients to the attorneys and solicitors who succeed them in business. In Candler v. Candler (Jac. 231), Lord Eldon, referring to Bunn v. Guy (4 East, 190), said, "I doubted whether professional men could be recommended, not for skill and knowledge in the profession, but for a sum of money paid and advanced. I knew that this would rip up many transactions, and I was happy that the Court of King's Bench was of a different opinion, though I never could entirely reconcile myself to their doctrine." But the agreement as to this being undisputed, it is alleged to be void as being in restraint of the exercise of trade or profession. In the cases which have occurred I have not observed any distinction taken between trade and professions; but the distinction between different sorts of trades or professions has been taken, and appears to be material.

In this case a valuable consideration being given, the question is, whether the restraint intended to be imposed on Mr. Howe is reasonable. The words of Chief Justice Tindal in Horner v. Graves (7 Bing. 743) may be safely adopted. "We do not see how a better test can be [394] applied to the question whether this is or not a reasonable restraint of trade, than by considering whether the restraint is such only as to afford a fair protection to the interests of the party in favour of whom it is given, and not so large as to interfere with the interests of the public. Whatever restraint is larger than the necessary protection of the party [requires] can be of no benefit to either; it can only be oppressive, and if oppressive, it is in the eye of the law unreasonable. Whatever is injurious to the interests of the public is void on the grounds of public policy."

Now, whatever may be the talents, knowledge, and experience of Mr. Howe, and I am disposed to rate them highly, I cannot say that in my opinion the public interest will be in any way interfered with or affected by his not being allowed to practise as an attorney and solicitor in Great Britain for twenty years without the consent of Mr. Whittaker.

The question therefore is, whether the restraint ought to be considered as reasonable in this particular case. The business is that of an attorney and solicitor, which, to a large extent, may be carried on by correspondence or by agents, and as to which it has already been decided, that a restraint of practice within a distance of 150 miles was not an unreasonable restraint. It was decided in the case of the surgeon dentist, where the occupation required the personal presence of the practiser and the patient at the same place, that a restraint of practice within a distance of 100 miles was an unreasonable restraint.

Agreeing with the Court of Common Pleas, that in such cases "no certain precise boundary can be laid down within which the restraint would be reasonable, and beyond which excessive;" having regard to the [396] nature of the profession, to the limitation of time, and to the decision that a distance of 150 miles does not describe an unreasonable boundary, I must say, as Lord Kenyon said in Davis v. Mason (5 Term. Rep. 118), "I do not see that the limits are necessarily unreasonable, nor do I know how to draw the line."

At present, therefore, I cannot come to the conclusion that this agreement is void; and I do not think that this Court can refuse to grant an injunction to restrain the violation of a contract or covenant, because there may be some part of the agreement which the Court could not compel the Defendant specifically to perform.

In the progress of the cause it may become necessary to consider further the points which have been raised; but at present I am of opinion, that the right claimed by Mr. Howe to act in violation of the contract for which he has received the consideration is, to say the least, so far doubtful that he ought not to be permitted to take the law into his own hands, and carry on his business at his own pleasure, and without regard to the severe injury which he may do to the Plaintiffs.

Restrain him from practising as an attorney or solicitor in any part of Great Britain, either in his own name or in the name of any other person, and from endeavouring to induce any persons who were the clients of Howe & Heptinstal, or of Howe, Whittaker & Tatham, to cease or abstain from employing Whittaker & Tatham as their attorneys or solicitors.

NOTE.—An injunction was afterwards granted as to the deeds and papers, but which has not yet been drawn up.

[396] THE ATTORNEY-GENERAL V. STRUTT. Nov. 14, 1840.

An information made claim, on behalf of a charity, to a farm, out of which a fixed annual rent charge had for many years been paid. The Defendant admitted the right to the rent charge, but contended that he represented parties who were purchasers of the farm for valuable consideration, without notice. He admitted he had in his possession title-deeds which made out his own title, but did not make out or evidence the title of the charity. Held, that the Defendant was not bound to produce them.

The information stated, that Richard Tweedy, by his will dated in 1574, "gave all his lands and tenements called Prentices, in Stow Maries, in the county of Essex, with his lease and term of years in the same," to three trustees and their heirs, for the endowment of four almshouses for four poor inhabitants of Stock and Boreham.

That the farm was in the occupation of the Defendant, who claimed it under the will of his father, who purchased it in 1788; and that the Defendant paid an annual sum of £13, 12s. as a rent charge issuing thereout. The information insisted that the charity was entitled to the whole income of the property, amounting to about £66 a year. It charged that the Defendant had in his possession deeds, &c., whereby or wherefrom the title of the charity would appear, or which contained recitals relating to the charity.

The Defendant stated that his father had purchased the Prentices with other property in 1787, "subject to a rent charge of £13, 12s. per annum to the poor of Stock Boreham, and subject to a quit rent of 5s. 1d. per annum to the manor of North Farnbridge; and that his father had no notice of the will of Richard Tweedy, or the alleged rights of the charity.

He set forth the title-deeds under which he claimed, commencing in 1606, in one of which, dated in 1718, the property was conveyed, "one annual rent or charge of £13, 12s., payable half-yearly, by equal portions, to [397] the several parishes of Stock and Boreham, in the county of Essex aforesaid, being so much theretofore to them given by Richard Tweedy, Esq., long since deceased, and charged and chargeable in and upon the said premises only excepted." The Defendant relied on being a purchaser for valuable consideration, without notice, and on the Statute of Limitations, and insisted that the charity was legally entitled to the rent charge only.

He admitted that he had in his possession certain title-deeds, relating to the premises in question in this cause, and to other premises; but he said that these title-deeds constituted the title of the parties claiming the premises under the will of his father John Strutt, and did not constitute, make out, or evidence the alleged title of the charity.

A motion was now made for the production of the papers, &c.: the discussion turned on the liability of the Defendant, under these circumstances, to produce the title-deeds.

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Blunt, in support of the motion, contended, that the Attorney-General was entitled to the production of the title-deeds, in order to see whether there was any admission therein of the title of the charity to the property in question; and that as the charity was mentioned in one of them, the Defendant, and those through whom he claimed, must be taken to have had notice of the rights of the charity; in which case the Attorney-General was clearly entitled to see them.

That, as the lands out of which the rent charge was issuing, had been intermixed with others, the Attorney-General was entitled to the production of the title-deeds, [398] in order to determine the particular lands out of which the rent charge was issuing.

Mr. Kindersley and Mr. James Russell, contra. The title of the charity, to the rent charge is admitted, and it has always been paid; but the title to the land is altogether denied. The Attorney-General, therefore, has no right to the production of the deeds which prove the title of the Defendant only, and not that of the Plaintiff; Adams v. Fisher (2 Keen, 754, and 3 Myl. & Cr. 526).

The case of confusion of boundaries is not made by the information, and cannot now be insisted on.

Mr. Pemberton, in reply.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. The documents other than the title-deeds must be produced. As to the title-deeds, the question is, whether, in the present state of the record, and having regard to the claim made by the information, the Attorney-General has now a right to the production of them. In the course of these proceedings it may be very important to have them produced; but I am of opinion that the record is not at present in such a state that I can compel their production.

The claim made by the Attorney-General is simply for the recovery of the land. The Defendant says he is in the situation of a purchaser for valuable consideration without notice. In the reference to the rent charge, to which the charity is admitted to be entitled, there is nothing to connect it with the origin of the charity; and the Defendant may therefore be right in saying [399] that the deeds relate solely to his own title, and not to that of the charity. In the present state of the record, I cannot order the production of the title-deeds.

[399] WELLS v. GIBBS. Dec. 10, 11, 1840.

Whether an order to pay money into Court to the credit of a cause is an order within the meaning of the 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, s. 18; and if so, whether a taking under an attachment for contempt would, under the sixteenth section, invalidate a charge obtained under the thirteenth section.

This Court has no jurisdiction to order the Master of the Common Pleas to vacate a memorandum entered under the 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, of an order of this Court.

By an interlocutory order made in this cause on the 11th of June 1840, the Defendant was ordered, within a month from that time, to pay into the bank, with the privy of the Accountant-General of this Court, to the credit of this cause, the sum of £1404, 2s.

On the 3d of July 1840 the Plaintiffs, by their solicitor, caused a memorandum or minute of this order to be left with the senior Master of the Court of Common Pleas, pursuant to the statute of the 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, s. 19.

The Defendant having made default in payment of the money into Court, was, in November 1840, taken into custody by the serjeant-at-arms, and was afterwards turned over to the Fleet.

It was now moved, on his behalf, that the orders and warrant under which he was imprisoned might be discharged, and that the Defendant might be discharged; and also that the entry or registry made by the senior Master of the Court of Common Pleas at Westminster, of the order of the 11th day of June, in pursuance or pretended pursuance of the 1 & 2 Vict., might be cancelled or vacated for irregularity, and as not being authorised [400] by, or within the scope and meaning of, the said Act of Parliament; or otherwise, that the Plaintiffs might be deemed, and taken, and be accordingly declared to have relinquished all right and title, to the benefit of such (if any) charge or security as they might have obtained or be entitled to, under the powers of the said Act of Parliament, by means or in respect of the order of the 11th day of June last; and that the Plaintiffs might forfeit and be declared to have forfeited the same accordingly. And that in either case satisfaction might (if necessary) be entered on the entry or registry of such last-mentioned order, or of the memorandum or minute thereof.(1)

(1) By the thirteenth section of the 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, it is enacted that a judgment entered up in any of Her Majesty's Superior Courts at Westminster should operate as a charge upon all lands, &c., to which such person shall be entitled, and the judgment creditor is to have the same remedies in a Court of Equity as if the debtor had agreed to charge the hereditaments therewith, but the creditor is not to be entitled to proceed in equity to obtain the benefit of such charge until the expiration of a year.

The sixteenth section enacts, "That if any judgment creditor, who, under the powers of this Act, shall have obtained any charge, or be entitled to the benefit of any security whatsoever, shall afterwards, and before the property so charged or secured shall have been converted into money or realised, and the produce thereof applied towards payment of the judgment debt, cause the person of the judgment debtor to be taken or charged in execution upon such judgment, then and in such case such judgment creditor shall be deemed and taken to have relinquished all right and title to the benefit of such charge or security, and shall forfeit the same accordingly."

The eighteenth section enacts, "That all decrees and orders of Courts of Equity, and all rules of Courts of Common Law, and all orders of the Lord Chancellor or of the Court of Review in matters of bankruptcy, and all orders of the Lord Chancellor in matters of lunacy, whereby any sum of money, or any costs, charges, or expenses, shall be payable to any person, shall have the effect of judgments in the Superior Courts of Common Law, and the persons to whom any such monies, or costs, charges, or expenses, shall be payable, shall be deemed judgment creditors within the meaning of this Act; and all powers hereby given to the Judges of the Superior Courts of Common Law with respect to matters depending in the same Courts, shall and may be exercised by Courts of Equity with respect to matters therein depending, and by the Lord Chancellor and the Court of Review in matters of bankruptcy, and by the Lord Chancellor in matters of lunacy; and all remedies hereby given to judgment creditors in like manner given to persons to whom any monies, or costs, charges, or expenses, are by such orders or rules respectively directed to be paid."

The nineteenth section enacts, "That no judgment of any of the said Superior Courts, nor any decree or order in any Court of Equity, nor any rule of a Court of Common Law, nor any order in bankruptcy or lunacy, shall by virtue of this Act affect [401] Mr. Kindersley and Mr. Evans, in support of the motion. The interlocutory order of the 11th of June to pay money into Court, with the privy of the Accountant-General, to the credit of the cause, is not within the eighteenth section of the 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, which refers only to any sum of money "payable to any person." This is made evident from the words which follow in the same section; for the order is to have the effect of a judgment, and "the persons to whom such money, [402] &c., shall be payable shall be deemed judgment creditors." Who, then, in this case can be deemed the judgment creditors? The Court, or the bank, or the Accountant-General? It is evident that the Act contemplated only such an order as decided the right to the money, and not an interlocutory order in a cause, in which neither the right nor liability is adjudicated on, and which is made simply for the purpose of security until the hearing of the cause. If, then, the case is not within the eighteenth section, the Plaintiff had no right to enter a memorandum with the Master of the Common Pleas: it forms a cloud over his title, and makes his property unmarketable. The memorandum entered by virtue of the proceeding in this Court ought, therefore, to be removed. If, however, the order comes within the Act, and is to have the effect of a judgment "in the Superior Courts of Common Law" under the eighteenth section, then, by leaving the memorandum under the nineteenth section, the Plaintiffs obtained a charge on the land, and thereby made their election to proceed against the Defendant's property, and were estopped by the common law from afterwards proceeding against the Defendant's person (3 Bac. Abr. 393); or, in another view of the case, the Plaintiffs having obtained the charge, must, under the sixteenth section, be deemed to have relinquished it by subsequently arresting the Defendant: in the former case the arrest was irregular; in the latter, the charge has been avoided. It would be most unjust to keep a party in prison for the non-payment of money which, by reason of the charge created on his estate for the same debt, he is rendered unable to raise out of his property.

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Hallett, contrâ. The case is within the eighteenth section. The order is in the [403] most usual form in equity to pay into Court to the credit of the cause, for the benefit of the claimants. It is the same as if money were directed to be paid into a banker's to the credit of a particular person's account. However, it is quite unnecessary to decide the point on this occasion.

As to ordering the discharge of the Defendant (a trustee who has applied the trust fund to his own use), there is nothing in the Act or in the previous practice to warrant it. The Act says, that by taking the person of the debtor in execution, the previous charge on the land shall be relinquished and forfeited; be it so, but there is nothing to authorise the discharge of the Defendant. The Defendant, however, has never been taken in execution; the process against him is for his contempt of the Court, and differs widely from the process in the Common Law Courts: the distinction has been clearly established in the recent Irish case of Miller v. Knox (4 Bing. N.C. 574). Contempt in equity is a criminal proceeding, and for centuries the practice in equity has been, to enforce the payment of a debt or the performance of a duty, compulsorily both against the property and the person at the same time. The Act referred to does not abridge the Plaintiff's rights; though popularly regarded as an Act for the abolition of imprisonment for debt, it is merely to abolish arrest on mere process, with certain qualifications: its object is to give a creditor a more extensive remedy against the property of his debtor, and not to limit it.

any lands, tenements, or hereditaments as to purchasers, mortgagees, or creditors, unless and until a memorandum or minute, containing the name, and the usual or last known place of abode, and the title, trade, or profession of the person whose estate is intended to be affected thereby, and the Court and the title of the cause or matter in which such judgment, decree, order, or rule shall have been obtained or made, and the date of such judgment, decree, order, or rule, and the account of the debt, damages, costs, or monies thereby recovered or ordered to be paid, shall be left with the senior Master of the Court of Common Pleas at Westminster, who shall forthwith enter the same particulars in a book in alphabetical order, by the name of the person whose estate is intended to be affected by such judgment, decree, order, or rule; and such officer shall be entitled for any such entry to the sum of 5s.; and all persons shall be at liberty to search the same book on payment of the sum of 1s.

As to vacating the memorandum, this Court has no authority so to do. If the charge is void by the statute, it is a mere nullity, and there is no necessity for this Court to declare it so, for it cannot affect the Defendant's title; a purchaser could not, on that account, [404] object to perform his contract to purchase it. (Sugden's Vendors, 648, 8th ed.) A party might as well apply to take a fine or recovery from the records of the Common Pleas, or to cancel the registration of a deed or judgment affecting property in the county of Middlesex.

Mr. Kindersley, in reply.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. This is certainly a very singular application. I am asked to vacate the memorandum which has been entered with the senior Master of the Common Pleas, on the ground, first, that it is not within the scope of the Act of Parliament referred to; and, secondly, that if it should be considered within the Act, then that the subsequent proceedings worked a forfeiture of the charge of the property of the Defendant; and it is then asked, if the Court should decline to vacate the memorandum, that the Defendant may be discharged. It is admitted that all the proceedings of contempt in this Court have been perfectly regular: there was an order for the payment of money duly executed, and the Defendant, without any irregularity, has been lodged in prison for his disobedience of that order; and I am asked to discharge these regular proceedings, so as to deprive the Plaintiff of the means which the law allows him of enforcing obedience to the order of the Court; and that, too, on the ground that he has done something which he is either not entitled to, or ought not to avail himself of. I feel some satisfaction that it is not incumbent on me to determine whether such orders of this Court are or are not within the view of this Act of Parliament, because I have no authority to interfere in the way in which I am asked. If the officer of the Common Pleas has improperly entered this me-[405]-morandum, what control have I over him? I am of opinion that I have no authority to make an order on him, and that my only jurisdiction would be through the parties to the cause.

If the case were within the Act, then comes the question whether there has been such a proceeding as ought to work a forfeiture of the charge; and if there has, then arises the question whether I can declare a forfeiture on this occasion and in this manner.

The first question would lead to an investigation of the practice of this Court. The Act says, a party having obtained a charge on the debtor's property, shall be deemed to have relinquished it, if he charges the person of the Defendant in execution; and the question which arises is, whether the process of contempt, or a caption under an attachment, &c., issuing out of this Court, is a taking within the Act. It certainly is not the same thing as a taking under a ca. sa. at law; nor is this Court bound by the decisions of Courts of law, which in some cases prohibit a party proceeding against the property and person at the same time. In the earliest cases, where after a decree had been pronounced, and a Defendant had been taken under process of contempt for his disobedience in not performing the decree, it became a matter of consideration whether the Court was justified in granting a sequestration, or whether there could be, what might be called, execution against the person and property at the same time. I find that in very early cases it was a matter of great consideration, and the Lord Chancellor, having the assistance of one of the Common Law Judges, determined that a sequestration against a person in prison for disobedience of the same order was valid; Hide v. Pettit (1 Ch. Ca. 91). [406] The two concurrent processes have, therefore, at all times existed in this Court, and they exist at this moment; and there can be no doubt that if in this case the Defendant were to remain in prison and neglect to pay in the money, a sequestration would go against his estate.

I am relieved from the necessity of deciding, whether, by the construction of this Act, a caption under an attachment is to be considered a caption in execution, for I do not consider that, under the present circumstances, and on this motion, I am in a situation to make such a declaration. Even if I had jurisdiction over the officer of the Common Pleas, I must be satisfied that what is asked is necessary to be done: that the Act of Parliament is defective, and that I have some jurisdiction to supply the deficiency. The Act says that the charge shall be deemed forfeited; what more can possibly be done? I am asked by a Defendant who refuses to perform his duty to relieve his estate from some supposed cloud. If it is to be removed, it must be done in another place, and under another jurisdiction.

This is not the case of a Defendant who is desirous of obtaining time to enable him to perform his duty: if it were, I should certainly interfere, and I would not allow any oppressive conduct on the part of the Plaintiffs, if I saw that the party was willing and desirous of performing that which the Court had ordered him to do. Here, on the contrary, is a case of a party obstinately neglecting and refusing to obey the order which this Court has made upon him, and this is the person who asks me to do that which belongs to another jurisdiction, and must be done, if at all, by another proceeding. I must refuse this application with costs. If the Defendant offered some security which the Plaintiff ought [407] to accept, I should consider it my duty to exercise such jurisdiction as I have to relieve the Defendant. Cases have occurred where a party has given satisfactory assurance of his intention to perform his duty, and in which the Court has interfered to enable him to accomplish it, by putting the other side on terms.

NOTE.—See Gibbs v. Pike, 9 Dowling, Pr. Ca. 731, in which it was held that the above order was not within the Act.

[407] HOLMES v. THE CORPORATION OF ARUNDEL. Jan. 11, 1841.

The Court, to prevent delay, will advance for an early hearing exceptions to the Master's report on a reference for impertinence.

The Master in this case, to whom the matter had been referred, had allowed some exceptions for impertinence taken to the answer of the Defendant.

The Defendant took exceptions to the Master's report.

Mr. Wray applied to have the latter exceptions advanced for an early hearing.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale], after observing that the Court was in the habit of advancing cases of this description, which were in the nature of a dilatories, made the order.

NOTE.—His Lordship made a similar order in Byde v. Masterman, Michaelmas term 1840.

[408] STUBBS v. SARGON. Jan. 11, 1841.

On a motion to discharge an alleged irregular order, no parties can be heard in support of the application but those who have joined in the notice of motion to discharge it.

An order was alleged to have been obtained irregularly by a purchaser under the Court, in the absence of A. B. and C. D., two of the parties to the cause. A notice of motion was given by A. B. to discharge the order.

Mr. Pemberton, in support of the motion.

Mr. Rogers for C. D., in whose absence the order had been obtained, but who had given no notice of motion to discharge it, was proceeding to support the present application, when

Mr. C. P. Cooper objected, that he could not be heard in support of the motion to discharge the order, unless he gave notice for that purpose, and he contended, that as the case stood, he could only be heard in support of the existing order.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS considered the objection well founded.

[409] DUNCAN v. M'CALMONT. Nov. 13, 14, 1840; Feb. 22, 1841.

Jurisdiction of this Court to restrain proceedings in the Admiralty Court on bottomry bonds.

Injunction granted to restrain proceedings in the Admiralty Court respecting a bottomry bond and freight of a ship, on the ground that the matters could be more conveniently, directly, and effectually determined in this Court.

In this case a motion was made that the Defendants Robert M'Calmont, Hugh M'Calmont junior, William John Newall, Frederick Sanders, and Charles Sanders, might be restrained from prosecuting any suit in the High Court of Admiralty against the cargo of the ship "Lord Cochrane," or against the Plaintiffs as the owners thereof, and their respective bail, upon, or in respect of the bottomry bond in the bill mentioned.

The case was as follows:—Messrs. Benson being the owners of the ship "Lord Cochrane," in the year 1839, sent the same under the command of Luke Hall Smith as master, to the island of Ascension, laden with Government stores; the ship went under the same command from the island of Ascension, either in ballast, or at least with but a small cargo of goods, to Pernambuco; and when it arrived there, the master, pursuant to authority given him by the owners, gave it in charge to M'Calmont [410] & Co. who were merchants there. The ship being supplied with a homeward cargo of great value, which belonged partly to the Plaintiffs in this cause, and partly to M'Calmont & Co., sailed on the 28th June 1839, with the intention of proceeding to Liverpool, but having on the next day struck on a sandbank and received serious injury, she returned to Pernambuco. The cargo was unloaded, and very extensive repairs effected under the superintendence of M'Calmont & Co. acting as agents of the ship, as they said, under the master, or of Lloyd's agent.

The repairs were completed in the month of December 1839; the cargo was put on board again, and on the 6th January 1840 the master executed a bottomry bond to M'Calmont & Co. binding ship, freight, and cargo for the payment of £8558, 12s. 4d., as the sum due for the money expended on the repairs, and in taking care of the cargo, with commission and premium at £20 per cent.

The bond was transmitted by M'Calmont & Co. from Pernambuco, to M'Calmont Brothers & Co., their correspondents at Liverpool, and was indorsed to them.

The ship sailed on the return voyage on the 11th of January, and arrived at Liverpool on the 20th of March. Before the arrival, a warrant of arrest, founded on the bottomry bond, was sued out of the Court of Admiralty; and being executed on the arrival of the ship, commissions to take bail were taken out by the owners and consignees of the cargo; and bail being taken for the sum of £7500, as the amount of goods belonging to the Plaintiffs, the arrest was suspended. After this, at the instance of the owners of the cargo, the claimants under the bottomry bond brought in their [411] "act on petition," and under an order of the Court of Admiralty the sum of £1765, 18s. was paid into Court, as for the homeward freight of the ship, exclusive of the freight payable in respect of the goods consigned to M'Calmont Brothers & Co.; the ship itself was ordered to be sold, and was afterwards sold for £1675.

The Plaintiffs in this cause, being the owners of the largest part of the cargo, filed their bill on the 17th of August 1840, insisting that the transaction was fraudulent and void; and that at all events, the freight of the homeward cargo belonging to Messrs. M'Calmont, and the outward freight in the hands of the owners of the ship, ought to be applied in part discharge of the bond; they prayed either that the bond might be declared fraudulent and void as against them, or that an account might be taken of what was justly due on the security of the bond, and of all the monies which ought to be first applied in satisfaction of the bond; and that the amount of what was justly payable in respect of that part of the cargo which belonged to the Plaintiffs, might be ascertained, they offering to pay what should appear to be so payable; and in the meantime they asked for an injunction to restrain the proceedings in the Admiralty Court.

The Defendants M'Calmonts by their answer denied all fraud; they stated that they were ready to allow the amount of freight payable by themselves or their firms amounting to about £433 in the usual way, and insisted that this Court neither had, nor ought to have any jurisdiction as to the subject-matter of this suit, especially having regard to the state of the proceedings in the Admiralty Court, and the security given by the Plaintiffs to the parties suing them there.

[412] The Plaintiffs now moved for an injunction in the terms above stated.

Mr. Pemberton, Mr. S. Sharpe, and Mr. Rolt, in support of the motion, contended, that the nature of the transaction was such as to be open to the greatest suspicion, and that an opportunity ought therefore to be given of having it fully investigated. A charge of £5000 was attempted to be thrown upon the owners of the cargo, for the repairs of a ship which had been afterwards sold for £1675 only. The bottomry bond, at a very high rate of interest, had been given to Messrs. M'Calmont, the agents at Pernambuco for Messrs. Benson the owner, and was signed by the master, a person wholly under the controul of the agents, and without the concurrence of the shippers, and now it was sought by these agents to charge the greater part of the amount against the shippers. It did not appear that the advances had been wholly made on the security of the ship, which was necessary for the validity of a bottomry bond, "The Augusta" (1 Dod. 285), and this, too, was a proper subject for investigation.

They contended, that the Court had jurisdiction to interfere in all cases where securities had been improperly obtained, and even when the subject related to matters usually determined in the Admiralty Court, Glascott v. Lang (3 Myl. & Cr. 451), Dobson v. Lyall (Rolls, January 1837). That the Admiralty Court in its proceeding "by act on petition," decided on affidavits only, and had not the means of effectually dealing with a matter so complicated as the present, where it was necessary to have a full discovery from the parties, and the evidence of witnesses abroad; [413] besides which it had not effectual jurisdiction to compel the owners of the other part of the homeward cargo to contribute, nor could it settle the equities as against Messrs. Benson the owners, who had abandoned the ship, and had not appeared in the suit in the Admiralty Court. That for these reasons, the investigations would be much more effectual and complete in this Court.

Mr. Kindersley, Mr. Turner, and Mr. Roupell, contra, for Messrs. M'Calmont, contended that there appeared no fraud in the transaction; that the question depended on maritime law and the usage of merchants, and was a subject peculiar to the jurisdiction of the Admiralty Court. That there was no reason for interfering with the proceedings in the Admiralty Court, which had possession of the suit and of the produce of the ship and freight, and had ample powers to determine the several questions arising in it. It had jurisdiction "to consider if a bond is fraudulent," and "if it should happen that there were any unfair charges, they would be referred to the registrar and merchants, and be reduced;" "Tartar" (1 Hag. Ad. R. 1), "The Jacob" (4 Robinson, 245). So, "if the charges were a matter of dispute;" "Alexander" (1 Dod. 278).

The following cases were also cited:—As to the amount of interest charged, "La Ysabel" (1 Dod. 273), where 45 per cent. was allowed. As to the proceeding by act on petition, "Ville de Varsovie" (2 Dod. 174): to shew that a bottomry bond given to a consignee was not invalid, "Nelson" (Hag. Adm. Rep. 169): and that the Admiralty Court will not decide the right to property, "The Aurora" (3 Rob. 133), "The Guardian" (ib. 93). The other cases referred to were "Calyppo" (3 Hag. 163), "Barbara" (4 Rob. 1).

[414] Mr. Hall, for Messrs. Benson, did not take any part in the discussion.

Mr. Pemberton, in reply.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS postponed giving judgment.

Feb. 22, 1841. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale], after stating the above circumstances, said: For the Plaintiffs it is alleged that the mere circumstance of a bond for £8558, 12s. 4d. being given for the repairs of a ship at Pernambuco, which ship on its voyage from England had, together with its tackle, apparel, and stores, been insured for only £4500, and which ship after the repairs and a single voyage from Pernambuco to Liverpool, was sold for only £1675, is, of itself, evidence either of fraud or of such improvident conduct that the circumstances ought to be investigated before any payment is enforced.

There are in the bill various charges of facts and circumstances tending to shew either that a fraud was wilfully committed, or, at least, that there was such an entire neglect of the interests of the owners of the cargo, and such an absence of all necessity for resorting to a bottomry bond affecting the cargo, that the Plaintiffs, as owners of the cargo, ought not to be held liable for the bond.

The answers deny the truth of most, if not all, these charges; and certainly, if this case were to be decided merely upon the facts stated or admitted in the answer, the Plaintiffs would not be entitled to the decree which they ask; but the circumstances require explanation, [415] and, in the absence of such explanation as may possibly be hereafter afforded, give rise to very strong suspicion. There seems great reason to believe, that the ship was insured by the owners for more than its worth, and consequently, that the owners and their agent, the master, had no interest to see that unnecessary expense was not incurred; and after making allowance for part of the expense being incurred, not in repairing the ship, but in taking care of the cargo, the expenditure, whether considered with reference to the insured value of the ship or to the value as realised by the subsequent sale, appears to be such as could scarcely have been incurred in a prudent management of the business. M'Calmont & Co., having acted as agents of the ship, by the authority of the master, given to him by the owners, may be considered as the agents of the owners; and it would be extraordinary if the owners, having insured the ship for more than its value, could get it repaired at an expense beyond the value of the ship and freight, and throw the excess upon the owners of the cargo. It is said that the shippers must have seen the repairs going on; but it does not appear that any notice was given them that the cargo would be in any way liable for the repairs. How the fact may really stand, must depend on the evidence to be hereafter adduced; but I am of opinion, that upon the statements made in the affidavits and in the pleadings, there is sufficient to shew that the Plaintiffs are entitled to have this case investigated in a Court of Equity; and this Court having jurisdiction to give relief upon bottomry bonds which have been improperly obtained, the only question is, whether the jurisdiction ought to be exercised after such proceedings as have already taken place in the Court of Admiralty.

Before this bill was filed, the cargo had been arrested, and afterwards released on putting in bail to the amount [416] of £7500, under the authority of the Court of Admiralty. "An act on petition" had been brought by the Defendants on the requisition of the Plaintiffs. The ship was ordered to be sold, and the freight payable on the goods of the Plaintiffs, ordered to be brought into Court.

The Defendants, M'Calmont Brothers & Co., as consignees of M'Calmont & Co., obtained possession of their goods without giving any bail; and the freights payable on these goods has not been paid into the Court of Admiralty.

The Plaintiffs, moreover, claim to have the outward freight of the ship, together with the homeward freight and the proceeds of the ship, applied in reduction of what, if anything, is really due on the bond, before the cargo is resorted to; but the outward freight was received by the owners, and there is no proceeding in the Admiralty Court in respect thereof.

The first question to be tried is, whether the bond is valid; and if so, what is the amount payable upon it. Supposing the bond to be valid, the objects will be:—

First. To realise and apply all the funds which ought to be applied in reduction of the claim, before the cargo is resorted to, including the freight payable on the goods shipped by M'Calmont & Co., and, as the Plaintiffs contend, the outward freight.

Secondly. To apportion the sum which may remain chargeable on the cargo between and amongst the goods of the Plaintiffs, in respect of which they have given bail to the amount of £7500, and the goods which were consigned to and have been received by M'Calmont [417] Brothers & Co., but in respect of which no security has been given.

These are objects which this Court has power to effect, if it should, in the result of this cause appear to be just to do so.

On the other hand, the Court of Admiralty has jurisdiction to decide whether the bond is valid or not, and if the bond be valid, to ascertain by reference to the registrar and merchants what sum is justly payable in respect of it. The Court of Admiralty can well deal with the purchase-money which it has, and also with the value of the Plaintiffs' goods for which bail was given, and I apprehend that it is not powerless with respect to the freight of the goods consigned to M'Calmont Brothers & Co., or even with respect to the outward cargo, because the Court may refuse to give to M'Calmont Brothers & Co. any relief, unless they, who are the actors in the Admiralty suit, consent to do what is just and equitable on their part, to take all necessary steps to bring proper parties before the Court, and raise all such questions as are necessary to enable the Court to do complete justice to the parties who are sought to be charged. But still it does not appear that the Court of Admiralty can, so conveniently, directly, and effectually as this Court can, compel the Defendants to do all that is necessary for the full and satisfactory investigation and determination of the rights of these parties.

Nothing was done towards determining the rights of the parties in the Admiralty Court before the filing of this bill. The Defendants had obtained bail for the amount of the Plaintiffs' goods, the amount of freight on the Plaintiffs' goods had been brought into Court, and a commission had issued for sale of the ship, and [418] although the ship had been sold, the commission had not been returned. The Defendant's "act on petition" was brought in in May, but nothing was done upon it. It is therefore evident, that the proceedings in the Court of Admiralty are not now in a state so effective for the investigation of the matters in question as the proceedings in this Court, even in this early stage of them, now are.

It is true, that the proceeding "by act on petition" was adopted at the instance of the Plaintiffs, but this was long before it appeared, that the value of the ship was so much less than might have been reasonably expected, and at this time the only proceeding is by "act on petition," which Sir William Scott (Ville de Varsovie, 2 Dods. 184) describes as "a summary mode of proceeding in which the parties state their respective cases briefly, and support their statement by affidavits, a form convenient enough in matters of slight interest and not of very delicate investigation." Conceiving that, upon a proper case being made out, and upon certain terms, the form of proceeding in the Admiralty Court might even now be altered and made more effective for the investigation of such a case as this, it is, I think, sufficient for me to say, that the proceedings in the form now adopted cannot be well adapted to a case, which appears to me to require evidence which it might be wholly impossible to obtain on affidavit.

It was suggested that a difficulty might arise in consequence of the money being paid into Court, and the bail being given under the authority of the Admiralty Court; but upon this point it does not seem to me that any doubt ought to be entertained. In a case before Sir William Scott (The Guardian, 3 Rob. 94), where he refused to exercise the juris-diction in a question of property, he expressed himself thus: "It is a case entirely proper for the discussion of other Courts, to which this Court (i.e., the Court of Admiralty) will undoubtedly be auxiliary in handing over the property as soon as it is determined in whom it legally resides, if the use of its process can be deemed serviceable to justice in carrying their judgments upon that point into direct execution;" and I can scarcely conceive a case in which any Court, in the exercise of its own jurisdiction, would have reluctance to assist any other Court in the administration of justice.

On the whole, therefore, this being a case in which it appears to me, that the transaction ought to be satisfactorily investigated, before the Plaintiffs are compelled to pay what may be due from them on the bond:—this Court having jurisdiction over the subject-matter, and having the means of complete investigation and effectually doing justice between the parties:—the proceedings in the Admiralty Court being now in such a state that (whatever power there may be to adopt a different course of proceeding), the investigation cannot be satisfactorily conducted, and there being equities, the determination of which can be satisfactorily secured in this Court only, I am of opinion that the injunction asked for must be granted.

NOTE.—The judgment was, in principle, affirmed by Lord Cottenham, on the 3d of August 1841.

[420] WILLATS v. BUSBY. Nov. 2, 1840.

A cause stood over for want of parties; one of such parties was brought before the Court, but another was out of the jurisdiction. Liberty was given to enter into evidence as to the former, and to prove the latter out of jurisdiction.

This was a bill filed for the specific performance of a contract for the sale of a freehold estate. When the cause came on for hearing, upon the 6th of August 1840, it was found that all the necessary parties were not before the Court; and the cause was ordered to stand over, for the purpose of the Plaintiff taking such steps as she might be advised with respect to the absent parties.

The Plaintiff accordingly enforced the appearance and answer of Edward Selater Busby, one of such parties, and the cause was now at issue as to him, but David William Busby, the other party, was still out of the jurisdiction of the Court, and had not appeared.

It was now moved, on behalf of the Plaintiff, that she might be at liberty to exhibit interrogatories to prove David W. Busby out of the jurisdiction; and that she might be at liberty, as against Edward S. Busby, to examine the several witnesses who had been examined against the Defendant as to whom the suit was before at issue, and such other witnesses as the Plaintiff might be advised; and that Edward S. Busby might be at liberty to cross-examine such witnesses, and to examine such witnesses by interrogatories, or as he might think fit, and for a commission.

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. James Russell, in support of the motion.

[421] Mr. Bacon, contrà, contended that the application was irregular, and that the Plaintiff ought to take steps to compel the appearance of the parties out of the jurisdiction, which might be done under the recent statutes.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS. I do not consider this application irregular. It is a great misfortune that the Plaintiff cannot compel the parties out of the jurisdiction to appear and answer; but I think he is entitled, as against those who have appeared, to have the opportunity of proving his case; and as to those abroad, he is entitled to prove them to be out of the jurisdiction.

[421] BAINBRIGGE v. BLAIR. Jan. 14, 1841.

A receiver who had been appointed in consequence of the misconduct and incapacity of trustees under a will, discharged, upon the appointment of new trustees by the Court.

A receiver is appointed for the benefit of all parties interested, and will not therefore be discharged, merely on the application of the party at whose instance he was appointed.

The testator, who died in 1818, devised and bequeathed his real and personal estate to three trustees, upon trust, after payment of his debts and certain legacies, for the Plaintiff for life, with remainder to her first and other sons in tail. The Plaintiff filed this bill for the administration of the estate, and in 1835 applied for a receiver of the estates, which was granted, on the grounds of the misconduct of one, and the incapacity, through age, of the other trustees. Mr. Blair, one of the trustees, became bankrupt, and a supplemental bill being filed, the several trustees were removed, and new trustees had been appointed under the sanction of the Court (1 Beavan, 495), and the estates conveyed to them.

The tenant for life died in 1838, and her eldest son, who was entitled to the estate, subject to the charges, [422] now applied by petition to discharge the receiver, on the ground that the trustees were willing to act, and that the expense of the receiver which amounted to £140 a year, would be saved thereby.

There were charges amounting to £10,000 on the estate, besides the legacies given by the will of the testator, and debts to the amount of £5000. To answer this, there were £8900 consols to the credit of the cause, and the estate produced £2000 a year. No report had been made by the Master of the debts and legacies. The legatees, whose legacies were charged on the real estate, were parties to the suit.

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Daniel, in support of the petition, contended, that, as responsible persons, approved by the Court, had been appointed trustees, and were willing to act gratuitously, there was no reason to continue the receiver at the expense of the tenant in tail: that the receiver had been appointed on the application of the Plaintiff alone, on the ground of the misconduct of the former trustees; and this ground having been removed, that the necessity for burthening the estate with the expense of a receiver had ceased. The trustees would undertake to pay the money into Court in the same way as the receiver had done.

Mr. S. Sharpe, for the legatees, who were the only parties who resisted the application, contended, that when a receiver is appointed by the Court, he is so appointed on behalf of all parties, and not of the Plaintiff only. Davis v. The Duke of Marlborough (2 Swans. 108). That the legatees had priority over the estate of the tenant in tail, and were entitled to the benefit of the [423] receiver. In Murrough v. French (2 Molloy, 498) it was held, that "if there are prior creditors parties in a cause, having claims on the estate, and the Court, by appointing a receiver, interferes with their rights, though the Plaintiff may dismiss his bill, yet the Court will protect the rights of such creditors, parties in the cause, by continuing the receiver, putting the persons so protected under terms to file a bill forthwith." Here, the legatees, relying on the security of the receiver, had had no opportunity of satisfying themselves of the solvency and fitness of the new trustees: that the continuance of the receiver was the only mode of compelling the Plaintiff to press forward the cause, and without one the legatees might be indefinitely delayed. He asked, if the receiver should be discharged then that the trustees might enter into their own recognizances for duly accounting for their receipts.

Mr. Pemberton, in reply. The legatees are parties to the cause, and were present at all the proceedings; they are, therefore, aware of the fitness of the trustees.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. There is no doubt, that where a receiver is appointed under the authority of the Court, he is appointed for the benefit of all parties interested: and therefore he will not be discharged merely on the application of the party at whose instance he was appointed. This, however, is not a case in which it is proposed to deprive one party of the protection he has by means of the receiver; but what is asked is, that the trustees should occupy the place of the receiver, and receive the rents and profits, and apply them in the same way as the receiver has been directed to apply them. The only way in [424] which the parties can be prejudiced is this, that whereas the receiver had given security for the due performance of his duty, the trustees would perform it in the execution of their trust, and without giving such security. It is said, that these trustees have been appointed in the absence of the persons who now oppose this application; the answer is, that the latter were parties to the cause, and were served with all the proceedings; the rejoinder is, "we had no occasion to look at the character or responsibility of the new trustees, because there was a receiver in whom we rely." What I have to consider is, that one party ought to have proper protection, and the other ought not to be unnecessarily charged with the costs of a receiver: and I think I ought not to continue the receiver, if I am satisfied that he may be discharged without injury to the legatees. The question then comes to this, whether there is sufficient reliance to be placed in the trustees. It would be quite a different case if the receiver were discharged, and the owner thereby put in possession; that is not the proposal here, it is proposed by means of the trustees, to do without expense that which is done by the receiver at the expense of the owner of the estate; and the only question is, whether it can be properly and satisfactorily done. If any objections were shewn to the trustees, I would not grant the application. In the absence of any personal objections to the trustees, and on the understanding that they will perform this duty gratuitously, I am disposed to discharge the receiver.

His Lordship discharged the receiver, the trustees undertaking, without entering into recognizances, to receive and to pass their accounts half yearly before the Master in the same way as the receiver.

[425] THE ATTORNEY-GENERAL V. KERR. Jan. 14, 1841.

[S. C. 10 L. J. Ch. 177. For other proceedings, see 2 Beav. 420; 4 Beav. 297.
See Attorney-General v. Pilgrim, 1849, 12 Beav. 62.]

The papers in the suit were accidentally burnt in the offices of the relator's solicitor, and new office copies became necessary for the hearing of the cause. A decree was afterwards pronounced against the Defendant, with costs as between party and party. Held, that the extra costs occasioned by this accident ought not to be borne by the Defendant.

By the decree, the costs, as between party and party, were ordered to be paid by the Defendants. In the taxation of the costs, it appeared that during the progress of the suit, the offices of the relator's solicitor, which were situate in the Temple, had been accidentally burnt, together with the papers in the cause, and it had therefore become necessary to have second copies of the proceedings in the cause, the charges for which were disallowed by the Master on taxation, he being of opinion that the loss ought not to fall on the Defendant.

This was a petition by way of appeal from the Master's decision, and seeking to have the costs in question disallowed.

Mr. Pemberton, in support of the petition, contended, that as the Defendants had failed in their defence, and were wrong from the beginning, they ought, under the decree, to pay the whole of the costs, which had been necessarily incurred in bringing the cause on before the Court for adjudication: that the papers having been destroyed through no fault or misconduct of the solicitor, had necessarily been supplied, and that the expense, which had been occasioned by the resistance of the Defendants to a just demand, ought to be borne by them. That, in a case analogous in principle, the point had been finally settled by the practice of the Master's office: for, generally, the fees of two counsel only were allowed, but where, by the advancement to the bench of one of the counsel who had been retained, it became necessary to instruct a third, the three fees [426] were allowed. In that case, as in the present, the clients were by accident deprived of the services of one of the counsel they had retained, and the losing party was held bound to bear the burthen of the accident.

Mr. G. Turner and Mr. P. Parry, contrâ. These are extra costs, which were ordered by the decree to be paid out of the fund, and ought not therefore to be charged against the Defendant. It is said they are necessarily incidental to the prosecution of the suit, so it might be said if the Plaintiff appointed a new solicitor; but the expenses incurred in making him acquainted with the nature of the suit would not fall on the Defendants. If this application be granted, the decision must lead to this, that a person ordered to pay taxed costs is liable for every accidental loss, as if the papers were stolen; besides this, the loss arises from matter foreign to the suit, and is not like the case put of counsels' fees, which are incidental to the suit: and the parties might have insured against loss by fire. If a Defendant is liable for the loss by fire of his adversary's papers while in his solicitor's offices, he would have an interest in the Plaintiff's papers, and consequently a right to see to their protection, he might then go to the solicitor, and insist on their being properly taken care of. This absurdity of such an interference, shews that the party in the hands of whose agent the papers were destroyed, must bear the loss.

Mr. Pemberton, in reply.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. There are many classes or degrees of costs: the late clerk in Court, Mr. Jackson, computed not less than seven. (Chancery Commission Report, Appendix B, No. 24, p. 552.) In this case the Defendants are charged with [427] the costs of the cause as between party and party, and the question is, whether they are to be charged with every expense necessarily incurred in the cause, though arising from accidental circumstances over which they have no control, and for the loss of property to which they could afford no protection? I am sorry to hear that the case as to counsel has ever given rise to any question, but I do not think the case analogous. If I were to grant this application, I must lay down the rule that when any additional expense is necessarily incurred by a Plaintiff in the prosecution of the suit, that expense ought to be part of the costs of the suit as between party and party. I must dismiss this petition with costs.

THE ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. KERR.—After judgment had been given in this case, see 2 Beavan, 420, the terms of the decree as to compensation to Dr. Kerr's estate, became the subject of considerable discussion. The following is an extract of the decree as ultimately settled:—

"And his Lordship doth declare, that the estate of the said William Kerr will, upon the determination of the said term granted by the said lease of the 4th of January 1769, be entitled to have allowed out of the charity estate, compensation for the increased annual value, if any, to the charity at the time of the determination of the term granted by such lease of the said lands and premises comprised therein, arising from or occasioned by the expenditure of the said William Kerr and the said Mary Kerr after his decease, before the filing of the information in the first above-mentioned cause, in and upon the said land and premises, beyond what the annual value of the said land and premises would have been to the said charity at the time of the determination of such last-mentioned lease, supposing the covenants therein contained to have been duly performed; such compensation, if any, to be computed with reference to the additional term intended or expressed to be granted by the said lease of the 18th December 1784. And the said Mary Kerr, or any party or parties therein interested, are to be at liberty to apply to this Court when such order shall be made, upon the footing of the said declaration, as the case may require."

[428] GOOCH v. HAWORTH. Jan. 14, 1841.

A. B. had obtained an order in the Exchequer for payment of costs, against a party to a suit in this Court, who was tenant for life of certain property over which a receiver had been appointed, with directions to pay her the rents. The Court gave leave to A. B., notwithstanding the appointment of receiver, to sue out and execute such writs as he might be advised.

In 1833 Sarah Haworth instituted a suit in the equity side of the Court of Exchequer, which, at the hearing in May 1840, was dismissed with costs, to be paid to Fanny Bostock, a Defendant in that suit. The costs were afterwards taxed at the sum of £398; the certificate of taxation was dated the 8th of July 1840.

Under the 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, s. 20, and the General Orders of the Court of Exchequer (3 Younge & Col. App. iv.), Fanny Bostock became entitled to issue a writ of fiat facias or elegit. By the same Act, sect. 11, the sheriff under an elegit is authorised to make and deliver execution unto the party suing, of all such lands, &c., as the person against whom execution should be sued, or any person in trust for him, should have been seized, &c.; and it was also enacted by the eighteenth section, that all decrees and orders of Courts of Equity, &c., whereby any money or costs should be payable, should have the effects of judgments in the Superior Courts of Common Law.

Fanny Bostock presented a petition in the above suit of Gooch v. Haworth, which had been instituted in this Court, stating these circumstances, and that Sarah Haworth, who was residing in France, had no other property of any kind in this kingdom whereon levy could be made for the said costs, except a life interest in the real estate of Peter Everitt Mestaer, the testator in the cause, which by virtue of orders made in this cause [429] (Gooch v. Haworth) were under the management, and in the possession of the receiver of the Court. The rents of the estate were, by order of the Court, paid by the receiver to Sarah Haworth, the tenant for life.

The petition also stated, that if the estate had not been in the hands and possession of the receiver of this Court, the Petitioner would have been able to issue an elegit against the said estate, and seize the same for enforcing payment of the costs of the Exchequer suit.

The petition prayed, either that the receiver might be authorised to pay the £398, the amount of taxed costs; or that the Petitioner might be at liberty to sue out a writ of elegit, and put it in execution against the life-estate of Sarah Haworth, and cause the same to be seized, and possession given to the Petitioner, for the purpose of securing the £398, and that the receiver might be ordered to give up possession; and that the Petitioner's costs of this petition might be taxed.

The petition was served on the clerk in Court of Sarah Haworth and on the receiver, and was supported by affidavit.

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Follett, for the Petitioner.

Mr. C. P. Cooper, contra, contended that the interest of Mrs. Haworth was not such as could be taken in execution at law; and that, if the Petitioner had a mere charge to be made effectual in equity, her application was premature, for by the thirteenth section of the Act referred to (1 & 2 Vict. c. 110), it is enacted, that no judgment creditor shall be entitled to proceed in equity to obtain the benefit [430] of his charge, until after the expiration of one year from the time of entering up judgment; and here the decree was in May 1840, and the Master's report in July 1840.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale] said, the only question was, if the receiver of this Court was to stand in the way of the legal rights of the Petitioner against the property of Mrs. Haworth; that would depend on the purpose for which the receiver had been appointed. The rents, it appeared, were to be paid over to the Respondent; his Lordship, therefore, thought, that notwithstanding the appointment of receiver, the Petitioner ought to be at liberty to sue out and execute such writs as she might be advised; and he made the order in the latter alternative of the prayer of the petition.

[430] STUART v. STUART. Jan. 14, 15, 1841.

An application under the 4 & 5 W. 4, c. 29, to invest trust funds on Irish security refused, for though for the benefit of the tenant for life, as increasing his income, it was otherwise as to those in remainder, as affording a less secure investment.

The testator gave his real and personal estate to trustees in trust, to convert and lay out the same "in the public funds of Great Britain, or at interest upon Government or real securities in England or Wales," and at their discretion to vary the same. He gave the income to his wife, subject to two several sums of £10,000 each to his daughters, and subject to the interest of his wife, he gave the residue to his two daughters, if they should attain twenty-one years, or marry under that age with the consent of their guardians. There was a gift over to other parties in case of the daughters not obtaining vested interests in the funds. The daughters had been declared to be entitled to the interest on the contingent legacies of £10,000.

[431] The daughters were infants, and some of the parties entitled over in contingency were infants, and married women.

A considerable sum being in Court, the widow presented a petition under the 4 & 5 W. 4, c. 29, praying to be at liberty to lay before the Master proposals for investing it on mortgage on real securities in Ireland, and if he approved of the proposal, to inquire into the title of the estates.

By the Act above cited, persons having authority under any direction, trust, or power, to lend money at interest on real securities in England, Wales, or Great Britain, are authorised to lend the same on real securities in Ireland.

Mr. S. Sharpe, for the petition.

Mr. Pemberton, for the infant Plaintiffs.

Mr. J. J. Jervis, for the Defendant.

Jan. 15. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. I have read over the petition and the Act of Parliament, and it seems that the £10,000 is given over to other persons on a certain contingency. If the fund had been in the hands of the trustees, they would have been bound to act for the benefit of all parties interested in the fund, not for the benefit of the tenant for life only. Such being the duty of the trustees, and the fund being in Court, it becomes equally my duty, to see that the proposed variation in the investment will be for the benefit of all the parties interested therein. The direction in the will to lay out in England or [432] Wales, is a strong argument that the testator's intention was that it should not be laid out elsewhere. I could not order the fund to be laid out in Ireland without a reference to the Master; and the question is, whether it can possibly be for the benefit of all parties that the fund should be so invested. I can conceive that it will be for the benefit of the Petitioner, because the investment will produce her a larger income if vested in Irish securities; but I cannot see how it can be beneficial for those entitled in remainder to change the present secure investment. I do not think that I can even direct a reference to the Master on the subject.

[432] OLDFIELD v. COBBETT. Jan. 18, 1841.

[S. C. 2 Beav. 444; 12 Beav. 91; 1 Ph. 557; 1 Coll. 169; 1 Ph. 613.]

An executor or administrator cannot sue or defend in forma pauperis.

Mr. Cobbett presented a petition, the object of which was to discharge the order for dispaupering him. (2 Beavan, 444.)

Mr. C. P. Cooper, in support of the petition, contended, that the order was erroneous, as the Defendant was defending not only in his character of executor, but as a legatee and creditor; and that the latter character was sufficient to support the order to defend in forma pauperis. That a party might even be examined pro inter esse suo as a pauper, James v. Dore (2 Dickens, 788).

That there was a difference recognised in practice between an executor suing in forma pauperis, and defending in that manner, and as in the latter case he [433] was brought before the Court in invitum, he was allowed to defend in forma pauperis. Paradise v. Sheppard (1 Dick. 136; and see Beames on Costs, App. 377) and Wallop v. Warburton (2 Cox, 411), were cited.

Mr. Pemberton was not heard on the other side.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. The Defendant has had the advantage of having the point which he argued in person again discussed with learning and ability by his counsel, but I see no reason for coming to a different conclusion from that to which I arrived on a former occasion.

According to my understanding of the practice of this Court, a party cannot either sue or defend in forma pauperis when he happens to be a mere executor or administrator. The practice was clearly ascertained by my immediate predecessor, who had occasion to investigate the point when sitting here. It seems that the Defendant Cobbett being the executor of his father's will, and defending the suit in that character, obtained an order empowering him to defend in forma pauperis. Having obtained the order to defend, he has taken the benefit of the Insolvent Act, and his beneficial interest has therefore passed to them, and in consequence the order has been discharged.

It is said that it ought not to be discharged, because Mr. Cobbett has an interest besides, first as creditor, and secondly as legatee; yet it is admitted, that the latter interest is vested in his assignees, and that he is now only a party to this suit in his representative character, in respect of which, if his conduct be without impeach-[434]-ment he may ultimately be declared entitled to have his costs out of the fund.

I am of opinion that the order was right, and this petition must therefore be dismissed with costs.

[434] HOLFORD v. PHIPPS. Jan. 20, 1841.

[S. C. 10 L. J. Ch. 209; 5 Jur. 36; 4 Beav. 475.]

Where parties call on trustees to part with their estate on the ground that their trusts have terminated, they are bound clearly and satisfactorily to shew the fact to the trustees.

Trustees of a term, the trusts of which had been put an end to by the cestui que trust, held entitled to their costs of a suit to compel an assignment of the term to the purchaser of the property, on the ground that full and accurate information had not been tendered them before bill filled.

This bill was filed by the purchaser of an estate against the trustees of a marriage settlement, in whom was vested a term of ninety-nine years to secure to the wife upon the death of her husband a rent charge of £400 by way of jointure. The object of the bill was to compel the trustees to surrender the term, and to pay the costs of the suit.

No evidence was entered into, and the only question being one of costs, the Defendants had the benefit of the statements contained in their answer; in this situation of things the facts appeared to be as follows:—

By the settlement made on the marriage of Mr. and Mrs. Crespigny, dated in 1814, Mr. Crespigny granted to his wife out of large real estates, a rent charge of £400 for life, in case she should survive him, as her jointure and in bar of dower, and he demised the estate to three trustees, Phipps, Trent, and Murray, for a term of ninety-nine years on trusts, for securing the same. In 1837 Mr. Crespigny and his eldest son, who had attained twenty-one, agreed to sell the estate to Major Holford, and the latter retained a sum of £11,430 on mortgage of the estate, as an indemnity against the [435] jointure of £400 a year. So far as appeared, the sale was effected without any communication whatever with the trustees, but on the 29th of January 1838 the draft of a deed was sent to the trustees, whereby Mrs. Crespigny purported to release her jointure of £400 a year, and whereby the trustees by her direction, purported to convey the term of ninety-nine years, to the intent that it might merge. No consideration appeared on the deed for the release of Mrs. Crespigny's right.

On the 9th of February 1838 Mr. and Mrs. Crespigny called at the office of the solicitor of the Defendants, and there had an interview with Defendant Murray, and upon that occasion Mrs. Crespigny stated, that she was willing to release her jointure, provided the said annual sum of £400 should be properly secured to her in some other way, and that her husband then said, that the annuity should be secured by an investment of stock; whereupon the Defendant Murray observed, that if such stock should be placed in the names of the trustees of the marriage settlement, the trustees would assign the term, but Mr. Crespigny the husband, refused to allow such stock to be invested in the names of the trustees of the marriage settlement. On the day following, the 10th of February 1838, Mr. Murray returned the draft with the following memorandum indorsed thereon:—"Having looked at this draft, I must express my surprise that it was presented to me without any kind of explanation. With Captain Trent, the brother of the lady, I have now communicated, and he desires me to state that he was equally uninformed of the proposed surrender of Mrs. Crespigny's jointure of £400 per annum; he however concurs with me in agreeing that if the sum retained by Major Holford (viz., the sum of [436] £11,430) is invested in the funds, or on mortgage in the trustees' names for protecting this jointure, he will consent to surrender the term, but not otherwise. In this Captain Phipps the other trustee coincides."

Nothing was shewn to have taken place between the parties between this time (the 10th of February 1838), and the 8th of November, when the Plaintiff's solicitor wrote to the trustees as follows:—"On the part of Major Holford, the purchaser of Mr. Charles Crespigny's estate of Cathedine, in the county of Brecon, as well as on that of Mr. and Mrs. Charles Crespigny, we are instructed to apply to you to know whether you will assign the term of ninety-nine years vested in you and your co-trustees for securing Mrs. Crespigny's jointure of £400. Mrs. Crespigny by a deed acknowledged according to the statute has discharged the estate from the jointure, as she has an undoubted right to do; and Major Holford, having paid the whole consideration money, is entitled to have the term assigned to a trustee of his nomination. Mr. Crespigny has amply secured Mrs. Crespigny's jointure by an investment of a competent sum in the public funds, and the deed by which it is secured, we are willing, for your satisfaction, but not as a matter of right, to produce and shew to you before any proceedings are taken to enforce an assignment. We have thought it right to require an explicit answer, whether or not you will assign the term, and should you decline to do so, for what reason."

No answer was returned to this letter, and nothing more appeared to have been done until the 6th of February 1839, when Major Holford filed this bill against the trustees, stating that Mrs. Crespigny by deed duly acknowledged, dated the 10th of April 1838, had released her jointure, and that nevertheless the [437] trustees refused to execute the deed of assignment, though a provision had been made for the jointure by an investment in the funds in the names of three trustees; the bill prayed for a surrender of the term, and that the trustees might pay the costs of the suit.

The deeds which were received in evidence by admissions between the parties, shewed that the estates in question had been conveyed to the purchaser on the 5th of April 1837, who retained the sum of £11,430 on mortgage, as an indemnity against the rent charge until it had been released; and that by a deed of the 7th of April 1837, the purchaser mortgaged the property in fee to secure the sum retained; it appeared also from a declaration of trust, that on the 6th of April 1838 Mr. Crespigny had transferred the sum of £11,428 3½ per cents. to trustees for the purpose of securing the £400 a year.

The Defendants by their answer stated, that the settlement of 1814 had been made under an order of this Court, Mrs. Crespigny being at the time of her marriage a ward; that no evidence of the execution and acknowledgment of the deed of the 10th of April 1838 by Mrs. Crespigny had been produced to them, and that no ingrossment thereof had been tendered or produced to them. They submitted that they ought not to have taken upon themselves to determine whether Mrs. Crespigny had power to release her jointure, and, that they ought not to render any assistance or voluntarily to do any act to defeat the aforesaid provision for Mrs. Crespigny. They further insisted, that if they were bound to release the term (in case the said Mrs. Crespigny had duly released her jointure), proper evidence of such release and of all acts essential to make the same valid ought to have been produced to them; but that [438] such evidence had not been produced, and that no deed had ever been tendered to them for their execution, or produced or shewn to them.

Mr. E. J. Lloyd, for the Plaintiff. Upon Mrs. Crespigny releasing her jointure, the trustees possessed a bare legal term, and had no longer any trust to execute. They were bound, therefore, to assign the term to the purchaser who had paid the whole of his purchase-money; they had no right to stipulate for terms, and insist that an investment should be made in their own names to secure the jointure. They absolutely refused to assign the term, except on certain conditions which they were not justified in imposing; and if they had taken the opinion of any counsel, they would have been advised that their objection could not be sustained. They did not do this, but exceeded their duty; their vexatious conduct rendered this suit necessary, and they ought therefore to pay the costs which they have occasioned.

They now say, that no deed or evidence was tendered to them, but they made no such requisition; to the letter of November 1838, which gave them full information, they returned no answer; this shewed that they persisted in their refusal to assign until their terms had been complied with. He cited Angier v. Stannard (3 Myl. & K. 566), Willis v. Hiscox (4 Myl. & Cr. 197).

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Piggott, contra. The Defendants have no interest, except to protect the rights of the married lady, for which purpose alone they were appointed by this Court; having no interest it was the duty of those who called on them to take any active step and determine the trusts, to shew, satisfactorily, that the [439] trustees would incur no personal responsibility; and that their cestui que trust had fairly and with full knowledge given up her rights, and that they were satisfactorily provided for.

The sale took place altogether behind the back of the trustees, and in January 1838, several months after the conveyance, they were suddenly called on to divest themselves of the term. In the next month Mrs. Crespigny herself stated that she was only willing to give up her jointure, "provided that it could be properly secured in some other way;" and to this day it had not been shewn that such security has been given. Nothing was done from February to November, and then no further proof was furnished to the trustees. Surely, therefore, under these circumstances, the trustees were justified in not executing an assignment of the term, if it had been tendered, which it has not. A trustee would not be justified in paying over a legacy to the husband of a married woman, until a provision had been made for her out of it.

The rule of Court is, that trustees are entitled to their costs, unless they act from motives of obstinacy and caprice. Taylor v. Glanville (3 Madd. 177). Even where they act erroneously, the Court gives them their costs, Poole v. Pass (1 Beav. 600), and the Court in none of these cases have ordered them to bear the costs of their cestui que trusts. Knight v. Martin (1 Russ. & Myl. 70), Angier v. Stannard. In the latter case there were many circumstances of conduct which are not set out in the report, and which influenced Sir John Leach in his decision.

Mr. Lloyd, in reply.

[440] THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. The arrangements for the sale of this property appear to have been made without any communication with the trustees, and the first intimation to them, so far as appears, was the sending the draft in January, whereby the trustees were suddenly called on to assign the term for the purpose of its being merged, and to divest themselves of their legal power to protect this jointure. The draft was returned on the 10th of February 1838, and though the parties proceeded to act on the arrangement, and got the assignment executed by Mrs. Crespigny in April following, yet I do not find that any communication was made to the trustees until November, when they were peremptorily called on to execute the assignment. No answer was sent, and this bill was filed.

Though I consider that an answer ought to have been sent to that letter, yet I think that I never heard a more unreasonable demand than that which is now made for the whole costs of this proceeding. According to the present constitution of our law, a very large proportion of the property in this country is vested in trustees; and it is too often manifest in this Court, that, in dealing with trust property, trustees have a very arduous and painful duty to perform; their greatest difficulty ordinarily seems to be to say "no" to the importunities and requests of their cestui que trusts. They are subject to the most hazardous responsibilities, and in cases where they have mistaken their duties and acted erroneously, and where they have assisted or obstructed parties in the disposition of the trust property, we find they have been made personally liable for the consequences. It is therefore of the utmost importance that they should do nothing but what is perfectly clear and free from doubt. In the present case the trustees had a [441] duty to perform in the protection of this married lady; and when it was alleged that this duty had been put an end to, they were entitled to have the facts clearly and satisfactorily proved to them.

It seems, that between the time when the trustees received the draft assignment and returned it with the memorandum stated, they had had a personal communication with their cestui que trust, who said she was willing to release her jointure, provided it could be properly secured in some other way; this communication took place the very day preceding that, on which the memorandum on the draft was written. The Plaintiff alleges by his counsel, that I must take this memorandum as a determination on the part of the trustees, that, unless their conditions were complied with, they would make no assignment of the term. It does not, however, appear, that they had had any communication in the interim with their cestui que trust, and I cannot assume, that on being properly satisfied, that that which was alleged to have been done had been rightly performed, the trustees would have refused to do what is now asked. Nothing more occurred until the month of November, when, without taking the trouble of satisfying the Defendants that the trusts had been determined, the Plaintiff's solicitor wrote the letter of the 8th of November. No notice seems to have been taken of it, and then this bill was filed. I am of opinion that the trustees were entitled to further explanation and evidence, which was not produced to them; and that without it, they were justified in refraining from making the assignment. I certainly think that an answer ought to have been returned to the letter; but the neglect to do so, did not relieve the Plaintiff from the performance of his duty of shewing to the trustees that there was an end of the trust, and of producing to them the deed effecting it. [442] This ought to have been done before the bill was filed, if the Plaintiff wished to charge the trustees with the costs of these proceedings.

With regard to the general observations which have been made on trustees during the argument, and without referring to these Defendants, I must observe, that in my experience I have known very many cases in which changes of trustees have been made, solely for the purpose of getting the trust property into the hands of trustees who were willing to comply with requests which the old trustees had refused to accede to. Without imputing any such intention in this case, yet when I find the husband and wife in the presence of the trustees disagreeing, the trustees saying they will be satisfied, if a proper investment to secure the jointure be made in their names, and the husband declining, though he afterwards made an investment in the names of other trustees, I think there was good ground for the Defendants to insist on having the matter cleared up before they merged the term.

Thinking, therefore, that the trustees were entitled to have full and accurate information, and the production of the deed before they could be called on to execute the assignment, and their trusts now appearing to be at an end, there must be a decree for the assignment of the term, and the Plaintiff must pay the trustees their costs of suit.

A testator directed his trustees "to raise £5000 for his daughter," and to invest "his said daughter's legacy" and pay the interest to her for life, for her separate use, and not to be under the control of any husband, with remainder to her children absolutely, and he gave her the power of appointing a life interest to her husband. The will contained no ultimate limitation of the property, but charged the legacy on the real estate in case of a deficiency of the personality. Held, that subject to the interests given to the children, the daughter took an absolute interest, and having died unmarried, that her personal representatives were entitled thereto.

The testator, Dr. Townsend, by his will, dated the 7th of June 1830, gave his residuary personal estate to trustees, in the first place to pay his debts, and subject thereto, to "raise therefrom the sum of £5000 for his daughter Elizabeth L. Townsend; and when, and as soon as he or they might have obtained the same, then upon trust to place his said daughter's legacy at interest on Government or real security, and to pay and apply the dividends to arise thereby, unto his said daughter for and during the term of her natural life, to and for her sole and separate use and benefit;" and he declared the same should not be liable to the debts, controul, or engagements of any husband with whom she might marry; "and from and immediately after the decease of his said daughter (subject nevertheless to the proviso thereafter contained), he gave and bequeathed the legacy so thereinbefore given to her by him, to be equally divided between her children lawfully begotten, share and share alike; but if there should be only one such child, then the whole to such one child, his executors or administrators. Provided always, and it was his will and meaning, and he did thereby declare, that it should and might be lawful for his said daughter, provided she might marry, to direct, appoint, and require by any will or deed, under her hand, his said trustees, and the survivor, &c., to pay the interest of the said sum of £5000 so given by him, to her husband, for and during the term of his natural [444] life, in case he might outlive her;" and in case his personal estate should not be adequate to raise "the legacy" bequeathed to his daughter, then he charged it on certain real estates.

The testator and his wife had a power of appointment over a sum of £2000 for his younger children charged on another estate. On the 7th of June 1830 they appointed £1950, part of it, to trustees, upon trust to invest and pay it to his daughter Elizabeth L. Townsend for life for her separate use, with remainder to her children, with power for her to give her husband a life interest in the fund, "and subject thereto, upon trust for the said Elizabeth L. Townsend, her executors, administrators, and assigns."

By a codicil of even date, after referring to the deed of appointment, the testator declared, that the sum of £1950 should be considered as part of the legacy given to her by his will, and he charged the residue on certain hereditaments which he had devised to the Defendant William Townsend.

The testator died in 1830, and his personal estate proved insufficient for the payment of his debts and legacies. His daughter died in 1838 without ever having been married. The Plaintiff, who was her executor, filed this bill to have the £3050, the residue of the £5000 after deducting the £1950 raised out of the real estates charged therewith.

Mr. Tinney, Mr. Pemberton, and Mr. K. Parker, for the Plaintiff. The gift was absolute to the daughter in the first instance, but the testator afterwards subjected that in-[445]-terest to certain limitations to her children, and to a power in favour of her husband; the absolute gift, therefore, remained in her, subject to the qualification introduced in favour of the husband and children which failed; the daughter therefore took an absolute interest, and the Plaintiff, as representing her, is now entitled. The expressions "my said daughter's legacy," "the legacy given to her," "the legacy bequeathed to my daughter," shew clearly that the testator intended to give it her absolutely, and the ultimate trust in the deed of £1950, to her executors, administrators, and assigns, fortifies that conclusion.

Mr. G. Turner and Mr. Parry, contra, for the Defendant out of whose estate it was sought to raise the charge, contended, that the daughter did not take an absolute interest in the £3050. The trustees were directed to raise the £5000, but as to her for the limited interest afterwards specified, namely, for life only, and then for the other purposes stated; these having all failed, and there being no ultimate trust, the charge sunk for the benefit of those entitled to the estate out of which it was to be raised. (See Cooke v. The Stationers' Company, 3 Myl. & K. 262.) In Hewitt v. Wright (1 Bro. C. C. 86; and see Gawler v. Standerwick, 2 Cox, 15), an estate was conveyed, in trust to sell and raise a sum of £1500, and pay the interest to D. till she married, and to pay her the principal within twelve months after her marriage. D. died without having been married, and it was held that the £1500 resulted to the settler. A trust in favour of the daughter, further than to the extent expressed, cannot be implied; for the law never implies, and the Court never presumes, a trust, except in a case of absolute necessity. Cook v. Fountain (3 Swans. 592).

[446] The deed in no way strengthens the construction contended for by the Plaintiff, for it shews that when the testator intended to give an absolute interest to his daughter in default of children, he accurately expresses it. The husband, also, is to have no controul over the property, but he might obtain it, contrary to the will of the testator, if the wife were held to take an absolute interest, and died without children, leaving a husband surviving.

Mr. Willcock, for a trustee.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. In one sense this was not an absolute gift to the daughter, for it is made subject to certain restrictions and contingencies which her father had in contemplation. The testator first directs the trustees "to raise the sum of £5000 for his daughter Elizabeth." If he had ended there, she would, without any question whatever, have been entitled to the legacy absolutely; he then directs, that when the trustees should have obtained the same, they should invest it, and then he imposes certain restrictions; and first the trustees are to apply the dividends unto the daughter for her separate use for life. Suppose the will had ended here, I apprehend the daughter, being unmarried at her father's death, would have been entitled to have taken the £5000 absolutely, notwithstanding the gift was to her separate use, and notwithstanding the decision of Sir John Leach to the contrary, which has been since overruled (Woodmeston v. Walker, 2 Russ. & M. 197). After the decease of the daughter, there is a limitation to her children; by this contingency, she might be deprived of her absolute interest, and it might go to her children; there follows a power under which she might further diminish her interest, by giving a life-estate to any husband. It is said, that it could not be intended that she should take an absolute interest, be-[447]-cause, if there were no children, a husband surviving her, might take the property absolutely; I apprehend there would be a great deal to say on that point; but it does not arise; the question is, whether the legacy given absolutely by the first clause, is to be subject to any other contingencies or limitations beyond those expressed; and without looking to the deed (which would confirm my opinion), it appears to me that the qualifications and restrictions ought not to be extended beyond those expressed. None of these having taken effect, the absolute interest remained in the daughter, and the Plaintiff is entitled to have the amount raised.

[447] THE ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. WRIGHT. Feb. 8, 1841.

Notice of motion given on behalf of a relator in an information, held irregular; it should be on behalf of the Attorney-General.

This was an information filed by the Attorney-General at the instance of a relator.

Notice of motion was given, "on behalf of the relator," that the Defendant should pay a sum of money into Court.

Mr. Chandless, contra, objected to the form of the notice of motion, the Court not recognising the relator as Plaintiff in an information.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. It is wrong in form. Relators should know that they are not parties to informations, and have no right of their own authority to make any application to the Court. The Attorney-General is the only person whom the Court recognises in such cases. (See Attorney-General v. The Ironmongers' Company, 2 Beav. 313.)

[448] BALLS v. MARGRAVE. Feb. 11, 1841.

[S. C. 3 Beav. 284; 4 Beav. 119.]

A. brought an action at law against B., and filed a bill of discovery, in aid of the action, against B. alone. B. pleaded that he was a mere mortgagee, and that he ought not to be compelled to give the discovery in the absence of C. the mortgagor. The plea was overruled.

This cause again came on (3 Beav. 284) upon a plea to a bill of discovery, in aid of an action at law.

The bill stated that in the year 1769 Thomas Cheek, being seized in fee-simple of certain property, demised it to one Joseph Rowland for a term of ninety-nine years, at a rent of £26, which Rowland, for himself, his executors, administrators, and assigns, covenanted to pay. It traced the devolution of the interest of Thomas Cheek, the lessor, to the Plaintiff, and shewed how the remainder of the term had become vested in the Defendant by an assignment from a Lady Daniel. It stated that the Defendant was in possession of the property, and that the rent being considerably in arrear, the Plaintiff had commenced an action of covenant against the Defendant Margrave, in the Court of Exchequer, to recover the same; but that the indenture of lease being in the possession of the Defendant, who refused to produce the same, or to allow the Plaintiff to have an inspection, and there being no counterpart thereof, the Plaintiff was unable to proceed in the action without a discovery.

The bill prayed a discovery of the matters stated in the bill, and especially of the particulars of the lease; and that the Plaintiff might have the benefit of such discovery at the trial of the action; and that the lease might be produced.

The Defendant pleaded in effect, that the conveyance by Lady Daniel to Margrave was by way of mort-[449]-gage, and subject to redemption; that the equity of redemption was vested in Chinn, who had not been made a party to the suit; and that, in his absence, the Defendant was not bound, and ought not to be compelled to give to the Plaintiff the discovery and production sought by the bill.

Mr. Kindersley and Mr. Evans, in support of the plea, contended that Chinn ought to have been made a party to this suit, in order to entitle the Plaintiff to the discovery which they sought. [Mr. Pemberton. That would be impossible. Glyn v.

Scars (3 Myl. & K. 450; 1 Y. & Coll. 644; and 1 West, P. C. 258) and Irving v. Thompson (9 Sim. 17) shew that no person can be made a party to a bill of discovery in aid of an action at law who is not a party to the action.] Lord Eldon, in Lambert v. Rogers (2 Mer. 490; and see Faw v. Guppy, Hare Disc. 124), lays it down "that a mortgagee has no right to shew his mortgagor's title." The Defendant, therefore, would not be justified in disclosing the title in the absence of the mortgagor.

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Taylor were not heard by

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale], who said: This plea must be overruled. The action is brought against a person who is in possession of the property, and the alleged mortgagor is no party to the action. The bill is for a discovery in aid of the proceedings at law; and the case is very different from that cited, which was for relief. I have no authority to alter the practice of the Court, which does not permit any person to be made a Defendant to a bill for discovery in aid of an action who is not a party to that action. I have no hesitation at all in overruling this plea.

[450] RADBURN v. JERVIS. HARE v. HILL. Nov. 23, 26, 1840; Feb. 22, 1841.

A testator, in his lifetime, by bond secured to H. C. C. an annuity of £300 for life, payable on the usual quarter days, &c.; and by his will he confirmed it, and bequeathed a further annuity of £200, payable in the same manner, it being his intention that she should receive an annuity of £500 instead of £300. By a codicil, the testator directed his trustees to raise £500 a year and pay the same to H. C. C. during her life, by quarterly payments. Held, that the second annuity was cumulative.

A testator appointed A. B. and C. D. trustees and executors of his will. By a codicil, he bequeathed to each of the trustees named in his will the sum of £5000, on condition that he accepted the trusts thereof. By a subsequent codicil, he revoked all that part of his will which related to C. D., and requested E. F. "to undertake and fulfil the same purposes and intentions, and on the same conditions, for the effecting of which he had appointed the said C. D. By a subsequent codicil he revoked the appointment of A. B. and C. D. as trustees and executors, and all legacies to them, and he nominated E. F. executor and trustee thereof. Held, that E. F. was entitled to the legacy of £5000.

A testator devised a portion of his real estate to trustees for sale, and directed them to apply the proceeds and his personal estate in payment of the legacies and annuities thereby bequeathed; and in case the same should be insufficient, he charged all his real estate with the payment thereof. By several unattested codicils, he gave further legacies and annuities, and subsequently he executed a duly attested codicil, whereby he varied the appointment of trustees and executors. Held, that the legacies and annuities bequeathed by the unattested codicils, were not charged on the real estate.

A perpetual annuity was granted by King Charles the Second to A. and his heirs payable out of the coal duties. Held, that though descendable to the heirs, it was personal and not real estate.

Several questions arose in this cause upon the will and thirteen codicils of Sir Thomas Clarges, Bart., which so far as they are material, were as follows:—

By his will, duly attested and dated the 18th day of August 1821, the testator expressed himself as follows: "I give and devise unto and to the use of Henry Brooksbank, of Pall Mall, Middlesex, banker, and Johnathan Moore, of Gray's Inn, Middlesex, gentleman, their heirs, executors, and administrators, according to the natures and qualities thereof respectively, my manors and estates of Sutton-upon-Derwent in the county of York, and of Norton, Disney, and Bitshfield in the county of Lincoln, [451] the freehold annuity of £500 per annum, secured to me and my heirs under a grant from King Charles II., my moiety of the theatre at Brighthelmstone, in the county of Sussex, and all and singular other my lands, tenements, goods, chattels, and effects, of what nature or kind soever and wheresoever, upon trust as to the said manors and estates of Sutton-upon-Derwent and at Norton and Disney, and their appurtenances" (the testator then declared the trusts of this property and some leaseholds in favour of certain families therein named, and then continued): "As to my estate of Bitchfield, I direct the same to be sold and converted into money; and hereby authorise my said trustees, or the trustees or trustee for the time being of this my will, to give receipts for the purchase-money upon such sale, and declare that their or his receipt shall discharge any purchaser from all liability in case of non-application or misapplication thereof. And as well as to the money to be produced from such sale as also to the residue of my estate and effects whatsoever and wheresoever not hereinbefore specifically devised or bequeathed, in trust, thereout, to pay all my just debts, the expenses of my funeral, and of proving this my will, and the legacies and annuities hereby bequeathed; and in case the same shall be insufficient for that purpose, then I charge all my real estate with the payment of the same respectively, and subject thereto, for the said Sir Dudley Saint Leger Hill, his heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns, for his and their own use and benefit." He then gave the trustees certain powers, and directed that the said Jonathan Moore should be allowed to act as the solicitor or attorney in the management of the trusts thereby created, so long as he should continue a trustee under the said will, and should also act as receiver for the same; and he gave to his trustees a power of sale and exchange over his real estates, and proceeded: [452] "And I hereby confirm three several bonds, by one of which I have secured one annuity of £300 to Harriet Catherine Cock, of Brighthelmstone aforesaid, spinster, during her life, in the event of her surviving me; by the second of which, an annuity of the like amount is secured to Sarah Cock of Bellevue Cottage East, in Brighthelmstone aforesaid, during her life, in the event of her surviving me and the said Harriet Catherine Cock; and the third of which bonds secures an annuity of the same amount to William Cock of Brighthelmstone aforesaid, Esquire, for his life, in the event of his surviving me, the said Harriet Catherine Cock, and the said Sarah Cock; and, in addition to the £300 so secured to the said Harriet Catherine Cock, I give and bequeath to her the further annuity or yearly sum of £200, to become due and be payable at the same days and in the same proportions, and in every respect in the same manner, as in the said bond by which the said annuity of £300 is secured to her, it being my intention that the said Harriet Catherine Cock shall receive a full annuity of £500, to be payable and be considered, in every respect, as if that sum had been originally mentioned in the said bond, instead of the said sum of £300." The testator appointed Henry Brooksbank and Jonathan Moore executors of his will.

The testator afterwards made thirteen codicils to his will, two only of which, viz., the first and eleventh, were attested by three witnesses.

By the first he merely altered the specific devise.

The third, so far as affected the question, was as follows: "I direct the trustees named in my will to raise the annual sum of £500, and to pay the same unto Harriet Catherine Cock during her life by quarterly [453] payments." "I give likewise and bequeath to each of the trustees named in my will the sum of £5000, on condition that he accepts the trusts thereof; also to Mr. Jonathan Moore of Gray's Inn, in consideration of the friendly regard and zeal he has for many years shewn in my concerns, £2000. January 26th, 1826."

The sixth was as follows: "In consideration of the very kind and liberal attention Henry Brooksbank, Esquire, has hitherto constantly displayed in my concerns, I bequeath to him the sum of £5000; and I declare that this sum, and also the sum of £2000 to Mr. Jonathan Moore, are in addition to the sums given to them as trustees to my will."

The ninth was as follows: "I hereby revoke and annul all that part of my last will and testament which relates to Mr. Jonathan Moore, and I hereby request Mr. Jonathan Brundrett, of the Temple, London, to undertake and fulfil the same purposes and intentions and on the same conditions, for the effecting of which I had appointed the said Mr. Jonathan Moore. June 22d, 1826."

The eleventh, which was duly attested by three witnesses, was as follows: "This is a further codicil to the last will and testament of me Sir Thomas Clarges, Bart., made this 10th day of April 1828. I hereby do revoke the appointment of Mr. H. Brooksbank and Jonathan Moore as executors and trustees of my will; and do also revoke all and every legacy and bequest whatsoever to them given and bequeathed either by my last will or any codicil thereto, or any previous will or codicil thereto; and I hereby nominate, constitute, and appoint Jonathan Brundrett, Esquire, of the Inner Temple, gentleman, executor and trustee of my will."

[454] By his codicils he had given several annuities and pecuniary legacies.

The testator died in February 1834, and his will was proved by Jonathan Brundrett alone.

With respect to the annuity of £300 to Harriett Catherine Cock, it is necessary to state, that the testator had, in his lifetime, executed a bond whereby he secured to her an annuity of £300, to be paid to her during her life, by quarterly payments, on the usual quarter days, and a proportionate part to be paid up to the time of her death; with a provision that she was not to alienate or encumber the annuity, and that the same was to be settled, on her marriage.

It should be also stated, with reference to the freehold annuity of £500 a year, mentioned in the testator's will, that by letters patent dated the 26th of November, in the thirteenth year of the reign of King Charles II., His Majesty, in consideration of the signal services done and performed for and in his restoration by Sir Thomas Clarges, Knight, who was, by many hazards, eminently and opportunely instrumental therein, granted "unto Sir Thomas Clarges, his heirs and assigns for ever, one annuity or yearly pension of £500" out of the duty or composition of 12d. in the chaldron for coal.

The several questions which arose under these circumstances were:—

First. Whether the annuity of £500 bequeathed by the third codicil to Harriett Catherine Cock was in addition to or in substitution for the legacy of £500 which the testator, by his will, gave her in lieu of the annuity of [455] £300 secured by his bond. As to this question Hurst v. Beach (5 Mad. 351), Fraser v. Byng (1 Russ. & M. 90) were cited.

Secondly. Whether, under the fifth, eleventh, and twelfth codicils, Jonathan Brundrett was entitled to a legacy of £5000. On this point Barber v. Barber (3 Myl. & Cr. 688) was referred to.

Thirdly. Whether the legacies given by the unattested codicils were charged by the will on the real estate; and, if not, whether they were so charged by the thirteenth codicil, which was duly attested. As to the effect of republication, the following cases were cited: 1 Wms. Saunders, 277, e and f, Utterton v. Robins (1 Ad. & E. 423), Guest v. Willasey (2 Bing. 429; and 3 Bing. 614), Gordon v. Lord Reay (5 Sim. 274), Crosbie v. Macdowal (4 Ves. 610), Goodtitle v. Meredith (2 M. & S. 5), Barnes v. Cross (1 Ves. jun. 486; and 4 Bro. C. C. 2), Warren v. Davies (2 Myl. & K. 49), Gibson v. Lord Montfort (1 Ves. sen. 485); and as to the annuities and legacies given by the intermediate unattested codicils, the following cases were cited: Masters v. Masters (1 P. W. 420), Hewell v. Whitaker (3 Russ. 343), Brudenell v. Boughton (2 Atk. 274), Habergham v. Vincent (2 Ves. jun. 236), Bonner v. Bonner (13 Ves. 378), Strong v. Ingram (6 Sim. 197), Smart v. Prujean (6 Ves. 560).

Fourthly. Whether the real estate specifically devised should not be exonerated out of the general personal estate and the estates not specifically devised.

[456] And fifthly. Whether the perpetual annuity of £500 a year, which in the will was called a freehold annuity, was to be considered as real or personal estate. On this point The Earl of Stafford v. Buckley (2 Ves. sen. 171) and Aubin v. Daly (4 B. & Ald. 59) were cited.

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. D. James, for Jonathan Brundrett.

Feb. 22, 1841. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. This cause came on to be heard on exceptions to the Master's report, and for further directions.

The testator Sir Thomas Clarges had made a will which was duly executed and attested, and thirteen codicils, of which two only were duly executed and attested. The decree established the will and the two attested codicils, and directed various accounts to be taken. The Master made his report on the 28th of February 1840, and to this report two exceptions have been taken.

The first relates to an annuity of £500 which was given to Harriett Catherine Cock by the fifth codicil, [457] and which the Master has found her to be entitled to, in addition to an annuity directed to be paid to her by the will. The exception insists that the Master ought not so to have found.

It appears, that the testator had in his lifetime executed a bond, whereby he secured to Harriett Catherine Cock an annuity of £300 to be paid to her during her life, by quarterly payments on the usual quarter days, and a proportionate part to be paid up to the time of her death, with a provision that she was not to alienate or encumber the annuity; and that the same was to be settled on her marriage. By the will he confirms this annuity, and gives to the annuitant a further yearly sum of £200, to become due and payable at the same days and in the same proportions, and in every respect in the same manner as in the bond by which the £200 was secured to her; it being the testator's intention that she should receive an annuity of £500, instead of an annuity of £300. By the fifth codicil, without taking any notice of the bond or of the direction in the will, the testator expresses himself thus:—"I direct the trustees named in my will to raise the annual sum of £500, and pay the same to Harriett Catherine Cock during her life by quarterly payments;" and under these circumstances I concur in the finding of the Master. Whatever we may conjecture as to the testator's intention, and however improbable it may seem, that he intended to double the annuity, yet, having regard to the modified interest in the annuity secured by the bond and confirmed and increased by the will, and to the mode in which the annuity of £500 is given by the codicil, and the rules adopted by this Court, for the purpose of determining, whether gifts by successive instruments are to be deemed substitutionary or accumulative, it appears to me, that the gift by this codicil must be taken to be additional. The principal argument for the exception was founded [458] on the expression, "the annual sum of £500," which it was said must refer to the annuity of £500, the payment of which was directed by the will; and the testator may have so intended it, but if he did, I think that he has not expressed himself with sufficient distinctness; and it does not appear to me that the words are necessarily to be taken as referential to the annuity of £500, the amount of the annuity secured by the bond, and confirmed and increased by the will; I must therefore overrule this exception.

The second exception relates to a legacy of £5000, to which the Master had found Mr. Brundrett to be entitled, and which the exception insists he ought not to have done.

Henry Brooksbank and Jonathan Moore were the trustees appointed by the will. The testator directed that Mr. Moore might act as solicitor and receiver, in the management of the trust, but by the will no legacy was given.

By the fifth codicil, which was not attested, he gave and bequeathed to each of the trustees named in his will, that is, to Mr. Brooksbank and Mr. Moore, the sum of £5000 on condition that he accepted the trust thereof, and he gave to Mr. Moore, in consideration of friendly regard and zeal, £2000.

By the eighth codicil, in consideration of the kind and liberal attention Mr. Brooksbank had displayed, he bequeathed to him the sum of £5000; and he declared that sum, and also the sum of £2000 to Mr. Moore, were in addition to the sums given to them as trustees.

By the eleventh codicil, he revoked all that part of his will which related to Mr. Moore, and requested Mr. [459] Jonathan Brundrett to undertake and fulfil the same purposes and intentions, and on the same conditions for the effecting of which, he had appointed Jonathan Moore.

The word "conditions" is not accurately employed in this codicil, but the intention of the testator does not appear to me to be doubtful. He requested Mr. Brundrett to undertake the purposes and intentions; that is, to perform the trusts, for the performance of which Mr. Moore had been appointed, and on the same conditions. Now what was the situation, what were the circumstances, or what was the condition in which Mr. Moore stood with respect to the trust? By the will, he was allowed to act as solicitor in the management of the trusts, and by the fifth codicil he was to have a legacy of £5000 on condition that he accepted the trust; and I am of opinion that the testator, by the eleventh codicil, intended to place Mr. Brundrett in the like position, and that a gift of the legacy must be implied. I therefore think that the second exception must also be overruled.

The Master's report being confirmed, a question is raised on the construction of the will, whether the legacies given by unattested codicils, are within the words of the will, charging the real estates with the payment of the legacies; and if not, whether they or any of them are charged on the real estates by the thirteenth and last codicil, which was duly attested.

The testator declares the trusts of his residuary real, and personal estate in these words, "In trust thereout to pay all my just debts, the expenses of my funeral, and of proving this my will, and the legacies and annuities hereby bequeathed; and in case the same shall be insuff[460]-ficient for that purpose, then I charge all my real estate with the payment of the same respectively:" that is, with the payment of the debts and expenses, and of the legacies and annuities hereby bequeathed; and I am of opinion that these words do not create a general charge of all legacies, but only of such legacies as are given by the will. The object of the last codicil, which was duly executed and attested, was to revoke the appointment of trustees and executors named in the will, and the bequests given to these trustees, and to appoint Mr. Brundrett to be executor and trustee; and though, in effect, it operated as a republication of the will and former codicils, and might have extended any prior general devise to lands subsequently acquired before the date of the last codicil, and have subjected such subsequently acquired lands to a general charge contained in the will, yet, considering it as a republication of the will, and all the preceding codicils, I do not think that the effect is to charge on the land legacies, which by those codicils were not so charged; and Harriett Catherine Cock being entitled to her second annuity, and Mr. Brundrett being intitled to his legacy under a codicil which was not duly attested, and there being no general charge of legacies, I think that this annuity and this legacy, and the other legacies given by the codicils are not charged on the land.

The next question raised is, whether in the application of the assets in payment of the charges, the real estates specifically devised should not be exonerated out of the general personal estate, and the estates not specifically devised. The testator has directed his estate called Bitchley to be sold; and has directed the money to arise from the sale thereof, and all the residue of his estate and effects not specifically devised and bequeathed, to be held, in trust thereout to pay all [461] debts and expenses, and the legacies given by his will; and the deficiency is charged on all his real estate. The Bitchley estate, and the general residuary estate, real and personal, are therefore to be applied in payment of these charges; and if it shall appear that there is a deficiency, and it is necessary to resort for payment of the debts to the general charge effecting the real estates specifically devised, it will, at the proper time, be necessary to consider, whether (to the extent to which, the general personal estate applicable to the payment of legacies not charged on land, has been exhausted by the creditors) the pecuniary legatees may be entitled to resort to the estates specifically devised; but in the present state of the cause, the question which may arise out of that state of things seems scarcely ripe for decision.

The next question was, whether the annuity of £500, which in the will is called a freehold annuity, and is thereby specifically given, is to be considered as real or personal; and upon the authority of the cases which were cited in the argument, viz., The Earl of Stafford v. Buckley (2 Ves. sen. 171) and Aubin v. Daly (4 B. & Ald. 59), I am of opinion, that it is what Lord Hardwicke called a personal inheritance, which the law suffers to descend to the heir, but which has nothing to do with the realty.

In the course of the argument a claim was made, to have a balance, which, at the time of the decease of Sir Thomas Clarges, was alleged to be in the hands of the trustee under a deed, applied towards payment of a debt due to Mrs. Bastard; but the facts necessary for the decision of that claim do not sufficiently appear, [462] and, if necessary, there must be an inquiry on the subject.

Overrule the exceptions.

Declare that the legacies, &c., given by the unattested codicils, are not charged on the land. Carry on the accounts. Direct the sale of Bitchley; and Reserve further directions.

[462] BETHUNE v. KENNEDY. (Ex relations.) Feb. 26, 1841.

[S. C. on main point. 1 My. & Cr. 114; 40 E. R. 320 (with note).]

A. conveyed to B. his reversionary interest in a fund in Court, and B. obtained a stop order. When the fund fell into possession, B. presented a petition for payment to him. On the hearing of the petition, A. insisted that the purchase was invalid, being a purchase of a reversionary interest at an undervalue. The Court would not decide the point, but proposed to retain the funds in Court for a limited time, if A. would undertake to file a bill to set aside the conveyance. A. not giving the undertaking, the fund was paid out to B.

This case is reported on the hearing in 1 Mylne & Cr. 114.

Henry Van Bodicoate, one of the Defendants in the suit, being entitled, under the will of Charlotte Peyton, to one-third of the testatrix's residuary personalty, the remainder expectant upon the decease of Hester Kennedy, executed an indenture whereby he assigned his reversionary interest for a valuable consideration to Marmaduke Robert Langdale and others; the indenture contained the usual power of attorney for the receipts of the funds.

In June 1836, on the petition of Bodicoate and Langdale, the common stop order was obtained; whereby the funds were directed not to be sold, transferred, or disposed of, without notice to Langdale.

[463] On the death of Hester Kennedy, the assignees presented a petition for payment out of Court of the funds comprised in the indenture of assignment.

The execution of the indenture by H. Van Bodicoate was proved by affidavit.

An affidavit was filed in opposition to the petition, disputing the validity of the purchase; on the ground that, the subject being a reversionary interest, the price given, was inadequate; the affidavit contained valuations purporting to prove the allegation.

Mr. Pemberton, for the petition.

Mr. Kindersley, contra, for Henry Van Bodicoate, opposed the payment, on the grounds that the assignment was invalid; and he contended, that the assignees ought to be required, if they insisted on the validity of the instrument, to file a bill for the purpose of establishing it.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS said he was bound, prima facie, to give credit to an instrument under a party's own hand and seal; and he inquired whether Henry Van Bodicoate would undertake to file a bill to set aside the assignment, in case the fund in question were retained in Court for a limited time, for that purpose.

Mr. Kindersley intimating that he was unable to give such undertaking,

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale] directed the funds to be paid over to the Petitioners as prayed.

Injunction to restrain proceedings in an issue at law, directed by a Judge of the Court of Queen's Bench, under the Interpleader Act.

The Interpleader Act applies only to those cases where the opposite claims depend on legal rights, and not on matters peculiarly of equitable jurisdiction.

By indenture of the 2d of March 1838, the Defendant George Burnie, who was owner of the ship "The Foxhound," then on her voyage to the South Seas, assigned the ship and tackle, and also all oil and head matter and other cargo which might be caught, or brought home in the said ship or vessel, on and from her then present voyage; and also the policies of assurance therein mentioned, and all muniments, writings, and papers relating to the said ship called "The Foxhound," unto the Plaintiffs, for securing the monies in the said indenture mentioned.

The assignment was produced to the proper officer of the port of London, and registered, but was not indorsed on her register, the ship being on her voyage.

The ship returned, with a large cargo of oil, to England in January 1841; and on the 9th of January 1841 it was taken possession of by a messenger, on behalf of the Plaintiffs.

On the 13th of January 1841 the Sheriff of Surrey seized the ship and cargo, under a writ of execution sued out of the Queen's Bench by Horton, who was a judgment creditor of Burnie; the Plaintiffs thereupon gave notice of their title to the sheriff, who under the Interpleader Act, 1 & 2 W. 4, c. 58, and 1 & 2 Vict. c. 45, summoned the Plaintiffs and Horton before one of the Judges of Her Majesty's Court of Queen's Bench, to appear and state the nature and particulars of their respective claims, and to maintain or relinquish the same. On the 19th of January 1841 one of the Judges [465] of that Court, upon hearing counsel on behalf of the Plaintiffs, and the attorneys or agents on behalf of Benjamin Horton, and the said Sheriff of Surrey, ordered, that an issue should be tried, in which the Plaintiffs were to be Plaintiffs, and Benjamin Horton, as the execution creditor, was to be Defendant; and that the sheriff should remain in possession at the expense of Plaintiffs, from that day, until security for the amount of the levy should be given; and he further ordered, that the question of costs should be adjourned.

On the 29th day of January the Plaintiffs filed their bill against Horton, the Sheriff of Surrey, and Burnie, praying a declaration that the indenture of the 2d of March 1838 operated as a good and sufficient equitable assignment of the ship and cargo for the monies intended to be secured, and that they had priority over Horton; and for an injunction to restrain the levying the amount of the execution, and to restrain the prosecution of the order under the Interpleader Act; and that upon the Plaintiffs giving security for the amount of the judgment, or at all events, on paying the amount into Court, the ship might be delivered to him; and if necessary that a receiver might be appointed.

The Plaintiffs now moved for the injunction and receiver, if necessary.

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Rolt, for the Plaintiffs.

Mr. Bethell and Mr. E. R. Adama, for Mr. Horton.

Mr. Painter, for the sheriff.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. The real question, between the parties in this case, is, whether in respect of the ship and cargo, William Hor-[466]-ton the execution creditor, is or is not entitled to have priority over the Plaintiffs, who claim the ship and cargo under an assignment from the owner. The property is in the possession of the sheriff, who, in consequence of the adverse claims of the parties, availed himself of the provisions of the Act of Parliament referred to, and applied to a Judge of the Queen's Bench, for the purpose of having the contest between the two parties who are likely to vex him, settled under the authority of the Court of law.

It appears, however, that the rights of these parties do not depend upon the decision of mere legal questions. The right and title claimed by the Plaintiffs depend upon questions which must be determined in a Court of Equity; and the first question, therefore, which arises, upon the present occasion, is, whether such a matter as this can be determined, or was intended to be determined, by the Common Law Judges under the authority of the Act of Parliament. I must own it appears to me upon this occasion, that the Judges at Common Law have not conferred upon them, by that Act of Parliament, the power to determine matters which are peculiarly within the jurisdiction and province of a Court of Equity; and that the intention was to afford the relief in those cases only, in which opposite claims were made, depending upon legal rights, and not upon matters exclusively of equitable jurisdiction.

It appears that both these parties, when they went before the Judge of the Queen's Bench, conceived that their claims depended upon a legal title; and it being so stated to the Judge, he conceived that that legal right might be determined upon the trial of a feigned issue, which he directed; but the terms of that issue never were proposed to, or in any way determined upon, by [467] him. What I collect from the evidence, which is not very distinct, is this: that when the parties left the Judge's chambers, they were both of opinion that this was a matter properly of legal jurisdiction, and both of them intended to have it tried in the way in which the Judge had proposed; but that sometime afterwards, those who acted for the Plaintiffs in the cause, discovered that there was matter which was not properly of legal jurisdiction, and therefore conceived that it could not conveniently, if at all, be tried in the manner proposed upon the summons before the Judge; and that it was consequently necessary to file a bill in equity for the purpose of having their rights determined.

The bill being then filed in equity, is there anything whatever to prevent that equitable right from being tried? Suppose that this matter had never been brought under the consideration of a Common Law Judge at all; and that the party, finding he could not sustain the legal right, which he supposed he had, and that he had an equitable title only, which could only be enforced in this Court, had filed a bill, could it be said that there was no equity to maintain this suit? I think it could not; for the equity arises upon this: there was an assignment of the ship, and also of the cargo, which, at the date of the deed of assignment, was not in existence on board the ship, but was afterwards acquired. Such a prospective cargo would not, according to the rules of the Courts of law, pass by the assignment, but in equity it might pass. I think, therefore, that there is a question proper for determination here. There are other questions which are very properly raised, which may be deserving of the most serious consideration, and which may ultimately determine the rights between the parties. The question, however, is, what is to be done in the present stage of the cause, before the matters which are in [468] question between the parties can be determined, and whether the matters in dispute should be put into proper course of investigation and the property secured in the meantime; my opinion is that it ought. Then the question is, what course is to be pursued for that purpose. If Mr. Horton is content with the species of security which was offered during the proceedings before the Judge, that is well, if not, I think that the Plaintiffs must bring into Court a fund sufficient to answer the demand of the Defendant, and upon that being done, the property ought to be delivered up to be sold.

With respect to the sheriff of course he cannot be called upon to part with the possession of this ship, without being paid what is due to him.

After some discussion it was ordered, that upon payment of a proper sum into Court, the ship and cargo should be delivered over to the Plaintiff, he keeping an account, and that an injunction should issue restraining the proceedings at law, under the Judge's order.

A parent, by his agent, on the marriage of his daughter, entered into an engagement, in writing, with her intended husband, in which his name was written, but not signed. Held, that a letter written by the parent after the marriage, referring to the memorandum, as stating the terms of the engagement, was either a sufficient agreement signed by the party, within the Statute of Frauds, or a sufficient recognition of the use made of his name in the memorandum.

A parent, in the written proposals on the marriage of his daughter, stated, "He intended to leave his daughter a further sum of £10,000 in his will, to be settled on her and her children, the disposition of which, supposing she had no children to be prescribed by the will of her father." He died without leaving that sum. Held, under the circumstances, that there was an obligation on the parent, to be satisfied out of his assets.

The facts and points of this case are so fully set out in the judgment of the Court, that it is unnecessary here to state them. The case was argued by

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Fuller, for the Plaintiff, and by Mr. Kindersley and Mr. O. Anderdon, for the Defendants.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. In the year 1825 Baron de Beil, the Plaintiff's father, proposed to marry Miss Sophia Thomson; and her father, Mr. John Poulett Thomson, having consented to the marriage, stated that he should empower his sons Mr. Andrew Henry and Mr. Charles Thomson to treat [470] with the Plaintiff's father respecting the settlement to be made on the occasion.

In consequence of this statement, and by the appointment of Mr. Andrew Henry Poulett Thomson, on the 22d of December 1825, a meeting took place between Baron de Beil and the two sons of Mr. John Poulett Thomson, for the purpose of agreeing on the terms of the settlement. At that meeting Mr. Andrew Henry Poulett Thomson produced a letter from his father, authorising the sons to treat respecting the settlement; and a discussion thereupon took place respecting the fortune to be settled by Mr. John Poulett Thomson on his daughter Sophia, the terms of the settlement, and the jointure which was to be secured by the Baron de Beil to his intended wife. The result of this discussion was expressed in a memorandum in writing, the first part of which was written by Mr. Andrew Henry Poulett Thomson, and the last part of it by Mr. Charles Poulett Thomson. Baron de Beil appears to have left the brothers before the memorandum was completed; but they afterwards sent it to him, and it is expressed as follows:—

"The arrangement proposed in case of the marriage of Baron de Beil with Miss Sophia Poulett Thomson is as follows: viz., Mr. J. P. Thomson proposes to pay down the sum of £10,000 sterling, to be secured in the British funds, or other funds that may be agreed upon, in the name of trustees to be chosen; the interest to belong to Baron de Beil during the joint lives of himself and Miss Thomson, and to her in case of his death before her; the principal to be secured to the children of the marriage; or in case of there being no issue, the survivor to have the interest for life, and the capital to be at the disposition of Baron de Beil. Baron de Beil to [471] obtain the means of settling £500 per annum, to be payable to Miss Thomson for her life, secured on his estates at Mecklenburg after his death, in case of her surviving him.

"Mr. J. Poulett Thomson proposes, for the present, to allow his daughter £200 per annum, for her private use, subject to a possibility of a reduction of that sum, in case political or other circumstances should diminish his income; and also intends to leave a further sum of £10,000 in his will, to Miss Thomson, to be settled on her and her children; the disposition of which, supposing she has no children, will be prescribed by the will of her father.

"These are the bases of the arrangement proposed, subject of course to revision, but they will be sufficient for Baron de Beil to act upon. Baron de Beil should forward, as early as possible, a joint arrangement for himself and brother, settling £500 per annum on Miss Thomson; it is a question though, how far that can be given by them without the consent of their heirs, who, in case of the death of both, might vitiate it. This point should be decided."

It is, I think, impossible to doubt, what was intended by preparing this memorandum, and sending it to Baron de Beil. It was intended to be a proposal and statement of intention, deliberately made to Baron de Beil; and which, though necessarily subject to further consideration and to revision, was capable of being converted into an agreement by his acceptance: by his performance of that which was required from him: and by the solemnisation of the intended marriage, with the consent and approbation of Mr. John Poulett Thomson.

[472] Baron de Beil states in his evidence, that he accepted this memorandum as containing, in effect, the terms of the said agreement come to between him and the two sons of Mr. John Poulett Thomson on the 22d of December 1825. It appears that he soon afterwards proceeded to do that which was required of him, by securing to his intended wife a jointure of £500 a year on his Mecklenburg estate; and he distinctly states, that the arrangement contained in the memorandum was not in any respect modified, altered, waived, or abandoned prior to his marriage with Miss Sophia Thomson, which took place on the 14th of February 1826.

A settlement was afterwards made of the £10,000, which was proposed to be paid down by Mr. John Poulett Thomson, and to be secured in the British funds, or other funds that might be agreed upon; but nothing was done respecting the further sum of £10,000, which, as the memorandum expressed it, Mr. John Poulett Thomson "intended to leave in his will, to be settled on Miss Thomson and her children."

The Baroness de Beil died on the 27th of September 1827, leaving the present Plaintiff the only issue of the marriage.

Mr. John Poulett Thomson died in the year 1837, having made a will, of which he appointed the present Defendants and his son Andrew Henry Poulett Thomson, who is since dead, executors.

The Plaintiff now claims that further sum of £10,000, which the memorandum expressed it to be the intention of Mr. John Poulett Thomson to leave by his will, to be settled on the Plaintiff's mother and her children; and he insists on payment out of the assets of Mr. John Poulett Thomson.

[473] The Defendants deny that they are under any obligation to pay the same; and they allege:—

First, That the sons, Mr. Andrew Henry and Mr. Charles Poulett Thomson, had no authority from their father to enter into any agreement, binding the father to leave the sum of £10,000 in his will to be settled; and consequently, that if the memorandum and the subsequent events amounted, in effect, to such an agreement, it was entered into without authority, and was not binding on the father, and constitutes no obligation to be satisfied out of his assets.

Secondly, That, by the Statute of Frauds (29 Car. 2, c. 3, s. 4), an agreement, entered into in consideration of marriage, is not binding, unless the same or some memorandum or note thereof, shall be in writing, and signed by the party to be charged therewith, or some other person thereunto lawfully authorised; and that this memorandum was not signed by Mr. John Poulett Thomson or his sons, and therefore was not binding.

Thirdly, That even if it shall appear, that the sons had the father's authority, and that the agreement is not made invalid by the Statute of Frauds, still, upon the true construction of it, Mr. John Poulett Thomson was under no obligation to leave the sum of £10,000 to be settled; it was left at his option to do as he pleased. A hope of bounty to that extent was all that the memorandum meant to hold out, and the bounty might be withheld; and after the death of the daughter, was reasonably and justly withheld. According to the expression of the Defendant's counsel, Baron de Beil might rely on bounty, but had no right to insist on obligation.

[474] Upon a due consideration of the facts of this case, as they appear in the evidence and in the correspondence, it appears to me to be sufficiently established, that Mr. Andrew Henry and Mr. Charles Poulett Thomson were authorised, by their father, to make the proposals expressed in the memorandum of the 22d December 1825; and, on the part of Mr. John Poulett Thomson, to offer those proposals to the acceptance of Baron de Beil, and enable him to convert them into an agreement by acceptance, and doing what was required on his part; and considering the proposal to have been, under the circumstances of this case, ripened into an agreement, I am of opinion that Mr. Andrew Henry and Mr. Charles Poulett Thomson had the authority of Mr. John Poulett Thomson to enter into that agreement on his behalf.

Upon the question whether this agreement is invalid, by reason of the same, or any memorandum or note thereof not being signed by Mr. John Poulett Thomson, or any person thereunto lawfully authorised, according to the provisions of the Statute of Frauds, it is to be considered in what situation the parties were and what they did.

The two sons of Mr. John Poulett Thomson were, as I think, authorised to enter into an agreement with Baron de Beil; pursuant to the authority which they had, they made certain proposals in their father's name in writing. In those proposals they twice write and use their father's name, in a manner to shew, with sufficient certainty, the whole of that which was proposed on his part; the proposals, on his part, were accompanied by a requisition of something to be done on the part of Baron de Beil; and Baron de Beil, on receiving the proposals, accepted them and proceeded to perform [475] what was required of him; and this being performed the marriage was solemnised.

After the marriage, and after the death of the wife, Mr. Andrew Henry Thomson, representing himself to act with the authority of his father, acknowledged the memorandum, though a question had arisen upon the effect of it. And Mr. John Poulett Thomson himself, by his letter, of the 30th April 1830, recognises the agreement, of which a copy had been put into his hands by Baron de Beil. In this letter Mr. Thomson, although he says that he had forgotten all that passed at the time of the marriage, and says, that until the copy was given to him, he had not understood the exact expression to which it referred, does not repudiate the expression as unauthorised, but appears to me to admit that he had agreed to the effect proposed in the memorandum; and admitting that, he says, that he conceives the only question to be, what the expression used in "the engagement" (for so he calls it) legally implies.

In the case of Randall v. Morgan (12 Ves. 73), Sir Wm. Grant expressed great doubt, whether a letter written after the marriage, referring to a parol agreement before the marriage, would be sufficient so give validity to a promise, which of itself produced no obligation; but Lord Harcourt, in the case of Hodgson v. Hutchenson (5 Vin. Abr. 522, pl. 34), thought, that a letter after the marriage, considering the transactions before, was, in that case, sufficient. And, in this case, having regard to the transactions which took place before the marriage, it appears to me, that this letter subsequently written and signed by Mr. Thomson, referring to a copy of the memorandum, as stating the expression or the terms of the engagement [476] which he had entered into before the marriage, is either a sufficient note of the agreement signed by the party to be charged, or a sufficient recognition of the use made of his name in the memorandum, and of the obligation thereby contracted; and so thinking, it does not appear to me to be necessary to determine, whether the use of the name in the memorandum, be of itself a sufficient signature of Mr. Thomson by his agents; or whether the provision of the jointure by Baron de Beil takes the case out of the statute; or whether, independently of the statute, this Court, for the prevention of fraud, would compel the defendants to realise the expectations on the faith of which the marriage was contracted.

If Baron de Beil, on receiving the proposals, instead of acting upon them, on the faith of their being valid and binding if adopted, had required Mr. Thomson to sign them more formally, some objection might probably have been made; but I conceive that any such objection would not have arisen from any notion that the proposals would not otherwise be valid, but rather from a desire to withdraw the proposals, whilst it was yet time, from the consideration and acceptance of a person so idly jealous and suspicious of the honour and integrity of those, with whom he was dealing on such an occasion.

Upon that which Mr. John Poulett Thomson appears to me to have properly considered to be the only question, viz., the legal effect of the terms in which the engagement is expressed, I am of opinion that the Plaintiff is entitled to the second sum of £10,000 which he claims.

The memorandum is entitled, "The Arrangement Proposed in case of the Intended Marriage." It ex-[477]-presses what Mr. John Poulett Thomson proposed to do, and what Baron de Beil was required or expected to do. In a distinct sentence, it proposed an annual payment, subject to possible reduction in circumstances referred to, and then expressed the intention of Mr. John Poulett Thomson to leave a further sum of £10,000 by his will; and so far from providing, that the leaving of this sum was to be merely optional on his part, or was to be subject to any reduction, it expressly provides, that it should be at the disposition of Mr. John Poulett Thomson in a certain event only; viz., in the event of the intended wife having no children. It would have been absurd to make this provision, if the parties had meant that the gift or settlement of this sum of £10,000 was to be altogether optional. The power of disposition would not have been expressed in one particular case, if it was intended that at all events, and in every case, the disposition and the option, whether to give it or settle it at all, was to be his. The use of the word "intend," does not appear to me to be in any way material; the parties were expressing a part of the arrangement in the case of the marriage; and the meaning is obvious, that he intended to leave the £10,000 if the marriage took effect, pursuant to the proposal and intention thus expressed.

The memorandum then expressed, that the arrangements proposed were, of course, subject to revision, but would be sufficient for Baron de Beil to act upon: and it was argued, that because the proposed arrangements were subject to revision, they could not constitute or end in a concluded agreement. It is true that, whilst the proposal remained subject to revision, it could not constitute a concluded agreement. Proposals of this nature cannot result in an agreement all at once, or be otherwise than subject to revision. The proposals were [478] an offer of some things to be done by Mr. Thomson, and a requisition of some things to be done by Baron de Beil, with reference to the intended marriage. Until Baron de Beil had performed his part, and prior to the marriage, the whole was to be subject to revision; but no revision took place. The proposals and intentions, thus expressed, remained without any alteration whatever, up to the time of the marriage; and I am of opinion that the proposals, which up to that time had been subject to revision, did then, by the acceptance of Baron de Beil—by his due execution of the required settlement on his part—and by the solemnisation of the marriage, with the approbation of Mr. Thomson, become an agreement which Mr. Thomson was bound specifically to perform.

I am, therefore, of opinion that the Plaintiff is entitled to the relief which he prays, and that there must be a decree accordingly, with costs.

Mr. Puller. Does your Lordship think that interest ought to be paid on this sum from the death of the testator?

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS. I think that interest, at 4 per cent., is payable, but only from the end of one year after the testator's death, on the footing of a legacy.

Affirmed by Lord Cottenham, 6th of August 1841.

[479] STOCKER v. HARBIN. Jan. 18, Feb. 23, 1841.

A testator, by will duly attested, gave all his real and personal estate to trustees, to convert into money and pay his debts, and then to appropriate and take out of his said trust monies £1000, which he gave to the Plaintiff. By a codicil, not properly attested so as pass real estate, he revoked the legacy. Held, that on this will the testator had made his real and personal estate a common fund for payment of this legacy: that the revocation was inoperative as regarded the real estate and that the Plaintiff was entitled in the proportion which the real estate bore to the personal.

The testator, James Stocker, by his will, dated the 17th of September 1824, "after payment of all his just debts, funeral and testamentary expenses in the first place thereof, and so charged with the payment of the same," gave and bequeathed all his real and personal estate to his wife and two other persons, upon trust, with all convenient speed, and at farthest within five years next after his decease, to sell all his real estate, and convert into money his personal estate, and he proceeded as follows:—"And I do hereby declare and direct that my said wife Mary and the said Thomas Knott and John Sellwood, and the survivor of them, and the heirs executors, administrators, and assigns, and of such survivor, shall stand and be possessed of and hold the monies to arise and be gotten in and by virtue of this my will, in trust, in the first place, to pay all my just debts, funeral and testamentary expenses, as I have before directed; and then next and within one year after my death, to appropriate, take from and out of my said trust monies, the sum of £1000, and vest the same in trade, the purchase of Parliamentary stocks or funds of Great Britain, upon real or other good and sufficient security, at interest, as they think proper, in the names of them my said wife Mary, Thomas Knott, and John Sellwood, or the survivor of them, her or his heirs, executors, administrators, or assigns; with full power to change and vary the said funds and securities, at their discretion; upon trust and for the purposes hereinafter expressed concerning the same, that is to say: In trust to pay, apply, and dispose of the whole of the interest, proceeds, and profits of the said £1000, whether arising [480] from being vested in trade or otherwise, from time to time, as received, for and towards the maintenance, education, and sole benefit of my son Daniel Stocker, during his minority, according as my said trustees think best for his advantage; and on my said son Daniel's attainment to the age of twenty-one years, then, upon trust to immediately pay, assign, and finally make over unto him the said sum of £1000, or the stock-in-trade, in which the same may consist, together with all the profits, proceeds, and interest arising therefrom, then remaining in their or either of my said trustees' hands, if any. And in case my said son Daniel should happen to die during his minority, and before his being paid the said legacy of £1000, and leave no legitimate issue, it is then my will, that on his so dying childless during his minority, the said legacy of £1000 shall revert to and become part of all my residuary monies and estate. And after taking and appropriating the said sum of £1000 out of my residuary monies and estate, I then give and bequeath, and direct to be paid, within one year next after the amount of my residuary monies and estate is ascertained, and realised by my said trustees, unto my daughter Elizabeth, the wife of George Harbin, one equal part or portion of all my said residuary monies and estate, into as many equal shares and portions divided as I shall leave children, my sons and daughters (except my said son Daniel) me surviving, first deducting from such my said daughter Elizabeth's share, the sum of £400 in lieu of the advancement I have already given to her; and which £400 it is my will shall remain to and go with my then residuary monies as hereinafter directed: that is to say, then upon trust to pay, apply, and dispose of the whole of the interest, dividends, and proceeds of the funds and securities upon which my then remaining monies shall be invested, and of all other my residuary estate and effects [481] whatsoever, as from time to time received, or such part thereof as my said trustees think meet, for and towards the maintenance and education, placing out to trade, business, or profession of my sons and my daughters, and such of my posthumous child or children as my said wife may be pregnant with at my decease, during their minority; and on the several and respective attainments of my said sons and daughters, and such my posthumous child or children (if any) to their ages of twenty-one years, in trust to pay, make over, and assign unto each of them my said sons and daughters, and such my posthumous child or children, one even share and portion, into as many similar and equal shares or parts divided as I have children in number, except my said son Daniel and my said daughter Mary, whose specific legacy and shares are so previously appropriated for them as I have before directed of all my said residuary trust monies and estate."

The testator appointed his wife and Knott and Sellwood joint executors. The testator's will was duly executed and attested by three witnesses.

He afterwards in 1830 made a codicil to his will, attested by two witnesses only, whereby he recited that he had given £1000 in his will to his son Daniel, and proceeded as follows:—"He at that time being a minor, but since having become of age, and I having provided for him in making business and other concerns, I hereby direct and most particularly request that the £1000 named in the fifty-first line of the second sheet of my said will and testament shall be null and void; and I do further direct that my son Daniel Stocker shall not receive any of my real or personal property direct or indirect, saving the sum of 1s."

[482] The testator died in 1834, and his son Daniel, who was his heir at law, filed this bill for payment of the legacy; alleging, that the revocation by an unattested codicil was void, either as to the whole legacy, or as to such proportion of it as would be payable out of the produce of the real estate.

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Keene, for the Plaintiff.

Mr. Tinney and Mr. Sheffield, contra, contended, first, that the gift of the £1000 was of the character of a pecuniary legacy, for although it was charged on the real estate, it was primarily payable out of the personal estate, and that consequently it had been revoked by the codicil.

Secondly, that it came within the principle of those cases in which legacies charged on real estate had been permitted to be altered or modified by an unattested codicil.

Thirdly, that the gift was in the nature of a portion, and had been satisfied, within the intention of the testator.

Fourthly, that if the gift had been revoked, it fell into the residue, and did not lapse for the benefit of the heir.

And lastly, that if these points failed, then that the case came within the decision in Roberts v. Walker (1 Russ. & Myl. 752), and that the charge must be apportioned between the real and personal estate, so as to give to the Plaintiff that proportion only, which was payable out of the realty.

Feb. 23. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. James Stocker, by his will, dated the 17th of September 1824, devised and bequeathed all his real and personal estate to trustees, directing them to convert the whole into money; and he declared, that they were to stand and be possessed of and to hold the monies to arise and be gotten in, by virtue of his will, in trust, in the first place, to pay his debts, and then to appropriate and take out of his said trust monies, the sum of £1000, and vest the same, in manner in his will mentioned, for the benefit of his son the Plaintiff. The will was so executed and attested as to pass real estate by devise; and some time afterwards, by an unattested codicil, dated the 23d of September 1830, the testator, reciting the legacy, and that he had provided for his son, re-[484]-quested that the gift of £1000 mentioned in his will should be null and void.

The son has now filed his bill for payment of the legacy, alleging, that the revocation by an unattested codicil is void, either as to the whole legacy, or as to such proportion of it, as would be payable out of the produce of the real estate.

The Defendants allege, that the will is so expressed, as to constitute the legacy a charge on the real estate; and that, upon a true construction of the will, the real estate ought to be considered as applicable to the payment of the legacy, only in aid of the personal estate: and further, they contend, that this legacy is in the nature of a portion, which has been satisfied by advancement. I am of opinion that this is not a case of ademption or of satisfaction of a portion; and it appears to me, that according to the true construction of this will, the testator has made his real and personal estate one common fund, for the payment of his debts and this legacy, and for ultimate distribution:—that in the way the testator has treated his property, there is no priority, and the real estate cannot be considered as applicable merely in aid of the personal estate.

And the legacy being given out of a mixed fund, constituted of both real and personal estate, I think that the real and personal estate ought to have contributed to the payment, in proportion to their respective amounts; and that the revocation by an unattested codicil, though good as to such proportion as would have been payable out of the personal estate, fails as to such proportion as was payable out of the produce of the real estate, and that such proportion, therefore, remains a valid gift to the legatee.

[485] Refer it to the Master to ascertain the relative values of the testator's real and personal estates at the time of his death; and declare, that the Plaintiff is entitled to so much and such part of the legacy of £1000, as, upon a rateable payment out of the real and personal estates, would have been payable out of the real estate; and let the Master ascertain the amount thereof.

[485] CROSBY v. CHURCH. Jan. 22, 25, 1841.

[S. C. 10 L. J. Ch. 212; 5 Jur. 50. See Sawyer v. Sawyer, 1885, 28 Ch. D. 605; Shute v. Hodge, 1888, 58 L. T. 549.]

Bequest of consols to A. B., a feme covert, to be transferred to her in her own name, and the interest to be for her separate use, and the principal to remain in trust of the executors till the youngest of her children attained twenty-one, when the principal was to be her own; or in case of her demise it was to devolve to her husband. The trustees, on the death of the testatrix, transferred the fund to A. B.; she and her husband afterwards sold it out, and they both signed the transfer. Held, that a breach of trust had been committed, but that A. B. had made a valid disposition of the dividends which might accrue previous to her youngest child, born after the death of the testatrix, attaining twenty-one.

The testatrix gave the residue of her personal estate to the Defendant Mrs. Church, and she appointed Mr. Crosby (the husband of the Plaintiff), Mr. George, and the Defendant Mrs. Church executors and executrix of her will.

By a codicil, she expressed herself as follows:—"I give to my beloved granddaughter, Mrs. Charlotte Crosby, over and above any former bequest, £1000 3 per cent. consols, to be transferred to her in her own name, and the interest to be for her own sole and separate use, and the principal to remain in trust of my executors and residuary legatee till the youngest of her children shall attain the age of twenty-one years, when the principal shall be her own; or, in case of her demise, it shall devolve to her present husband, the Rev. Robert Crosby."

The testatrix died in 1815, and her will was proved by her executors and executrix. The funded property [486] was transferred into the name of Mrs. Church alone; and on the 9th of March 1815 Mrs. Church, with the assent of her husband, transferred £1000 consols into the name of Mrs. Crosby, in satisfaction of her legacy. On the 26th of July 1816 Mr. and Mrs. Crosby sold out, and transferred that sum to a purchaser. The transfer was signed both by Mr. and Mrs. Crosby.

Mrs. Crosby had two children living at the death of the testatrix, the youngest of whom attained twenty-one in the year 1833; but she afterwards had other children, the youngest of whom was born in 1825, and had not therefore attained twenty-one.

Mr. Church died in 1820, leaving Mrs. Church his executrix, and Mr. Crosby died in 1836.

In 1838 Mrs. Crosby filed her bill against Mrs. Church and the representatives of Mr. George, the other executor alleging, in effect, that the executors and executrix had committed a breach of trust by transferring the £1000 into the Plaintiff's name whereby it became liable to the control of her husband; and seeking to recover £1000 consols, and the dividends thereon, from the death of her husband.

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Piggott, for the Plaintiff. The effect of the codicil was to give to the Plaintiff a partial interest for her separate use, with a contingent reversionary gift of the principal; the latter she and her husband were incapable of disposing of, so as to bind her if she survived; for it was in the nature of a reversionary interest in a chose in action; Purden v. Jackson (1 Russ. 1), and Honner v. Morton (3 Russ. 65).

[487] The trustees ought to have retained the fund in their own names in order to give effect to the bequest, and protect it from the Plaintiff's husband. Instead of this, they transferred the fund into the name of the Plaintiff, who was then a married woman; this, in effect, was the same as if they had transferred into the name of the husband alone, for he obtained the legal control over the fund standing to his wife's credit in the bank books. Even as regards the dividends, which were settled to her separate use, she cannot be considered as having disposed of them; she had never the option given her of refusing to assent to the disposition made by her husband, and was never placed in the situation of exercising a free power of disposition over them. Though she joined in the transfer, it was quite unnecessary, as her husband, without her consent, might have transferred the stock. That act must be considered the act of her husband alone, under whose control she was at the time. The Plaintiff is, therefore, entitled to the principal sum and dividends; or, at all events to the principal. They cited Nail v. Punter (5 Sim. 555) and Scott v. Davis (4 Myl. & Cr. 87).

Mr. Tinney and Mr. Koe, contra, argued that the trustees had strictly followed the direction contained in the will, which ordered the consols "to be transferred to her in her own name," and that, consequently, there had been no breach of trust at all.

That, subject to the contingent gift to her husband, which he had waived by his disposition of the property, the gift to the Plaintiff was absolute; Elton v. Shepherd (1 Bro. C. C. 532), Irwin v. Farrer (19 Ves. 85), Adams v. Armitage (Id. 415); [488] and there being no clause against anticipation, the Plaintiff could dispose of the principal and dividends as she thought fit. That the intermediate dividends, being settled to her separate use, she must be considered, as to them, a feme sole, and that she had made a valid disposition thereof by her concurrence in the transfer of the stock. That at any rate she had made a valid charge on the dividends settled to her separate use; and that, if she died before her youngest child attained twenty-one, the property would then belong to her husband's estate, and the disposition by him would then be rendered valid.

Mr. Pemberton, in reply.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. It is very distressing to find claims made against a party entirely innocent, by one who has been the occasion of the breach of trust complained of. It is, no doubt, a case of great hardship, but the Court must act strictly on its established principles.

The first question is, what interest did the Plaintiff take in this legacy? The first direction is to transfer the £1000 into the Plaintiff's own name, but not as her absolute property, for the dividends were to be for her separate use, and the principal was to remain in trust of the executors until the youngest of her children should attain twenty-one; then, and not till then, the principal was to be her own. When, therefore, that time arrived, the stock was to be transferred to the Plaintiff, but until then, it was to remain in the trust of the executors. There is, therefore, an immediate gift of the dividends to the Plaintiff for her separate use, and an absolute gift of the principal to be transferred to her [489] on her youngest child attaining twenty-one, with a gift over in case of her death, before the happening of that event.

That being so, the executors and executrix, erroneously, transferred the principal at the end of a year after the death of the testatrix. They did not suffer the principal to remain in trust, but transferred it into the name of the Plaintiff; and she, being at that time under the dominion of her husband, transferred it to someone else. There never was such an investment as the due execution of the trust required; the trust was not performed, and there is nothing to deprive the Plaintiff of the benefit of the trust, so far as relates to that interest which is not settled for her separate use.

It is clear that this sum must be brought into Court; and then comes the question which has occasioned some doubt in my mind: the dividends were to be paid for her sole and separate use, and there are no words which directly or by implication create any fetter against alienation; the question then is, whether the way in which she has dealt with these funds amounts to a disposition of the dividends.

If a married woman could not dispose of her separate estate without making a direct reference to it, or without shewing an express intention to charge it, there would be an end of the question; but I apprehend there are many ways in which a married woman may render her separate property liable to a charge, without having, in the transaction, made any direct charge on, or made any reference to, the property settled to her separate use. (See Owens v. Dickenson, Craig & Ph. 48.)

[490] I think, that in any view of this case, the result will be that the fund must come into Court; and then the dividends must either be paid to the Plaintiff, provided she has not charged them, or if she has created a charge, then they must be paid to the Defendant Mrs. Church; and liberty must be given to apply on the youngest child attaining twenty-one, or dying under that age, or on the death of the Plaintiff. I will look at the case and mention it again on Monday.

Jan. 25. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS again mentioned the case, and stated that he thought that a charge had been created upon the dividends, and that the Defendant was therefore entitled thereto.(1)

[491] Between LORD ARTHUR CHICHESTER and CHARLES HENRY JOHN RICH, Plaintiffs; and JOHN HUNTER and CHARLES B. UTHUR, Defendants. Jan. 21, 28, Feb. 2, 1841.

On the death of one of two Co-plaintiffs after the cause was at issue, it was ordered, on motion, that the survivor should revive the suit within a fortnight, or, in default, that the bill should be dismissed, with costs.

This bill was filed by the above-named Co-plaintiffs, and in July 1840, after replication, and after the cause had been set down, Lord A. Chichester died.

The cause subsequently coming on, was struck out of the paper in consequence of the abatement.

Mr. Keene now moved that the bill filed in the cause might stand dismissed out of Court, with costs to be taxed by one of the Masters of this Court, as against the Defendant C. B. Uther, unless the Plaintiff C. H. J. Rich should, within three weeks, cause the bill filed in this Court to be revived. He cited Adamson v. Hall (Turn. & Russ. 258), where one of several Plaintiffs died before answer, and a motion was made by the Defendant that the surviving Plaintiffs should, within a limited time, revive the suit, or that the bill should be dismissed, and the application, though refused by the Vice-Chancellor, was granted by the Lord Chancellor.

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. T. Turner, contra, relied on 2 Daniel Pr. 363, and contended that the costs had gone by the death of the party; that as there could not be a revivor for costs, so they could not be obtained [492] in a different form; that the cause was not now in that stage that it could be dismissed for want of prosecution, and it was different from the case of Adamson v. Hall, the placitum of which case they alleged was not justified by the facts.

The case was mentioned several times, and the decision in Chowick v. Dimes (2) referred to. Ultimately,

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS ordered, that the surviving Plaintiff should revive this suit within a fortnight, or in default thereof, that the Plaintiff's bill should stand dismissed out of Court, as against the said Defendant C. B. Uther, with costs. (Reg. Lib. 1840, A. fo. 853.)

(1) EXTRACT FROM ORDER:—Order Sarah Church to transfer £1000 consols into the name of the Accountant-General in trust in this cause.

Order the interest from time to time to accrue due thereon to be paid to the Defendant Sarah Church until the youngest of the Plaintiff's children shall attain the age of twenty-one, or the death of the Plaintiff or of such child under such age, with liberty for any person to apply.

Direct an account of the personal estate and effects of Robert Crosby come to the hands of the Plaintiff (she submitting to account), and an account of the estate and effects of Edward George left unadministered, come to the hands of Robert Rimell.

Reg. Lib. 1840, A. fo. 302.

(2) 3 Beav. 290. The following is an extract from the order in Chowick v. Dimes, which will be found in Reg. Lib. 1840, A. 393:—

"His Lordship doth order that George Samuel Ford, as administrator of the late Plaintiff William Thomas Lear Chowick, deceased, or Emma Lear Chowick, as devisee of the said late Plaintiff, do, within fourteen days from the service of this order, file a supplemental bill or bill of revivor in this cause; or, in default thereof, it is ordered that the Plaintiff's bill do stand dismissed out of this Court without costs."

[492] WEST v. SMITH. Jan. 19, 21, 1841.

An order "to discharge an irregular order with costs," carries the costs of the application to discharge it.

An order having been irregularly obtained by Mr. Maughan, a motion was made to discharge it with costs, and the Master of the Rolls accordingly discharged it with costs (3 Beav. 306); and the question was whether the last order carried the costs of the application to discharge the irregular order.

[493] Mr. Tennant contended, that the Respondents were entitled only to the costs asked by the notice of motion, which were the costs of the irregular order, and not to the costs of discharging it.

Mr. Pemberton, contra.

Jan. 21. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. In this case an application was made to discharge an order, irregularly obtained and irregularly drawn up, with costs; and it was ordered that it should be discharged with costs to be taxed by the Master; and the question raised before me was, whether where the Court discharges an irregular order with costs, the costs of the application to discharge such irregular order are included.

It is not a question upon which I myself had any doubt, but as some doubt was suggested to me at the time the case came on, I thought it right to see into the case. It is my opinion that such an order as this does of necessity carry with it the costs of the motion. The motion was to discharge the order with costs; the order made on the motion was to discharge the irregular order with costs, and that carries with it the costs of the application.

[494] Between NATHANIEL JOSLING, Plaintiff; and JAMES KARR, Defendant.
Nov. 16, 1840.

A. purchased a leasehold of B., and paid the purchase-money, but no conveyance was executed. A. bequeathed it to B. for life, with remainders over. A.'s executor filed a bill against B. alone, for a conveyance of the property upon the trusts of the will, not, however, seeking to recover it as assets for the purposes of the executorship. Held, that the other cestui que trusts were necessary parties; and, semble, that such a suit might be maintained.

In 1825 Thomas Karr the testator purchased two leasehold houses from his son James Karr for £800. He paid the purchase-money, but no assignment was executed to him.

Thomas Karr by his will bequeathed these leaseholds to James Karr for life, with remainder to his wife for life, with remainder amongst their children, with certain remainders over, and he appointed the Plaintiff and James Karr his executors.

James Karr renounced probate, and the will was proved by the Plaintiff alone, who insisted on having the property conveyed to him on the trusts of the will. In consequence of the refusal of the Defendant James Karr to assign, the Plaintiff filed this bill against him, praying, that the Defendant might be ordered to assign the property to the Plaintiff, as executor, on the trusts of the will, and for an account of the rents.

It did not appear whether the leasehold property was required for the payment of debts, and the claim of the Plaintiff seemed based on the trusts declared in the will respecting the property.

To this bill the Defendant demurred.

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Rogers, for the demurrer. The Plaintiff claims to have the property assigned to [495] him, not as executor, but as trustee for the other parties; this he is not entitled to. If the testator had had the legal estate, then the executors would have nothing to do but to assent to the legacy, and could only refuse to assent to the specific legacy in the event of its being wanted for payment of debts; in that case the legal estate would be in the Defendant. The Plaintiff has no right to constitute himself a trustee for the several parties interested in this specific bequest, and has no equity to support the bill.

But the bill is informal for want of parties, for as the Plaintiff comes into Court as trustee of the leaseholds, all his cestui que trusts must be parties to a suit, in which their interests are to be dealt with.

Mr. Kindersley and Mr. Simpson, in support of the bill. The Defendant, the vendor of the property, ought to have conveyed it to the testator, in which case, the leasehold estate would have been vested in the Plaintiff his executor. The Defendant must perform his duty as vendor, otherwise the legal estate will remain in him; and he might then convey it away to a purchaser for valuable consideration, without notice, and defeat those in remainder. It is therefore the duty of the executor to get in this property for the benefit of all the legatees.

The executor is responsible in respect of assets to all the debts and liabilities of the testator, and cannot be completely exonerated, unless by passing his accounts in this Court; he cannot be compelled to part with any part of the assets, until it appears that there are no outstanding liabilities. Treating this as a bill for the specific performance of the agreement, the specific legatees are not necessary parties. Poole v. Pass (1 Beavan, 600).

[496] Mr. Pemberton, in reply.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. I think the record is defective for want of parties, and I must therefore allow this demurrer on that ground, and give liberty to amend. With regard to the other point I should have some difficulty in persuading myself that the Plaintiff has no duties to perform; and that he should leave the legal estate in the Defendant, who may thus sell and dispose of the whole legal interest as he pleases, but I will not decide that point in the absence of the other parties.

[496] FOXLOWE v. AMCOATS. Nov. 25, 1840.

The Defendant, a purchaser of a public-house, insisted that time was of the essence of the contract, and that the abstract had not been delivered within the time agreed on. A reference, without prejudice, was made, on motion, as to the title, and when it was first shewn.

This was a bill for the specific performance of a contract for the sale of public-house and premises.

The bill stated that the property was put up by auction on the 8th of February 1840, subject to certain conditions of sale, by one of which, the vendors were to deliver an abstract of title within twenty-one days from the day of sale. That the Defendant became the purchaser at £560. That the abstract had been delivered within twenty-one days, but that the Defendant had neglected to complete; and it prayed a specific performance.

The answer admitted the contract; but stated, that the Defendant, a victualler, had purchased the property for the purpose of carrying on his trade, and of removing from another inn, his term in which expired at Lady Day 1840. That the Plaintiffs had not shewn a good [497] title at Lady Day, and that the Defendant was in consequence obliged to take another public-house; and he submitted, that as the object of his purchase had been defeated, the contract ought not to be specifically performed.

Mr. Cockerell, for the Plaintiff, now moved for a reference to inquire whether the Plaintiff could make a good title, and whether it was shewn prior to filing the bill. He referred to the 5th General Order of 9th May 1839 (Ord. Can. 136).

Mr. Smythe, contra, contended, that as the property sold, consisted of a public-house, time was of the essence of the contract; Coslake v. Till (1 Russ. 376); and consequently that the contract could not be specifically enforced. That the preliminary question ought therefore to be first determined, and that this was not, therefore, a proper case for a reference to the Master as to title, which after all might turn out to be useless.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS. The fact of whether a good title can be made, and when it was first shewn, must be determined, before there can be a final adjudication of the question between the parties. Therefore refer it to the Master to inquire if the Plaintiff can make a good title, and when it was first shewn that such title could be made, and let the reference be without prejudice to any question in the cause. (See Bonnet v. Rees, 1 Keen, 405, and the cases there cited.)

[498] WYATT v. SHARRATT. Dec. 9, 1840.

An executor and trustee, who had lent trust money on unsurrendered copyholds, a deposit of a lease, and a bond, ordered, on motion, to pay the amount into Court.

The testatrix gave her residuary personal estate to the Defendant Sharratt in trust for the Defendant Elizabeth Mountford for life, with remainder to the Plaintiff absolutely, but she gave no directions as to its investment.

The Defendant Sharratt, the executor and trustee, lent £820, the principal part of the residue, at interest, upon the joint security of a covenant to surrender copyhold property of the value of £50 a year, the deposit of a lease, and a bond. The copyholds had not been surrendered, and the interest on the security had been irregularly paid. The bill was filed to make the Defendant liable for the breach of trust, and for an account.

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Puller now moved, that the Defendant might be ordered to pay the £820 into Court, on the ground that the Defendant was not warranted in investing the money on this species of security; and that the security of the copyholds were inadequate according to the rule laid down in Stickney v. Sewell (1 Myl. & Cr. 8), being less than two-thirds.

Mr. Hardy, contra.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. The money must be brought into Court, but the Defendant ought to have some reasonable time to enable him to get in the mortgage. [499] Let him have six weeks, and he can apply again for further time if the circumstances should then warrant that indulgence.

[499] BIRLEY v. THE CONSTABLES AND BURGESSES OF THE TOWNSHIP OF CHORLTON-UPON-MEDLOCK. Jan. 15, 1841.

Where Commissioners of Sewers, under an Act of Parliament, are proceeding to pave and make sewers to the injury of property, in a case not within the Act, this Court, unless expressly excluded, has jurisdiction to interfere, although, by the Act, jurisdiction is given to the Justices at Sessions, whose judgment is not to be removed by certiorari or otherwise into any of Her Majesty's Courts of Record at Westminster or elsewhere.

A bill to restrain commissioners from paving one part of the Plaintiff's property and draining another is not multifarious.

The bill, which was filed against the Commissioners of Paving of the above township, stated, that the Plaintiffs were owners in fee-simple of a plot of ground in the above township, part of which was unbuilt upon.

That under the 2 W. 4, c. 90, the Defendants were empowered to cause the then present and future streets, &c., "or other public passages and entries" within the township, to be paved and drained, and to remove fences, &c., for that purpose, at the expense of the owners; but it was provided, that they should previously give notice, in writing, to the owners, requiring them to pave and drain; and in case of default within six months, then the Defendants were empowered to effect the same.

The bill stated, that the Defendants had threatened, under the provisions of the Act, to take possession of a [500] part of the plot of ground, and commit trespass and waste therein, and remove the soil, which the bill alleged the Act of Parliament did not authorise them to do, inasmuch as there was no public street or passage near or adjoining the same; and it further alleged that if the case were within the Act, then that no notice had been given as required thereby.

The bill charged that the threatened interference of the Defendants was altogether unnecessary to the public interest; was opposed to the wishes of the occupiers; would be seriously prejudicial to the Plaintiffs' property, and was unnecessary for the purposes of the Act of Parliament, even if the provisions of the same Act were applicable to the case.

The bill prayed an injunction to restrain the Defendants from committing trespass or waste, from breaking down fences, and from removing the soil, and generally from exercising the powers of the Act of Parliament.

The Defendants demurred for want of equity, for want of parties, and for multifariousness.

It appeared by the 196th section of the Act referred to, that any person, who should think himself aggrieved by any order or judgment made in pursuance of any rule, bye-law, or order made in manner thereinbefore directed, &c., "or by anything done in pursuance of this Act," might appeal to the Justices in general or Quarter Sessions, who should, in a summary way, hear and determine such complaint, and might award such restitution, damages, and costs as they should think fit; and such order was to be final, binding, and conclusive upon all parties, to all intents and purposes whatsoever, and should not be removable by certiorari or otherwise [501] into any of His Majesty's Courts of Record at Westminster or elsewhere.

Mr. G. Turner and Mr. Rogers, in support of the demurrer. The 196th section of the Act gives a special remedy to parties aggrieved: they may apply to the Justices of the Peace, whose order must not be removed by certiorari or otherwise into any of His Majesty's Courts at Westminster or elsewhere. This shews an intention of excluding the jurisdiction of all other Courts. If then the Court were to sanction this application, it must be prepared to assume jurisdiction in all cases of Turnpike and Private Acts where a particular jurisdiction has been created, and the interference of Her Majesty's Courts excluded. It could never be the intention of the Legislature that a party should come, in the first instance, into one of the Superior Courts, where the Legislature has expressly excluded him from coming by certiorari or otherwise.

Again, this is not a case of irreparable injury; all that is stated is, that it will be "seriously prejudicial" to the Plaintiffs, and that they will be "seriously incommoded." This is the first instance of a party coming into equity on a case of anticipated trespass, in which the damage may not amount to 1s.

They contended also, that it appeared on the face of the bill that there were other persons interested in the land intended to be drained and paved, and occupiers thereof who ought to be made parties to the bill, in order that complete justice might be done to all parties.

As to multifariousness, they insisted that it appeared from the allegations of the bill, that the ground of complaint was with respect to the paving on the north-east side of the land, and as to sewerage on the north-west, [502] and that being two distinct matters they could not be mixed up in one bill.

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Little, contra. The bill alleges that the case is not within the Act; that the proper notice has not been given; that the Act is unnecessary and injurious; and that the Defendants threaten to carry away the soil, which is unnecessary for the purposes of carrying the Act of Parliament into execution. There can be no doubt that this forms equity enough for the interference of this Court, unless it has been, by force of the Act of Parliament, expressly excluded from affording its relief; it is now however clearly settled, that where a special remedy is created by Act of Parliament, the old jurisdiction of this Court is not taken away, unless there are direct words excluding its interference.(1)

Secondly, it does not appear by the bill that there are other owners or occupiers of the part of the ground claimed by the Plaintiff; and even if it did, they would not be necessary parties. Robertson v. The Great Western Railway Company (L. C. Dec. 5th, 1839), Semple v. The London and Birmingham Railway Company (9 Simons, 209).

Thirdly, as the commissioners are acting under the power contained in one Act of Parliament, the two matters, if distinct (which we dispute) are not improperly joined in one bill.

Mr. Turner, in reply.

[503] THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS. I am of opinion that this bill must be answered. If it were necessary for me clearly to understand the position of this piece of ground, I should hesitate before giving judgment, because I do not clearly comprehend it; but at present it is not necessary for me to make out how this is, as I think that there are sufficient allegations in this bill to support the prayer and to warrant me in overruling the demurrer.

The first argument is, that this Court has not jurisdiction; but I am of opinion that the Court has jurisdiction to prevent injuries of this nature unless it has been expressly taken away by Act of Parliament. In this case it has not been taken away, and the Court must therefore afford its relief if there be sufficient equity to support it. Now all the allegations in this bill, though they may hereafter turn out wholly unfounded, must, on this occasion, be taken to be true; and the allegation is, that the commissioners have, under the Act, a power to do certain things in a particular way, but that, without giving the requisite notice and without complying with the necessary formalities, they are proceeding to act in a manner not authorised by the Act, not required by the public interest, and in a way injurious to the Plaintiffs. I think there is sufficient equity, under these circumstances, to support the bill.

It is then said that the bill is multifarious in uniting two subjects of complaint; first, as to the paving; next, as to the sewerage; but here we have the same corporate body, possessing powers under the same Act of Parliament, proceeding to exercise their powers upon the same plot of ground; I cannot think this multifarious.

[504] Then comes the question, which is certainly more difficult, with regard to parties, and although the allegations are not so distinct as they might have been, I think I must, on the whole, come to the conclusion that the complaint is in respect to land belonging exclusively to the Plaintiffs. As to the tenants and occupiers also, I must overrule this demurrer, without prejudice to the Defendants' right to take the objection by their answer; this will be a sufficient protection to them.

[504] WOOD v. HITCHINGS. Jan. 25, 1841.

The rule, that where a Defendant submits to answer he must answer fully, does not apply where the matter of discovery is immaterial to the relief sought by the bill.

A Plaintiff cannot by one bill obtain specific relief, and also a discovery on a matter distinct from that specific relief.

A bill for a receiver, pending a litigation as to probate, ought not to seek discovery in reference to the merits on that litigation.

A general outline of this case will be found in a former volume, where the case is reported on a motion for a receiver. (2 Beavan, 289.) From this it will appear, that the object of the suit was for a receiver, pending an appeal from the Prerogative Court to the Privy Council; but in addition to other discovery sought, "the bill contained very searching and minute inquiries as to the third alleged testamentary paper, as to the evidence of its execution and of its being signed, and all the circumstances connected with its being brought forward, and the result of all inquiries respecting the same."

The Defendants put in their answer to this bill, to which the Plaintiff took seven exceptions for insufficiency. These having been referred to the Master were disallowed by him, and which decision was now brought before the Court on appeal.

[506] The parts in question of the bill, which were admitted to be partially but not fully answered, required the Defendants to set forth a full and true detail and statement of everything which they, the said Defendants respectively, knew, suspected, or believed, or had heard respecting the alleged codicil, bearing date in the month of July 1835, and the handwriting thereof, and the memorandum in pencil, and the handwriting thereof, and the other testamentary papers, and the burning or destruction of the same, and respecting each and every of such matters, and the grounds and reasons of such suspicion and belief of the Defendants, and from whom they respectively heard what had been heard by them respectively respecting the matters aforesaid.

This interrogatory the Defendants answered as to their knowledge and belief, omitting to answer as to suspicion or hearsay.

Another part of the bill alleged not to be answered, required (in substance) the Defendants to set forth the persons of whom they or their solicitors or agents had made inquiries as to the above matters (distinguishing such as were examined from such as were not examined as witnesses in the suit in the Prerogative Court), and to set forth the information received from such persons.

As to this the Defendants admitted having made inquiries, and having received information and statements and communications from several persons, and that they had some statements, notes, letters, and memoranda relating thereto in their possession, but they said such information was received subsequent to the time when the dispute in the Prerogative Court arose. The Defendants added, that they had not from any such information been enabled to form any knowledge [506] or belief respecting the matters inquired after. Similar answers were then given in reference to the Defendants' solicitors and proctor, and not only stating that the inquiries made, and the information and statements and communications received by them were made and received since this dispute, but that they were so made and received by them whilst acting in their respective characters of solicitors and proctor. They said that, save as aforesaid, neither they nor the solicitors or agents had received any information, or statements, &c.

Another portion complained of required, in substance, the Defendants to set forth what statements, notes, letters, or memoranda they and their solicitors or agents had had, concerning or relating to such information and the above matters, and to schedule the particulars thereof. This the Defendants insisted they were not bound to disclose.

The remaining part alleged to be unanswered, sought a discovery whether the codicil was not insisted on in pursuance of some arrangement between the legatees under the codicil, or some of them, or between some of the Defendants and the next of kin; and whether some and what deeds, agreements, instruments, wills, codicils, testamentary papers, and writings, had not been in the custody or power of the Defendants, their solicitors or agents, relating to the matters stated in the bill, and asked them to set forth a schedule of such deeds.

There were two sets of exceptions, one to the answer of the Corporation of Gloucester, and the other to the answer of the Defendants Helps and others.

Sir Charles Wetherell, Mr. Turner, Mr. Bethell, and Mr. Walker, for the Plaintiff, argued, that the Defendants, having submitted to answer, were bound, by the [507] practice of the Court, to answer fully: Taylor v. Milner (11 Ves. 41), Sommerville v. Mackay (16 Ves. 382), Mazuredo v. Maitland (3 Mad. p. 70), Amor v. Fearon (V.-C. 12th July 1834), where it is said to have been held by the Vice-Chancellor of England that, although an interrogatory and the statement in the bill on which it is founded may be immaterial, yet if the Defendant attempts to answer it, and he answers it imperfectly, the Defendant cannot, upon exceptions to the sufficiency of his answer, avail himself of the objection that the statement or question so imperfectly answered is immaterial. (Cooke's Orders, 45; but see the decision of the Vice-Chancellor in Graham v. Coape, 3 Myl. & Cr. 640.)

They argued also, that the discovery was most material, and might be used by the Privy Council under the 3 & 4 W. 4, c. 41, s. 7, et seq., and affect their decision on the appeal.

Mr. Pemberton, Mr. Kindersley, and Mr. S. Sharpe, for the several Defendants, contended that the discovery which the Plaintiff, by his exceptions, insisted on obtaining, was quite immaterial to the relief sought by the bill, which was merely for the appointment of a receiver, in order to protect the property pending the appeal to the Privy Council; that the 74th General Order of 1828 (Ord. Can. 28), authorised the Master in deciding on the sufficiency or insufficiency of an answer to take into his consideration the relevancy or materiality of the statement or question referred to; and that such was the practice previous to those orders: Ager v. The Regent's Canal Company (G. Cooper, 212). That it was not stated that the discovery sought was in aid of any proceedings now pending or in contemplation; and that it could not be [508] had here in aid of proceedings in a Court which had full jurisdiction and power itself to grant the discovery; Dun v. Coates (1 Atk. 288; Mitford's Plead. 4th ed. 186); and that even if this discovery were obtained, it could not be used before the Privy Council. They also argued, that the bill was improper in its frame, seeking, by a bill for relief, to obtain a discovery immaterial to the relief prayed, and thereby evading the payment of the costs of the discovery; and also that it was veracious to seek a statement of all the idle gossip, and of the passing suspicions which had taken place in a provincial city in respect to a matter which had created great public interest.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale.] This is, no doubt, a very singular case; and I do not recollect ever having heard such an argument, upon a question as to the insufficiency of an answer.

The material facts of the case lie in a very small compass. Mr. James Wood having died in the month of April 1836, the present Plaintiff and other persons propounded the two papers dated in December 1834, which they call testamentary papers, and they were propounded as his will in the Ecclesiastical Court. The validity of those papers was opposed by the next of kin, and, during the litigation between those parties, and on the 13th of June 1836, Mr. Helps, one of the Defendants whose answer is now in question, propounded a writing dated in July 1835, and this he insisted was a codicil or testamentary paper which ought to have validity. On the 20th of February 1839 sentence was pronounced in the Ecclesiastical Court against the validity of all the papers; it was therefore held that Mr. James Wood had died intestate. Soon after this, the present Plaintiff presented his petition to the Queen in Council, which was referred, in the ordinary course, to the Judicial [509] Committee; and on the 3d of August in that year, certainly a very considerable time after the sentence had been pronounced, but how long after the appeal was presented I do not know, because that date has not been presented to me, he filed the present bill.

The bill is framed in a manner which, to me, I confess is perfectly novel. I do not recollect ever having seen a bill framed like the present. The relief which is sought by the bill, is to have the property protected pending the litigation; and a discovery is also sought of many facts. Almost all bills ask for discovery; but the great singularity of this bill is, that it asks a discovery not only of such facts as are material to the relief which is prayed by the bill, but also a discovery of very many facts which are not in the least degree material to that relief.

Very soon after the bill was filed, a motion was made to me for the appointment of a receiver. One of the objections made to that application was the frame of this bill. I have a perfect recollection that it was then said, that this bill was so much a bill of discovery that it was hardly fit or proper for this Court to treat it as a bill for relief; that was one of the several objections I had to consider. I then thought, and I believe I expressed myself, that the bill was improperly framed; but, notwithstanding this, that the title to the relief appeared to me to be clear, and I therefore granted the receiver, and this decision was afterwards confirmed on a rehearing by the Lord Chancellor. After this, the parties put in their answers, and it is perfectly clear, and is admitted by all parties, that the answers which have been put in do not fully answer all the interrogatories; and it is also admitted, that the answers which have been put in, are answers to some part of the discovery, which, by the Defendants themselves, is considered to be quite immaterial and irrelevant to the relief which is [510] sought. They say they have thought it right (and no one can very well dispute the moral propriety of what they have done) to answer such parts of the matter immaterial to the relief, as contained imputations on their character, and there they stop; and they say they intended to go no further. Exceptions were filed to the answers, the Master has overruled those exceptions, and the matter now comes before me.

Considering this bill, as I do consider it, as most improperly framed for the purpose of relief thereby sought; the first question is, whether the Plaintiff, under the circumstances of this case, is, by means of this improper bill, to obtain a discovery which he could not legitimately have had on a bill properly framed: this, I apprehend, is really the first question; and the next question is, whether the Court is to be so entangled by technicalities and form, as to be prevented doing that which the real justice and merits of the case require. The object in view is now avowed, though it is not stated in the bill; the bill merely states that a discovery of the several matters stated by the bill is material and necessary to the Plaintiff; while the object now stated is, that, with regard to the proceedings which are taking place in the Court of Appeal from the Ecclesiastical Court, it is most material to bring forward facts, which, if known, would be taken into consideration by the Judicial Committee, and must have a material effect on their decision. In the first place I have to observe, that in my opinion, a Plaintiff has no right to mix up two such distinct matters in one suit; he has no right at the same time to maintain a bill for specific relief, and add to that, a bill for discovery on a matter which is quite distinct from that specific relief; that, I think, he has no right to do. In the next place, if this had been a simple bill of discovery, it would be a matter of serious consideration, whether, in the present state of [511] things, this Court has jurisdiction to entertain such a bill. The Judicial Committee of the Privy Council has, no doubt, under the Act of Parliament by which it is created, a right to ask for and claim new evidence and new information in respect of the subject on which it is to adjudicate; it may do so if it thinks fit, and, however strange it may seem to our notions of the functions of a Court of Appeal, that the Court should have the means of constituting a new case on which it may adjudicate, and on which adjudication there is no appeal whatever, still the Act of Parliament gives to that Court authority to call for fresh facts, to direct issues, and to make inquiries; but has it ever been supposed or imagined that an Appellant in the Privy Council has a right, without any previous order or sanction of that Court, to adduce fresh evidence which that Court must consider? If there is to be fresh evidence gone into, and if there is to be new inquiry, is not the necessity for it to be first declared by the Court itself? Can a party, without leave, and before the Court itself demands further evidence, or thinks fit so to direct, say he has a right to produce new evidence, nay further, that the Court, when it is produced, must receive it? I apprehend he has no such right. It has been observed, and I believe with perfect truth, that no Judge sitting in that Court on an appeal, has ever yet thought it a proper exercise of his discretion to call for such new evidence; no instance has been stated where any further evidence has been produced; and it certainly appears to me that a party without leave—without a previous adjudication, or order of the Court—has no right to say that fresh evidence, at his demand, shall be produced.

The case might certainly have been different, if, on the consideration of such evidence as was before it, the Judicial Committee had decided that it was necessary for the justice of the case to produce fresh evi-[512]-dence; but even if an order of the Privy Council had been made, I must own I should have hesitated before I came to the conclusion that this Court has jurisdiction to act in aid of such an adjudication, in affording discovery. It is not necessary to come to a conclusion on that question on the one side or the other; but I cannot help saying, as at present advised, that a party desiring to produce evidence, but having no order of the Judicial Committee for that purpose, has not a right in this Court to file a bill of discovery for that evidence, on a mere speculation. For anything that appears to the contrary, the Judicial Committee may be perfectly satisfied with the evidence adduced in the Court below, and might think fit to decide on that evidence, notwithstanding a bill of discovery had been filed and answered in this Court. I say it is not necessary to decide on these points, because I have only to look at the particular nature of this case as it is stated on the bill.

The only difficulty I have had in the consideration of this case, from the first opening of it, is this, that the Defendants have submitted to answer, and have partly answered these very interrogatories, and then it comes to what I have alluded to before, that when the Court sees the discovery, ought not, under the circumstances stated to be afforded, when it is apparent that the subject of discovery is wholly and altogether immaterial to the relief sought by the bill, is it to be so bound by technicalities, as that, because the party has answered at all he must be held bound to answer completely? That is a question which I admit has created some difficulty in my mind. I do not pronounce my opinion on it without some hesitation; but I am of opinion I ought not to compel the party to answer completely, because he has answered as far as he has done; and being of that opinion, and that the discovery thereby sought is wholly immaterial [513] and irrelevant to any purposes that can be answered in this Court. I think, that under these circumstances the Master came to a sound conclusion, and that I ought to overrule the exceptions to his report (See The Baron de Feucheres v. Dawes, post.)

[513] HOOD v. PHILLIPS. Feb. 9, 11, 1841.

Where the same person becomes absolutely entitled to an estate and a sum of money charged upon it, the charge will be deemed extinguished, unless it appears that the owner intended otherwise.

For the purpose of shewing the intention, evidence direct and presumptive may be resorted to. A transfer to a trustee must be considered as one of the grounds rebutting the presumption of merger; but does not amount to decisive evidence against the presumption.

A. B., the owner in fee of an estate, paid off a mortgage in fee existing on it, which in 1807 was transferred to a trustee, in trust for A. B., her "heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns, respectively;" and the trustee covenanted to convey to A. B., her heirs, or assigns, or unto such other person or persons, and in such manner and form as A. B., her heirs, executors, administrators, or assigns should direct. A. B. devised the estate to a trustee to pay certain specified legacies, and subject thereto, she devised it to C. D. in fee, and upon or for no other use, trust, intent, or purpose whatsoever." A. B. died in 1832. Held, that the mortgage had merged.

The question in this case was, whether a mortgage in fee for £500, conveyed on certain trusts for the benefit of the owner of the equity of redemption, had become merged.

In 1730 the owner of an estate called East Hook, mortgaged it in fee for the sum of £500.

On the 25th of February 1807 this mortgage was in consideration of £500 transferred to John Phillips, who, on the following day, executed a declaration of trust, whereby he declared that the £500 paid for the transfer of the mortgage, was the money of Elizabeth Lort (who was then the owner in fee of the East Hook estate), and that his name had been used in trust only, and to and for the sole and only proper use, benefit, and behoof [514] of said Elizabeth Lort, her heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns respectively, and to and for no other use, intent, or purpose whatsoever. And John Phillips thereby, for himself, his heirs, executors, and administrators, covenanted with Elizabeth Lort, her heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns, that he and his heirs would, at any time or times thereafter, at the request, cost, and charges of the said Elizabeth Lort, her heirs, executors, administrators, or assigns, well and sufficiently convey, assign, and assure all and singular the hereditaments and premises, with their appurtenances, "unto the said Elizabeth Lort, her heirs or assigns, or unto such other person or persons, and in such manner and form as the said Elizabeth Lort, her heirs, executors, administrators, or assigns should direct or appoint."

Elizabeth Lort continued seised of the estate, and by her will, dated in 1829, she devised it to the Defendant, John Lort Phillips, in fee, upon trust to pay an annuity of £20 a year to his brother for life, and upon trust to raise £1000 for certain persons named in the will. The will then proceeded as follows;—"And subject unto and charged with the payment of the said annuity of £20 unto the said James Phillips for his life as aforesaid, and of the said five several sums of £200 each as herein-before mentioned, and all expenses whatsoever in any way incident to the execution of the aforesaid trusts, I give and devise the same messuages, hereditaments, &c., unto and to the use of my godson, Peregrine Lort Phillips, his heirs and assigns for ever, and upon or for no other use, trust, intent, or purpose whatsoever;" and she gave her residuary personal estate to the two Plaintiffs.

The testatrix died in 1832.

[515] The Plaintiffs, the residuary legatees, by this bill, prayed to have it declared that the £500 was a subsisting charge on the property, and to have the same paid or the mortgage foreclosed.

Mr. Kindersley and Mr. Lewis, for the Plaintiffs, contended, that the testatrix had kept the charge on foot for the benefit of her personal estate. That the ordinary presumption was rebutted, by her procuring a transfer to a trustee and not to herself, and especially by the declaration of trust for her, her heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns respectively; and by the covenant, whereby the trustee covenanted with her, her executors and administrators, to convey to such other person as she, her heirs, executors, administrators, or assigns should direct. They cited Duke of Chandos v. Talbot (3 P. W. p. 605), Donisthorpe v. Porter (2 Eden, 162), Oxenden v. Lord Compton (2 Ves. jun. 69), Forbes v. Moffatt (18 Ves. 384), Trevor v. Trevor (2 Myl. & K. 675), Earl of Buckingham v. Hobart (3 Swan. p. 199), Thomas v. Kemys (2 Vern. 348), Chester v. Wiles (1 Amb. 246).

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Pitman, for the devisee of the estate. Where a person having an absolute interest in an estate, pays off a charge, it is extinguished, unless you can clearly shew the intention that the charge should be kept alive. This may be done by express declaration, or from inference arising from the great advantage to the party in keeping the charge alive for his benefit. It is impossible to suggest anything like an express declaration in this case, that the charge should be kept alive, and there is no possible purpose to be answered in preserving the charge independent [516] of the estate. The covenant in the declaration of trust is to convey the estate to Mrs. Lort, her heirs and assigns, or to such other person as she, her heirs, executors, administrators, or assigns should direct.

They argued that the terms of Mrs. Lort's will were conclusive on the point; for she devised expressly, subject to certain charges, "and upon or for no other use, trust, intent, or purpose whatever;" this excludes the possibility of her intending the devisee to take, subject in addition to a mortgage of £500. They cited Tyler v. Lake (4 Sim. 351), Asley v. Milles (1 Sim. 298), Parry v. Wright (1 S. & S. 369, and 5 Russ. 142).

Mr. G. Turner and Mr. Bevir, for the representatives of John Phillips the trustee.

Mr. Freeling, for John Lort Phillips the trustee.

Mr. Kindersley, in reply.

Feb. 11. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. In this case the testatrix, Mrs. Elizabeth Lort, was, in her lifetime, entitled to an estate called East Hook, and was also entitled to the sum of £500, charged on the same estate by way of mortgage. By her will she devised the estate, subject to certain charges, to the Defendant Peregrine Lort Phillips in fee; and she gave the residue of her personal estate to the Plaintiffs, Elizabeth Hood and Mary Saunders.

The Plaintiffs insist that the mortgage was kept up as a distinct charge, and they claim the £500 as part of the testatrix's personal estate.

[517] The Defendant, Peregrine Lort Phillips, insists, that, as the estate and the charge thereon belonged to the same person, the charge ought, in this Court, to be deemed merged in the inheritance.

And the only question in the cause is, whether the mortgage for £500 was a subsisting charge at the death of the testatrix.

The general rule in such cases is not in dispute. If the same person becomes absolutely entitled to an estate, and to a sum of money which is charged upon it, this Court will deem the charge to have become merged in the estate, or to have become, extinguished; unless it shall appear that the owner of the estate and of the charge intended otherwise.

For the purpose of shewing the intention, evidence direct and presumptive may be resorted to; and the Plaintiffs allege it to be clear, that the testatrix did not intend to pay off the mortgage for the purpose of relieving the estate or property on which it was charged, but for the purpose of keeping a portion of her personal estate so invested.

The mortgage was of very long standing, and in February 1807 was vested in Henry Davis, who was entitled to the estate in fee, subject to redemption on payment of £500. Mrs. Lort was absolutely entitled to the equity of redemption.

The money was then paid off by Mrs. Lort; and, on that occasion, Henry Davis conveyed the estate, not to her, but to John Phillips, by a deed to which she was no party, and in which it was expressed that the mortgage was paid off by Phillips; and that, in con-[518]-sideration thereof, the estate was conveyed to him in fee, subject to redemption on payment of the mortgage money to him. On the following day, however, the 26th February 1807, John Phillips executed a deed-poll, whereby he declared that the money, with which the mortgage was paid off, was not his, but Mrs. Lort's; and that, in the deed, his name was used only in trust for her; and by the deed it was expressed that he covenanted with her, her executors, administrators, and assigns, that he would, at her request, convey the estate to her, her heirs and assigns, or unto such other person as she, her heirs, executors, administrators, or assigns should direct.

In this case, therefore, the owner of the estate paying off the charge, caused a conveyance to be so made, as not legally to extinguish the charge. The legal estate was left outstanding, and this was contended to be conclusive evidence, that Mrs. Lort intended the charge to be kept on foot for the benefit of her personal estate; and the rather, because of the introduction of the words "executors and administrators" into the declaration of trust.

The presumption being, that when the owner of an estate pays off a charge, he does it for the relief of the estate, a cotemporaneous transfer of the charge to a trustee must be considered as one of the grounds upon which the presumption may be rebutted: but no instance has been cited in which such a transfer has of itself been held to be decisive evidence against the presumption, and I am of opinion that it ought not to be so.

The object is to collect the intention: and we must look at all the circumstances of the case, at the trans-[519]-fer, at the trusts declared, and at the subsequent conduct of the party. Even if Mrs. Lort had intended in 1807 that the charge should be continued, the money and estate being her own absolutely, she was at liberty at any time to change her mind, which might have been different in 1829, when she made her will, and in 1832 when she died.

In this case Mrs. Lort was not content with merely causing the mortgage to be transferred to John Phillips, she also caused a declaration of trust to be executed. It is said, that at the time, her clear intention was to keep the mortgage on foot, and yet she has not said so; the declaration is silent as to that, and her intention in that respect (supposing it to be such as is alleged), is left as matter of implication and inference, from the mere fact of the transfer and the use which is made of the words "executors and administrators" in the deed. I am unable to adopt the reasoning which leads to the inference insisted on by the Plaintiff. It appears to me, that if she really had intended to keep the charge on foot, the declaration of trust was an occasion on which the intention must have been clearly and unequivocally expressed, and the absence of any mention of the trust on which the money was to be held, or the mode in which it was to be applied, appears to me to afford evidence in support of the ordinary presumption far outweighing any evidence against the presumption, which the use of the words "executors and administrators" in the ill-drawn deed may be supposed to afford.

There is nothing to shew that Mrs. Lort had any interest in keeping up the charge, and thinking that the transfer of the mortgage and the declaration of trust taken together, do not afford sufficient evidence to rebut the ordinary presumption that she paid off the [520] charge to relieve the estate, it does not appear to me to be material to consider what advice or what motive induced her to cause the transfer to be made as it was.

Twenty-two years elapsed between this transaction and the date of the will, and in the will no mention whatever is made of the mortgage money. Being the owner of the estate, and of the supposed charge upon it, she devises the estate to John Lort Phillips in fee, on trust to pay an annuity, and to raise certain sums by sale or mortgage, and subject to those charges and the expense of executing those trusts, she gives the estate to Peregrine Lort Phillips, his heirs and assigns for ever; and she adds the words, "and upon or for no other use, trust, intent, or purpose whatsoever."

It is very difficult for me to suppose that the testatrix, using these words, intended the estate given to her devisee, to be subject to a claim by her residuary legatee for a sum of £500 charged on that estate. What the Plaintiffs want, is proof of intention to rebut the ordinary presumption in such cases; and the occasion of making the will was such as to make it probable, to say the least, that the testatrix would have distinctly and unequivocally expressed the intention if she really had it.

If the charge had belonged to another person, it would have been in no way affected by the terms of the devise; and even in this case (the charge belonging to the testatrix), I do not think that the silence of the will on the subject of the charge is itself conclusive. But it corroborates the impression afforded by the other circumstances of this case; and, on the whole, I am of opinion that there is no sufficient evidence to rebut the [521] presumption that this lady, having paid off the mortgage, intended to extinguish the charge.

Dismiss the bill, with costs.

[521] WRENCH v. JUTTING. Feb. 13, 1841.

A testator bequeathed to A. his household furniture and other like things, "and all other goods of whatever kind," and he appointed that certain specified monies should be divided as follows, after all his debts should be paid off. He then specified certain legacies, and proceeded, "three or four thousand pounds, or whatever remaining sum or sums to A." Held, that A. did not take the general residue.

The question in this cause turned on the will of Jacob Wrench, which was expressed as follows: "I give and bequeath all my household furniture, plate, linen, books, china, pictures, and all other goods of whatever kind unto Margaret Petronella Jutting of No. 1 Grovehill Terrace, Camberwell, and appoint J. H. Jutting of the same place sole executor, and that the money, outstanding or book debts, the remaining sum unsettled, left me by my late father, and also what may be forthcoming from the estate of the late firm of Turner & Wrench, now in the hands of Mr. Adams of Bridewell, be divided as follows, after all my debts are paid off, £50 Rev. T. W. Wrench for board and lodging; £100 Diana Maria Matilda; £50 Julia Charlotte Wood; £100 Mrs. Shyring; £100 Aged Pilgrim Society; 3 to £4000, or whatever remaining sum or sums, to my beloved Margaret Petronella Jutting."

The testator died in October 1837. It appeared that he had other personal property besides that specified in his will, consisting principally of money. The question was, whether the will contained a general residuary gift to Miss Jutting.

Mr. Pemberton, Mr. Stuart, and Mr. Craig, for the Plaintiffs, who were the next of kin of the testator, contended, that the general residuary estate was undisposed of. That it would not pass by the word "goods" in the first clause, which related to furniture and other things ejusdem generis, nor by the words "remaining sum or sums," which referred only to the remainder of the property just previously specifically bequeathed, for they alone were directed to be "divided as follows."

They cited Ommanney v. Butcher (Turn. & Russ. 260), where it was held that the residue did not pass by the words "in case there is any money remaining, I should wish it to be given to private charities," and Wilde v. Holtzmeier (5 Ves. 811).

Mr. Kindersley and Mr. Purvis, contra, contended, that the general residue passed to the Defendant Miss Jutting, either under the words "all other goods of whatever kind," in the former part of the will, or under the words "whatever remaining sum or sums" in the latter. In Legge v. Asgill (Turn. & Russ. 265, n.) the residue was held to pass under the words "money left unemployed," so everything would be included in the Ecclesiastical Court under the words "bona notabilia." They also cited the following cases, Campbell v. Prescott (15 Ves. 500), Mitchell v. Mitchell (5 Mad. 69), Kendall v. Kendall (4 Russ. 360), Arnold v. Arnold (2 Myl. & K. 365), *Boys v. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS (without hearing a reply). There is some obscurity, but we must collect the testator's meaning from all the words of the will. The intention imputed to the testator by the Defendant is, that he intended to give her everything he had in the [523] world, subject to the payment of his debts and legacies. If that were his intention, the way in which he expresses himself is this [his Lordship read the will], he does not direct the legacies to be paid, and then give to the Defendant all the rest, but he distinguishes a particular part of his property from all the rest, and directs it to be divided, after all his debts are paid, between certain legatees in the amounts stated, and gives £3000 or £4000, or whatever remaining sum or sums to the Defendant. In the former part of the will he had given her the furniture, &c., "and all other goods of whatever kind." It is not necessary to say what would be the effect of these words; if they had stood by themselves and if this were the only clause in the will, there would be strong reason for extending their operation; but that he did not intend all his estate to pass, is shewn by his subsequently stating what were his intentions as to a particular part of it. It has been argued, that he excepted certain pecuniary legacies from his general gift to the Defendant in the latter part of his will, and that he did not otherwise desire to extend the exception, but when it is once shewn that he did not intend, by the first words, to give everything, they must then be in some way restricted.

I think, on the whole, that these words cannot have the enlarged meaning attributed to them by the Defendant. The testator by the latter clause separates three several portions of his property: his book debts, the sum unsettled by his father, and what may be forthcoming from the late firm, and having specified them, he says they are to be divided as follows, after payment of his debts, and having directed the particular sums to be given to the legatees named; he gives "£3000 or £4000, or whatever remaining sum or sums" to the Defendant. I cannot extend the meaning of these latter words beyond the particular sum here mentioned.

[524] It was properly asked, why did the testator enumerate those particular sums at all? There could be no reason, unless he intended them alone to be subject to the disposition in that clause. I think that the general residue is undisposed of and belongs to the Plaintiffs, the next of kin.

[524] SIDEBOTHAM v. BARRINGTON. Feb. 16, 1841.

[S. C. 4 Beav. 110; 5 Beav. 261. See Fraser v. Wood, 1845, 8 Beav. 342.]

Proceedings in insolvency are not superseded by a subsequent bankruptcy founded on an act of bankruptcy prior to the insolvency.

A., who possessed a real estate, committed an act of bankruptcy; he afterwards took the benefit of the Insolvent Debtors Act, and was subsequently declared bankrupt. Held, that the assignees in bankruptcy could not make a good title to a real estate of the bankrupt: that the estate was vested in the assignees of the insolvency, and that the objection was one of title and not of conveyance.

The Court will not determine a question between the parties, on admission of facts on which they reserve to themselves the right of afterwards adducing evidence.

William Barrington, who was possessed of a life interest in a freehold estate, committed an act of bankruptcy in April 1829, and afterwards, on the 21st of April 1829, he conveyed the estate to Mr. Skirrit, in trust to sell for payment of certain debts, and to pay the residue to him William Barrington. At the time of this conveyance the estate stood mortgaged to Mr. Royds.

In December 1829 William Barrington was imprisoned for debt, and in April 1830 he took the benefit of the Insolvent Debtors Act (7 G. 4, c. 57), and executed the usual conveyance of his property to the official assignee, but no regular assignee was then appointed.

On the 22d of February 1833 William Barrington was declared a bankrupt, and the Plaintiff was appointed his assignee. The property was sold by the [525] Plaintiff to the Defendant William Barrington the younger, who having refused to complete his purchase, a bill for specific performance was filed against him, and a reference as to the title made to the Master. (See Ex parte Barrington and Ex parte Sidebotham, 3 Deac. & Ch. 818, 4 Deac. & Ch. 461, 1 Deac. 3, 1 Mont. & Ayr. 655, 2 Mont. & Ayr. 146.) The Master's opinion being against the title, the matter now came before the Court by way of exception to his report.

The purchase-money was admitted, for the purpose of this discussion, to be more than sufficient to pay all the creditors under the insolvency, but the parties reserved to themselves the right of adducing evidence thereon.

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Teed, for the exceptions, and in support of the title contended, first, that the fiat in bankruptcy wholly superseded the insolvency.

Secondly, that the assignees and creditors under the insolvency must be considered in the nature of incumbrancers, and subject to their claims, as mere trustees for the assignees and creditors under the bankruptcy; that the objection would then be one of conveyance and not of title; Townsend v. Champenown (1 Y. & J. 449), Lord Braybrooke v. Inskip (8 Ves. 436).

Thirdly, that the insolvency could not overreach the voluntary deed to Skirritt, the deed having been executed more than three months from the commencement of the imprisonment, 7 G. 4, c. 57, s. 32, but that [526] the bankruptcy did overreach that deed, because the act of bankruptcy took place prior to its execution. That consequently the assignees in bankruptcy took the estate, interest, and power conveyed to Skirritt, and had priority over the assignees in the insolvency.

Mr. Kindersley and Mr. Bethell, contra. The estate and interest of the assignee under the insolvency is still subsisting; Ex parte Shuttleworth (2 Gl. & J. 68); this also appears from the thirteenth section of the Insolvent Act. (1) The Plaintiff, as was observed by the Master when the case was before him, has sold the estate of another man, and then offers to get him to confirm the sale; this Court has never, under such circumstances, enforced the contract. The property being vested in the assignee in insolvency, can only be sold according to the formalities prescribed by the Insolvent Act (7 G. 4, c. 57, s. 20).

[527] The insolvent assignee is not a trustee, he is not in any way under the control of the Plaintiff, the objection, therefore, goes to the title, and not to the conveyance.

The deed to Skirritt is valid as against the Plaintiff, unless it were fraudulent, which is not suggested.

(1) And be it further enacted, that the filing of the petition of every person in actual custody, who shall be subject to the laws concerning bankrupts, and who shall apply by petition to the said Court for his or her discharge from custody, according to this Act, shall be accounted and adjudged an act of bankruptcy from the time of filing such petition; and that any commission issuing against such person, and under which he or she shall be declared bankrupt before the time appointed by the said Court, and advertised in the London Gazette, for hearing the matters of such petition, or at any time within two calendar months from the time of filing such petition, shall have effect to avoid any conveyance and assignment of the estate and effects of such person, which shall have been made in pursuance of the provisions of this Act: provided always, that the filing of such petition shall not be deemed an act of bankruptcy, unless such person be so declared bankrupt before the time so advertised as aforesaid, or within such two calendar months as aforesaid; but that every such conveyance and assignment shall be good and valid, notwithstanding any commission of bankrupt under which such person shall be declared bankrupt after the time so advertised as aforesaid, and after the expiration of such two calendar months as aforesaid.

Mr. Teed, in reply.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale], after reading the thirteenth section of the 7 G. 4 c. 57, decided, that the fiat did not supersede the insolvency, and that the conveyance to the provisional assignee in insolvency was good and valid, and he then proceeded as follows :—

On the other point, it appears that under the deed of the 21st April 1829, the equity of redemption of this estate, it having been previously mortgaged, was conveyed to a trustee upon trust to sell and to pay certain debts, and to hand over the surplus to the bankrupt. Now, whatever may be the effect of the Insolvent Debtors and Bankrupt Act upon such voluntary deeds, this at least is clear, that whatever interest was vested in the bankrupt after the execution of that deed, did, by operation of the assignment in the insolvency, become vested in the assignee in the insolvency, and it became vested in him subject to the duties he had to perform. That interest, therefore, now remains in the insolvent's assignee subject to the duties which, according to the Act, he has to perform.

I do not think it is necessary for me to advert to the difference between the provisional and an ordinary creditor's assignee, because there is now such a person in whom the estate is at present vested, and when or at [528] what particular time it became so vested, does not appear to me to be material; but the estate being so vested in the assignee, and he being subject to such duties, I apprehend it cannot be considered as a mere question of conveyance.

I apprehend a question of conveyance arises in this way. Where an interest is vested in a party to secure a right, the satisfaction of which right entitles the party who has sold the estate to call for a conveyance, then the Court considers it a question of conveyance only, but I think it has never gone further than that. If the estate be vested in a person, not for the purpose of securing a right, but for the purpose of enabling that person to perform a duty to others, then, until that duty has been performed, there can be no right to call for a conveyance.

Now here there is clearly a duty to perform in obeying the directions which are contained in the Insolvent Act. As to the value of the estate, I cannot enter into the consideration of it upon the present occasion. It appears probable that if these persons were amicably disposed, they might, by means of the assignee in the insolvency, the assignee in bankruptcy, and the insolvent himself, make a good title; they certainly could do so with the assistance of the Insolvent Debtors Court; however the question now is, what are the rights and duties of the parties with respect to one another. I am of opinion that, under the circumstances, the question is not merely one of conveyance, but one of title.

The other point has been put very ingeniously: it is said, that by the effect of the bankruptcy and the statute, the estate which the bankrupt intended to convey [529] to Skirritt has now become vested in the assignee in bankruptcy, and by acting under the powers which are contained in the deed, the Plaintiff can make a good title, wholly independent of the estate which had become vested in the assignee in insolvency in the meanwhile. I cannot, however, so consider it.

It is impossible for me to say, that there is such a right vested in the assignee in bankruptcy, that he can make a good title. Therefore I think that the exceptions taken to the Master's report must be overruled.

I think it right to say, that if I had been aware of the nature of this report before this matter was discussed I should have declined to hear the arguments. The parties have agreed, for the purpose of argument, but not for any other purpose, to admit certain facts, and reserved the right to adduce evidence on them. An adjudication might have been made by the Court, which would have proved quite fruitless; for a reference must afterwards have become necessary, to inquire into the truth of the very facts, on which the judgment of the Court was founded. The Court has not time to indulge in the discussion of imaginary cases, and if I had been aware of it I would not have heard this case on such partial admissions.

[530] CHADWICK v. BROADWOOD. March 20, 1841.

On overruling a plea, liberty was given to the Plaintiff to amend, and to the Defendant to plead de novo: Held, that the Defendant might, by a second plea, raise as a defence objections which he had passed over in his first plea.

Whether a negative plea can be filed to a bill of discovery in aid of an action at law, quære.

The Plaintiff, alleging himself to be son and heir of A., who was the son and heir of B., who was the son and heir of C., who was the eldest brother of D., who was the father of E., the deceased owner of an estate, and alleging the several descents and seisins, filed a bill of discovery in aid of an action at law. The Defendant pleaded that B. and the Plaintiff were not heirs of E., and that the property never descended to B., or to A., or to the Plaintiff, and that A. and the Plaintiff were never seised, "for that D. had never an elder brother C., and B. was not the son of any C." The plea was held multifarious, and was overruled.

Plea overruled on the ground of its not being accompanied by an answer as to a fact affecting, as evidence, the truth of the plea.

This case, which is reported ante, p. 308, now came on for argument upon a second plea, in the form of a negative plea.

The Plaintiff amended his bill, and which, so far as is material, stated:—that all the leases had expired twenty years next before the filing the bill.

That on the 15th of March 1768 Sir Andrew Chadwick died intestate as to his real estates, and without issue.

That, upon the death of Sir A. Chadwick, the premises comprised in the deeds of December 1717 and July 1720 respectively, descended to the Plaintiff's grandfather James Chadwick, who was the heir at law of the said Sir A. Chadwick, which said Joseph Chadwick was the eldest son of James Chadwick, who was the eldest brother of Ellice Chadwick, who was the father of Sir Andrew Chadwick, and which said James Chadwick died in the lifetime of the said Sir Andrew Chadwick, and that the Plaintiff's said grandfather Joseph Chadwick, as such heir at law, became well seised and entitled of and to the said several premises for an estate in fee-[531]-simple absolute in reversion, expectant upon the determination of the said term of sixty years, and the other terms of years subsisting therein, and granted by the said Sir Andrew Chadwick as aforesaid.

That, on the 7th of April 1790, the Plaintiff's grandfather, Joseph Chadwick, died intestate as to his real estates, and thereupon the said several premises descended to the Plaintiff's father, Thomas Chadwick, who was his only son and heir at law; whereby Thomas Chadwick became well seised and entitled of and to a like estate in the same premises.

That, on the 27th of August 1801, the Plaintiff's father, Thomas Chadwick, died intestate as to his real estates, and thereupon the several premises descended to the Plaintiff John Chadwick, as his only surviving son and heir at law, whereby the Plaintiff became well seised, and entitled to a like estate in the said premises.

That the said term of sixty years expired on the 24th of June 1825, or about that time, and that the other terms of years granted by the said Sir Andrew Chadwick as aforesaid respectively, expired at some time or times within two years, either prior or subsequent to the 24th of June 1825.

The bill also stated that the Plaintiff was seised in fee, and was entitled to have possession of the premises delivered up to him by the Defendants, "but that the Defendants refused to deliver up the same, notwithstanding they and the person or persons through or under whom they claimed, obtained possession of the said premises under or by virtue of the leases thereinbefore men-[532]-tioned to have been granted thereof respectively; and as evidence thereof the Plaintiff shewed, that the said Defendants, and the person and persons through or under whom they claimed, or some person or persons on their respective behalf, from time to time paid the rents reserved by the said leases respectively, and took receipts or acknowledgments in writing for the same, and that some of such payments were made to, and some of such receipts or acknowledgments were signed by the said Sir A. Chadwick, Joseph Chadwick, Thomas Chadwick, and the Plaintiff respectively; and although the others of such payments were made to, and the others of such receipts or acknowledgments were signed by, some other person or persons, yet such other person or persons received such payments, and signed such receipts as the agent or agents for and on the behalf of Sir Andrew Chadwick, Joseph Chadwick, Thomas Chadwick, and the Plaintiff respectively.

And that if the said Defendants would discover and set forth, as they ought to do, the dates and contents of the several receipts or acknowledgments for rent paid as aforesaid by them, or by any person or persons through or under whom they claimed, and the name or names, and description or descriptions of the person or persons who received the said payments respectively, and who signed the said receipts or acknowledgments respectively, it would appear, or the Plaintiff would thereby be enabled to prove, that all such payments of rent as aforesaid were made to, and that all such receipts or acknowledgments were signed by, Sir A. Chadwick, Joseph Chadwick, Thomas Chadwick, and the Plaintiff respectively, or by some person or persons on their respective behalf. And it is also stated that the Plaintiff was unable to proceed in his contemplated action "without [533] a discovery of the several matters, or without the production by the Defendants of the several deeds and documents therein respectively inquired after, and especially without the production by the Defendants of the leases and counterparts of leases, and the receipts or acknowledgments for rent thereinbefore mentioned, which indentures, counterparts, receipts, and acknowledgments was then in the possession of the Defendants."

To this bill the Defendant put in a plea, which, after excepting certain parts of the discovery which he afterwards answered, pleaded, "That Joseph Chadwick never was, and that the Plaintiff was not the heir at law of Sir Andrew Chadwick deceased, and that the premises did not, nor did any of them, ever descend to Joseph Chadwick as the heir at law of Sir A. Chadwick deceased, or to the Plaintiff's father, Thomas Chadwick, as the only son and heir at law of the said Joseph Chadwick, or to the Plaintiff as the only surviving son and heir at law of Thomas Chadwick, and that Joseph Chadwick never did become seized of, or entitled to the said premises, or any of them, as the heir at law of Sir A. Chadwick; and that Thomas Chadwick never did become seized of, or entitled to the said premises, or any of them, as the heir at law of Joseph Chadwick, and that the Plaintiff never did become seized of or entitled to the premises, or any of them, as the heir at law either of Sir A. Chadwick, or Joseph Chadwick, or of Thomas Chadwick; for that Ellice Chadwick, the father, never had an elder brother named James, and never had a brother named James who had or left issue; and Joseph Chadwick, the Plaintiff's alleged grandfather, was not the son of any James Chadwick who was a brother of Sir A. Chadwick's father Ellice Chadwick; and therefore the Defendant pleaded the matter aforesaid, to so much of the said bill as aforesaid, and humbly prayed the judgment of the [534] Court whether he ought to make any further answer to so much of the said bill as was before pleaded to."

The plea was accompanied by an answer in effect denying the possession of any documents, &c., shewing the alleged links of the pedigree, of the several descents or seizins, but there was no denial of the payment of rents as alleged in the bill.

Mr. Girdlestone and Mr. Teed, in support of the plea.

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Bird, contrà. The Defendant has no right, under the order to plead de novo, to plead a fact which he admitted by his former plea, he should only have amended his plea on the Statute of Limitations.

The present plea is open to several objections. First, it is a negative plea to a bill of discovery; it puts in issue the very point to be determined at law, and in aid of which this bill of discovery has been filed; so that the legal point would, in the first place, have to be determined in equity, without that very preliminary discovery which the Plaintiff alleges is necessary to enable him to establish his right. (See Wigram on Discovery, 32; Beames on Pleas, 276; Redesdale, 191; and the cases there referred to.)

Secondly, the plea is multifarious, raising many distinct issues, and not reducing the defence to a single point. It says, that Joseph was not heir of Sir Andrew: that the Plaintiff is not heir. That the estate did not descend to Joseph, or to Thomas, or to the Plaintiff; and that neither Joseph, nor Thomas, nor the Plaintiff [535] were seized. You cannot plead these distinct facts, heirship, descents and seizins of several parties, which may exist independently of each other.

Thirdly, the plea is argumentative, for it states as a reason, that Ellice never had a brother James, and never had a brother James who left issue, and Joseph was not the son of any James who was the brother of Ellice.

Fourthly, the plea is either overruled by the answer, or is not sufficiently supported thereby. The Defendant answers as to the possession of receipts for rents, but does not answer as to whether any rent was paid. If, therefore, he was right in answering the former, he was wrong in answering the latter, and if the latter were properly omitted, the plea is overruled by the answer to the former. Thring v. Edgar (2 Sim. & St. 274), Hardman v. Ellames (5 Sim. 640), Sanders v. King (6 Mad. 61), Harland v. Emerson (8 Bligh, 63), Gun v. Prior (1 Cox, 197).

Mr. Girdleston, in reply. The Plaintiff himself has taken advantage of the liberty to amend, and has accordingly made such amendments as he pleased, it was therefore open to the Defendants to raise any defence they thought advisable to the amended record.

Whether doubts might have formerly existed it is now settled, that a plea may be filed to a bill of discovery. Gait v. Osbaldeston (5 Mad. 428, and 1 Russ. 158; and see Mendizabel v. Machado, 1 Sim. 68; Robertson v. Lubbock, 4 Sim. 161).

[THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS. Suppose a bill of discovery in aid of an action at law shewed on the face of [536] it that the Plaintiff had no title, is there any doubt but that the Defendant might demur? None, and a plea merely introduces a fact which the Plaintiff has either purposely omitted or misrepresented.

The plea is not multifarious, the point raised is simply that of heirship, or, in other words, whether Ellice had a brother James, and the consequent destruction of the other links of the pedigree; the descent and seizin are the mere consequences of that single fact.

The payments stated in the bill are evidence of tenancy, and not of heirship, and it is not therefore necessary that they should be answered.

March 20. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. This is a bill of discovery, in which the Plaintiff alleges himself to be heir at law of Sir Andrew Chadwick. It is filed against the Defendants, who are alleged to be in possession of certain property, which formerly belonged to Sir Andrew Chadwick, who is said in his lifetime to have demised it for a term of sixty years, which expired about the year 1826. The Plaintiff claims as heir at law, in which character he alleges he is entitled to recover, and he has filed this bill for a discovery of those matters which are to enable him to establish his right at law.

A plea of the Statute of Limitations was put in to this bill as it was originally filed, and it was overruled; but at the time when it was overruled leave was given to the Defendants to plead de novo, and to the Plaintiff to amend his bill if he thought fit.

The Plaintiff took advantage of that liberty to amend his bill, consequently there was no longer any oppor-[537]-tunity of pleading de novo to the original bill; but the amended bill having been filed, I conceive that to that amended bill, the Defendant had a right to make any defence he might be advised he could make available. He has put in a plea and answer; I need not say what is unfortunately too well known in the experience of every one, that, from the strictness of the technical rules of pleading, this is a mode of defence which can with the utmost difficulty be sustained; but it is not necessary for me now to enter into the reasons which gave rise to those rules, or the reasons which may perhaps be urged for their alteration. I must take them as they are, and endeavour to decide on them accordingly.

I have heard quite enough to shew me that every care and attention has been used to make a short defence to this bill; its success, however, must depend on the nature of the allegations contained in the bill, and on the form and substance of the plea. The bill alleges, that on the death of Sir Andrew Chadwick the lessor under whom the Plaintiff claims, the premises, which are described therein, descended to the Plaintiff's grandfather Joseph Chadwick, who was the heir at law of Sir Andrew Chadwick, which said Joseph was the eldest son of James, who was the eldest brother of Ellice, who was the father of Sir Andrew.

It then alleges that James died in the lifetime of Sir Andrew; that Joseph, who was the grandfather of the Plaintiff, became well seised and entitled to those premises; that Joseph died intestate; that the premises then descended to the Plaintiff's father, Thomas; and that thereby Thomas became well seised; and then it alleges that the premises descended to the Plaintiff from Thomas. So what is here alleged is, that there was an [538] heirship and descent, and that there was a seisin in consequence of the heirship and descent. Now, upon this occasion, I do not think it at all necessary to consider a question which has not been argued as carefully as it would have been, had it been material; namely, as to the validity of a plea of this sort to a mere bill of discovery. I mean to express no opinion whatever on that subject. I will assume that a negative plea may be a valid plea to a bill of discovery. Now the plea which has been put in is certainly very singular in its form; it is alleged to be a mere negative plea of not heir, and to amount shortly to this: "You, the Plaintiff claiming the property as heir, are not heir, and, therefore, there is an end of your title." That is alleged to be the sum and substance of the plea: but the plea is really to this effect, that the Plaintiff's grandfather was not the heir of Sir Andrew, and that the Plaintiff is not the heir of Sir Andrew. The plea then goes on to assert that the premises did not descend to Joseph, who was the grandfather, as the heir of Sir Andrew; it further proceeds, neither did they descend to Thomas, as the heir of Joseph, neither did they descend to the Plaintiff as the heir of Thomas. It further goes on, that Joseph, the grandfather, did not become seised as the heir of Sir Andrew, nor did Thomas become seised as the heir of Joseph, nor did the Plaintiff become seised either as the heir of Thomas, his father, or as the heir of Joseph, his grandfather, or as the heir of Sir Andrew, who was the lessor under whom he claims. Now I take it to be quite clear, that the fact of a party being heir is consistent with the fact of there being no descent; and that under certain circumstances there may have been a descent without a seisin. These things, therefore, are several matters; they are not all the same; and consequently this is not a single plea of not heir, but it is a plea of not heir with those several [539] other circumstances annexed, not heir, no descent, and no seisin. The plea ends with a reason, "for that Ellice, who was father of Sir Andrew, had no elder brother named James, or any brother named James who had left issue; and Joseph, the grandfather, was not the son of any James who was the brother of Ellice the father of Sir Andrew."

It has been very ingeniously argued, that the plea really amounts to this, that the Plaintiff is not descended from any James through whom the descent from Sir Andrew could be traced. If that point had been brought forward on the plea, or if a single fact had been brought forward, which, by destroying the general links of succession in the pedigree, had, in that way, disproved the Plaintiff's title; or if the general result had been a simple statement of "no heir," I should have been inclined to think, that subject to any other objection raised, the plea would have been good, and ought to have been allowed, but it does not appear to me that a plea, in the present form, is a good plea. It pleads matters which appear to me to be distinct and several, and which, as would be seen at once if this were a bill for relief, would have a totally different effect. Suppose this had been a bill for relief, and no heirship had been pleaded, the Plaintiff might have replied to the plea; and if it had been proved that the Plaintiff was the heir, then the other facts, the descent and the seisin, would have been admitted; this evidently shews that this is a plea of several matters.

It is further objected to this plea, that it is informal, and that it does not accomplish that, which is rarely, if ever, accomplished by the union of a plea and answer, in consequence of objections arising from the several rules of pleading. The rules have been agreed upon [540] by both sides, the difficulty is in acting on them in each particular case. They may be stated thus; you are to answer everything charged in the bill, which if true would displace the plea, and this you must do whether the bill does or does not expressly charge those matters to be evidence of the facts. If they are material for the purpose of displacing the plea they are to be answered, but, on the other hand, if they are not material for that purpose, you are not to answer them, for by so doing you overrule your plea. Now in this case it is said that the Defendant has either done too much or too little; there are certain receipts and acknowledgments for rent, which are stated in the bill to have been in the possession of the Defendant, and to be evidence of the matters charged in the bill or some of them ; there are also statements in the bill of the payments of rent, for which these are the receipts and the acknowledgments. The Defendant has answered as to the receipts and acknowledgments, but he has not answered as to the payment of rent. Now it is said he has either answered too much or too little ; for if he was bound to answer as to the receipts and acknowledgments, then he has done too little, because he has not answered as to the payments. On the other hand, if he was not bound to answer as to the payments, then he has done too much, because, in that case, he ought not to have answered as to the receipts and acknowledgments.

Now the distinction which has been drawn by Mr. Girdlestone on that point is to this effect ; he says this is not a payment which you may apply to anything stated in the bill, but a payment alleged in the bill as evidence of tenancy and not of heirship. I think he is mistaken as to that ; and that it is stated as evidence of the Plaintiff's title, which consists in his heirship and nothing else, and it appears to me, therefore, even on this [541] point of form, if the Defendants got over the other difficulties, that this plea would have to be overruled. (NOTE.—This rule of pleading has since been altered by the 36 & 37 General Orders of August 1841 ; see Beavan's Ord. Can. 175.)

[541] DOWDING v. SMITH. Feb. 26, March 9, 1891.

Bequest "to A. and to the children of B. to be equally divided." Held, that they took per capita.

The question in this cause was, in what shares the residuary estate of the testator was to be distributed as between the residuary legatees.

The testator by his will, dated in 1825, gave a number of legacies, and among them specific legacies, and £400 a year to his wife, and a legacy of £500 consols to the children of Mrs. John Stockdale. He afterwards added a memorandum as follows :—"No legacies to be paid till after the decease of my dear wife Mrs. Nancy Stockdale, and then the residue of the property do devolve to my niece Miss Mary Stockdale of Piccadilly, and to the children of Mr. John Stockdale to be equally divided."

There were five children of John Stockdale, one of whom was born after the decease of the testator, but in the lifetime of his widow.

The testator's widow died in 1839, and the question, which arose between Miss Mary Stockdale and the five children of John Stockdale, was, whether the former took a moiety of the residue, or one-sixth part thereof only.

[542] Mr. Koe, for Mary Stockdale, contended that she was entitled to a moiety of the residue ; and that, at all events, those children only, who were born in the lifetime of the testator, were entitled to share in the residue.

Mr. Roupell, contra, contended that the five children were entitled to share equally with Mary Stockdale, as the gift was to a class after the death of the widow.

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Wood, for other parties.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS. I think there are several authorities bearing on this question which have not been cited, my difficulty arises from the repetition of the word to. The residue is to devolve to A. and to the children of B., to be equally divided.

March 9. The case was again heard, when Mr. Koe, for Mary Stockdale, argued as before ; and also contended that the words "equally to be divided" applied to both parties, and meant that the property was to be equally divided between Mary Stockdale and a class consisting of the children of John Stockdale, so that Mary Stockdale was entitled to a moiety.

Mr. Roupell, for the children of John Stockdale, admitted that the words, "equally to be divided," applied to both parts of the sentence, but contended that there was to be an equal division between Mary Stockdale and the children.

[543] They relied on the following authorities, Blackler v. Webb (2 P. Williams, 383), where the testator bequeathed the surplus of his personal estate equally to his son J. and to his son P.'s children, to his daughter T., and to his daughter W.'s children, and his daughter M. P. was dead, leaving several children, and W. was living and had children. It was held the legatees took per stirpes. In Buller v. Stratton (3 B. C. C. 366), where the trust was to sell and divide equally between R. C. S., J. S., and the children of M. P., it was held they took per capita; and also on Bolger v. Mackell (5 Ves. 509), and Barnes v. Patch (8 Ves. 604).

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. There is some obscurity in the expression used, the ambiguity depends on the way in which the words, "to be equally divided," ought to be applied; both parties contend that they ought to be applied to both parts of the sentence, but in a different manner. One says that the whole is to be equally divided into two parts, and that one is to belong to Mary Stockdale, and the other half to the children of John Stockdale; on the other hand it is contended, that Mary Stockdale and the children are to take equally between them. I cannot read the expression differently than I should if the direction had been to divide it between Mrs. Stockdale and the children of John in equal shares. There is some difficulty, but the authorities come in aid, and shew that the proper construction is that contended for by Mr. Roupell, and that the division ought to be per capita. (1)

[544] BEASLEY v. KENYON. Feb. 13, 1841.

A. being entitled to a legacy of £5000, the executor and residuary legatee misrepresented the amount to be £4000, and for this sum the residuary legatee gave his bond to A. The executor, having paid all the debts and other legacies, handed over all that remained to the residuary legatee, and which was more than sufficient to satisfy A.'s demand. Held, that a bill might be sustained by A. against the residuary legatee and the representatives of the executor for recovering the extra £1000 and interest, without making the representatives of the testator a party.

This bill was filed by Mr. and Mrs. Beasley, and it represented that, under the will of her father, who died in 1806, Mrs. Beasley was entitled to two legacies, amounting together to the sum of £5000. That she was an infant at the time of his death, and that, on her marriage, the Defendant H. E. Boates who was entitled to the testator's residuary estate, and Mr. Williams the sole executor, improperly represented to the Plaintiff that her portion was £4000, which was in the possession of her brother, the Defendant H. E. Boates; who, not being able conveniently to pay it, gave to the Plaintiff, Mrs. Beasley, a bond for securing the £4000, which was made the subject of a settlement.

It stated, that the executor possessed himself of the assets of the testator and paid all the debts and other legacies; and that there remained a considerable surplus, more than sufficient to pay the Plaintiff's legacies, "but which surplus, Mr. Williams the executor, afterwards and a short time prior to the marriage of Mr. and Mrs. Beasley (1827), handed over to, or permitted the Defendant H. E. Boates to possess himself of, without first setting apart a sufficient sum to answer the legacies so bequeathed to the Plaintiff."

That several years after, the Plaintiffs, who had been previously in ignorance of their rights, discovered the misrepresentation.

The bill was filed against H. E. Boates, and the representative of Mr. Williams (who was not however the [545] representative of the testator), and the trustee of the settlement; and it prayed a declaration that the Plaintiff, J. B. Beasley, in right of Plaintiff's wife, was entitled, as against the estate of Mr. Williams and Henry Ellis Boates, to be paid the further sum of £1000 and interest thereon at the rate of £5 per cent.

To this bill one of the Defendants demurred, partly on the ground that the representatives of the original testator had not been made parties to the suit.

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. J. Russell, for the demurrer, contended that this being a suit for a legacy, could not be sustained in the absence of the legal personal representative of the testator.

(1) And see Lenden v. Blackmore, 10 Sim. 626; Cooke v. Bowen, 4 Y. & C. 244; and also Ackerman v. Burrows, 3 V. & B. 54, as to the force of the word "divide."

Mr. Kindersley and Mr. Lewis, contra. This is not a bill for a legacy, but it proceeds on the assumption that the whole estate of the testator has been administered; that this legacy has been retained and misapplied, and that, therefore, the Defendants are chargeable personally. It states, that Mr. Williams the executor alone proved the will, that he received the assets, and paid all the debts, and all the other legacies except this; that he had a surplus in his hands more than sufficient to pay the legacy, which the bill alleges the executor, under some secret arrangement between him and the Defendant Boates, the residuary legatee, paid over to the latter. This bill asks relief in respect of a breach of trust for which the Defendants are personally responsible.

Mr. Russell, in reply.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. The Plaintiff alleges that Mrs. Beasley his wife, was entitled under the will [546] and codicil of her father to two legacies, amounting to £5000, that ample assets were possessed by the executor who proved the will, and that he, having paid all other demands on the estate, handed over the residue, without having paid the legacies due to the Plaintiff. Several years after, the Plaintiff being about to marry, the executor and residuary legatee represented to her that her fortune was £4000, for which sum a bond was given by the residuary legatee. This sum, represented to be her fortune, was made the subject of a settlement. The marriage took place; and it is alleged, that the Plaintiffs afterwards discovered the fraud which had been practised on them, for having a fortune of £5000, a security for £4000 only was given them. The bill is filed, not seeking payment out of the assets of the testator who bequeathed the legacy, the whole of which has been paid to the Defendant, with the improper concurrence of Mr. Williams, but claiming the £1000 out of the estate of Mr. Williams the executor, and personally from H. E. Boates. It is true, that upon an examination of the facts, it may turn out that the Plaintiffs are not entitled to the relief they ask against the estate of Mr. Williams and against the Defendant Boates personally. If that should be the case, the suit will fail altogether, because the Plaintiffs do not by their bill ask any other relief. I must overrule the objection for want of parties. Let the costs be costs in the cause.

[547] WILLIAMS v. WILLIAMS. March 9, 1841.

A question arose as to the right of the parties under a Scotch settlement. The Court referred it to the Master to enquire as to its construction according to the law of Scotland. The Master made his report founded on the opinion of Scotch advocates, and the cause coming on, the Court acted thereon, and ordered accordingly.

Mr. Loftus Wigram, in support of the petition.

[547] STANHOPE v. STANHOPE. Nov. 17, 1840; March 9, 1841.

Under the Draining Act, where the tenant for life is an infant, the petition must be presented in the name of his guardian.

Form of reference under this Act (3 & 4 Vict. c. 55), and of the subsequent proceedings thereon.

Amount of the expenses of draining ordered to be paid out of a fund to which the infant tenant for life was absolutely entitled, in lieu of charging the lands.

This was a petition presented by an infant tenant for life for a reference under the Draining Act (3 & 4 Vict. c. 55).

Mr. Kindersley, in support of the petition.

Mr. L. Wigram, for the other parties.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale] was of opinion, that under this Act the petition ought to be presented in the name of the infant's guardian, and gave leave to amend the same accordingly.

This being the first application under the Act, the terms of the order of reference became the subject of [548] consideration. His Lordship penned the following form of order, which was afterwards delivered out to the registrar.

Refer it to the Master to "inquire and state to the Court, whether the Plaintiff is tenant for life of the lands in the petition mentioned to be called Reveley Park, according to the true intent and meaning of the Act of the third and fourth years of the reign of Her present Majesty, intituled 'An Act to enable the Owners of Settled Estates to Defray the Expenses of Draining the same by way of Mortgage;' and if the said Master shall find that the Plaintiff is such tenant for life, then he is to inquire and state to the Court, whether it would be for the benefit of the said lands, and proper and beneficial to all persons interested therein, to make, under the provisions of the said Act, any and what permanent improvement in the said lands, by draining the same with tiles, stones, or other durable materials in a permanent manner: and after the Master shall have made his report such further order shall be made as shall be just."

The Master reported, that the infant was now tenant for life of the lands proposed to be drained, according to the true intent and meaning of the Act; and that it would be for the benefit of the said lands, and proper and beneficial to all persons interested therein, that 250 acres should be permanently improved, under the provisions of the said Act, by draining the same with proper draining tiles in a permanent manner, at an expense not exceeding £5 per acre, or the sum of £1250 in the whole.

The matter coming before the Court on a petition to confirm the report, it appeared that there were large [549] accumulations of the rents to which the infant was absolutely entitled, and it was suggested that it would not be advisable to execute a mortgage or charge on the estate for the payment of the £1250, but would be more to the interest of the Petitioner, that the amount should be paid by the receiver out of the rents, placing the tenant for life in the situation of incumbrancer, so that his personal representatives, in case of his death, might have the benefit of the petition.

The Court confirmed the report, and gave liberty to the guardian to execute the improvements approved of by the Master; and it appearing to the Court to be beneficial to the infant Plaintiff, that the amount of such expense should in the first instance be advanced and paid by the receiver appointed in this cause, out of the rents and profits of the estates, the same was ordered. The order then proceeded as follows: "and when and in case it shall be alleged that any such improvement as aforesaid has been executed, it is ordered that the Master, on the application of the Petitioner, or the Plaintiff, if he shall then have attained the age of twenty-one years, do inquire and state to the Court, whether such improvement has been executed, and whether the annual value of the lands so drained has been increased by such draining, to an amount equal to £7 per cent. at the least on the sum so expended; and if the Master shall so find, he is to determine and recommend by what number of yearly instalments the sum so expended ought to be paid off, when and in case the same should be charged on the said lands; and after the Master shall have made his report, such further order shall be made as shall be just."

[550] FYLER v. FYLER. Feb. 19, 20, 27, March 1, 1841.

[S. C. 5 Jur. 187. See Harries v. Rees, 1867, 37 L. J. Ch. 107; Mara v. Brown, [1896], 1 Ch. 209.]

A person knowingly inducing trustees to lend trust money to his debtor on a security not warranted by the trusts, in order that when advanced such person may obtain thereout payment of his debt, is accountable to the cestui que trusts.

Solicitor knowingly procuring trustees to commit a breach of trust for his benefit, must be considered as a partaker in the breach of trust.

Trustees investing trust money on an unauthorized security, are responsible for any future loss traceable to that first error.

A trustee, who was not authorized to lend the trust money on leasehold security, applied to his solicitors to procure an investment for some trust money, so as to produce a larger income. The solicitors had a client who was considerably indebted to them, and who wanted to borrow money on leasehold security, and they proposed it to the trustee. The trustee personally took measures to ascertain the value and validity of the security, and thereupon advanced the money, which was paid to the solicitors and carried to the credit of their debtor's account. The solicitors acted on behalf of the borrower, and, to some extent, for the trustee, but another solicitor also acted for him and for one of the cestui que trusts in the matter. The solicitors had notice that the fund was trust money in which infants were interested, but had no knowledge of the trusts or of the limited powers of the trustees. The security turned out ample, but part of the trust funds were afterwards lost by being transferred to a similar security of the same party. The lending on leaseholds being a breach of trust, Held, that the solicitors were not liable to the cestui que trusts for the loss.

In the answer to a bill for relief in respect of a breach of trust, it was alleged that some of the cestui que trust had assented thereto. Held, that the parties sought to be charged were entitled to an enquiry.

Solicitors against whom charges of fraud had been made which were unsubstantiated, and against whom the bill was dismissed, held not entitled to their costs, on the ground, that by the position in which they had placed themselves, they had exposed themselves to an investigation which had not unreasonably been instituted.

This bill prayed for the restitution of certain trust funds, which, it was alleged, had been lost by a breach of trust, and it also prayed a declaration of the liability of the several Defendants to make good the same.

The trust had its origin in the year 1814, when the Defendant James C. Fyler, being disposed to make a provision for his father, his mother-in-law, and their children, by deed made between himself of the one part, and Thomas B. Fyler and W. R. Glazier of the other part, assigned to the latter a sum of £10,000 Navy 5 per cent. annuities (in the deed incorrectly stated [551] to have been that day transferred into their names), in trust to pay the dividends to his father, Samuel Fyler, for his life, and after his death to pay the dividends to his mother-in-law Mrs. Margaret Fyler for life, for the maintenance, &c., of herself and children; and after her death to pay the principal to all her children by Samuel Fyler as should be living at her decease. The deed contained no power to change the securities, or to appoint new trustees on the resignation of any trustee.

It appeared that the money was not, in fact, transferred into the names of the trustees at the date of the deed, but that at various times in the years 1819 and 1820, James C. Fyler transferred into the names of the two trustees several sums which ultimately consisted of £9,458, 4s. 6d. four per cent. annuities.

Samuel Fyler died in 1825.

After his death Mrs. Margaret Fyler and her son Thomas B. Fyler acting, as was alleged, on her behalf, were desirous that some better income should be made from the trust fund, by means of a change in the investment; and Thomas B. Fyler, the active trustee, applied by letter to Messrs. Blunt, Roy & Blunt, his solicitors, to obtain an investment of part of the trust fund so as to produce £5 per cent. Messrs. Blunt, Roy & Blunt happened to have a client of the name of Baxter, who was largely engaged in building speculations; they had extensive transactions with him in the way of their business, and he was at the time indebted to them in a sum of about £3000. Baxter was desirous of raising £6000 by way of mortgage, at £5 per cent. on a leasehold house in Park Lane, and Messrs. Blunt, Roy & Blunt proposed this security to Mr. Thomas B. Fyler; a correspondence took place between them, and [552] full explanations were given as to the nature of the security proposed. Mr. Thomas B. Fyler himself engaged a surveyor to value the property. In his correspondence he stated, he "was acting for minors on his own responsibility," and he ultimately agreed to advance the money on the security proposed. Glazier, however, refused to concur, and retransferred the trust fund into the name of James C. Fyler the settlor.

£6000, part of the trust money, was afterwards sold out of the bank, and lent to

Baxter on a mortgage of the leasehold premises in Park Lane, which was executed to Thomas B. Fyler and Dr. Reed a new trustee; the whole £6000 was paid over to Messrs. Blunt, Roy & Blunt, on behalf of Baxter, and was placed by them to the credit of his account. Messrs. Blunt, Roy & Blunt at the same time entered into a guarantee for payment of the ground rent of the house, and the interest on the mortgage "until the premises were under-let or sold."

Messrs. Blunt, Roy & Blunt, though aware that the money advanced was trust money, in which infants were interested, seemed to have had no knowledge of the extent of the power of the trustees over it.

In the transaction, Mr. Dimond a solicitor, was in some manner employed for the trustees, and for the cestui que trusts or some of them; the mortgage deed, though prepared by Messrs. Blunt, Roy & Blunt, was sent to him for his perusal, and was afterwards settled by an eminent conveyancer on behalf of the parties for whom Mr. Dimond acted. After this transaction had been completed, the mortgage deed was retained in the custody of Messrs. Blunt, Roy & Blunt on behalf of the trustees.

[553] In February 1827 the house was sold for nearly £10,000; the purchase money was consequently ample to provide for the mortgage; but it having been stipulated, that in case of a sale of that property, Baxter should retain the £6000 on giving security on other leasehold property, to the satisfaction of the mortgagees and their solicitors, the mortgage money was not paid off, but was retained by Baxter on another substituted security of leasehold property in Upper Grosvenor Street and Regent Street. The Regent Street house was afterwards sold, and a leasehold house in the Quadrant substituted, and on the sale of the latter, a sum of £1500 was received by the trustees.

In all these transactions, Messrs. Blunt, Roy & Blunt were concerned, but Thomas B. Fyler was active in seeing to the value of the properties. Baxter ultimately became bankrupt and died insolvent, and the mortgaged premises in Upper Grosvenor Street having proved deficient, a considerable part of the trust fund was lost.

This bill was filed by the children of Samuel Fyler by Margaret his wife, against the trustees, Mr. Munro, who had been newly appointed trustee, James C. Fyler, and Messrs. Blunt, Roy & Blunt, and it sought to make them responsible for the loss sustained.

The case as against the trustees, was for a breach of trust in improperly investing the funds contrary to the trusts of the deed; but as against Messrs. Blunt, Roy & Blunt the following charges were made by the bill, though not proved:—"That in the year 1825 Baxter was in great pecuniary difficulties, and that Messrs. Blunt, Roy & Blunt, who were not only his solicitors but in some manner connected with him in his building [554] speculations, or involved by his embarrassments, and had an interest in getting money for him to relieve him from his embarrassments, applied to Thomas B. Fyler, and proposed to him to lend Baxter a sum of £6000 out of the trust funds upon the security hereinafter mentioned; and they recommended such security to Thomas B. Fyler as being a sufficient security."

"That Messrs. Blunt, Roy & Blunt acted upon the occasion aforesaid, not only as the solicitors of Samuel Baxter, but also as the solicitors of Thomas B. Fyler, as such trustee as aforesaid; and they approved of and accepted the proposed security on his behalf; and at their instance and under their advice, the sum of £6000 was afterwards lent and advanced to Baxter as hereinafter mentioned, and a great part if not the whole of such sum was retained by them for their own use."

"That in 1825, and when Messrs. Blunt, Roy & Blunt procured the said Thomas B. Fyler to lend the sum of £6000, part of the trust funds to Baxter as aforesaid, Baxter, was in great pecuniary difficulties, and was largely indebted to them, the said Messrs. Blunt, Roy & Blunt; and Messrs. Blunt, Roy & Blunt were, to some extent concerned or interested with him in his building speculations, and were under pecuniary liabilities and engagements for him to a large amount; and that when he applied for and procured such loan to be made to him as aforesaid, they had a direct personal interest in procuring the same, and the whole of the said sum of £6000 was paid into their hands, in order that the same might be applied by them, partly in liquidation of the said Samuel Baxter's debt to them, and partly in or towards payment of debts, for which they or some of them were [555] personally liable, and had come under engagements to pay."

"That, under the circumstances, the aforesaid loan of the said sum of £6000, and the subsequent dealings with the said several securities were not only breaches of trust, in which Messrs. Blunt, Roy & Blunt were parties, but were direct frauds by them against the Plaintiffs and the trust estate; and that Messrs. Blunt, Roy & Blunt are therefore liable in equity to replace the said trust funds."

The bill prayed, as against Messrs. Blunt, Roy & Blunt, "that they might be declared liable, to the extent of the trust monies which came to their hands respectively, to make good the same, and that they might be decreed to do so accordingly."

The Plaintiffs failed in substantiating by evidence these grave charges of fraud, as will be found noticed in the judgment of the Court.

Mr. Kindersley and Mr. Teed, for the Plaintiffs, made no claim against James C. Fyler further than was necessary to charge the other parties. They directed their argument principally against Messrs. Blunt, Roy & Blunt, and contended, that the lending the money on leasehold security was unauthorised by the deed, and constituted a plain breach of trust against all parties concerned; that those who participated in the first fault, were liable for all that subsequently happened, unless they could shew that the fund had been brought back into a proper state of investment.

That Messrs. Blunt, Roy & Blunt, admitting that they knew that the money was trust money, had constructive, if not actual notice of the trusts of the settlement, and must therefore be taken to have known that a breach of trust was being committed. They received the trust property with knowledge, and became accountable as trustees.

[THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS. Your argument would lead to this, that if trust property were committed to a carrier or a messenger, he would become liable as a trustee if he knew that it was subject to a trust.] This case goes far beyond; for here Messrs. Blunt, Roy & Blunt, with knowledge, assist in a breach of trust, and receive the money in discharge of their own debt. The case is precisely similar to that of Wilson v. Moore (1 Myl. & K. 126), and Harvey v. Harvey, before Sir John Leach and Lord Cottenham, on appeal. They are not merely agents, but have, for their own interest, mixed themselves up in the breach of trust, and have therefore become principals.

That they were the solicitors of the trustees is plain from their acts, they prepared the mortgage deed, which was part of the duty of a mortgagee's solicitor.

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Evans, for the widow.

Mr. Tinney and Mr. Koe, for the representatives of Thomas B. Fyler.

Mr. Bethell and Mr. Heath, for Mr. Munro, a new trustee.

Mr. Girdlestone and Mr. Hall, for James C. Fyler.

Mr. Loftus Wigram, for Lawrence Fyler, one of the children.

[557] Mr. Turner and Mr. Campbell, for Messrs. Blunt, Roy & Blunt. The Plaintiff has wholly failed in making out as against Messrs. Blunt, Roy & Blunt, the case alleged against them by the bill. The proposal appears plainly from the correspondence to have originated from the Fylers, and not from Messrs. Blunt, Roy & Blunt. Throughout the proceedings Mr. Thomas B. Fyler appears to have been most active, and to have shewn the greatest care and caution in seeing to the validity and value of the security.

The case against the solicitors proceeds on the two grounds, of a breach of trust and a fraud having been committed by them; but unless fraud can be made out, there is no principle on which to charge them as trustees. There is no foundation whatever for the charge of fraud, £6000 were invested in property worth £10,000; the money was perfectly secure, and although the trustee, who acted with full knowledge, and, as he says, "on his own responsibility," committed a breach of trust, still there was no fraud, full value was given, and the £6000 when received became the property of Baxter. The case has no resemblance to that of Wilson v. Moore, in which agents, having notice, applied trust fund in payment of a private debt due to them from their principal, who was embarrassed in his circumstances; that was a case of fraud, and what the Court held was this that the Defendants could not retain a fund which they knew to belong to A. in payment of a debt due to them from B. There, no consideration at all was paid, but here full consideration was given for the trust money, and though technically a breach of trust as against the trustees, still there is no semblance of fraud.

If then, there was no fraud, Messrs. Blunt, Roy & Blunt, at the utmost, were mere agents, and as such [558] accountable to their principal only, and not to the cestui que trusts; Adams v. Fisher (2 Keen, 754; 3 Myl. & Cr. 526, 549), Mylor v. Fitzpatrick (6 Mad. 360). They had no notice of the trustees' powers or duties, and if they had, they could not, by mere notice, be converted into implied trustees. Nickolson v. Knowles (5 Mad. 47). In Keane v. Roberts (4 Mad. 356), Sir J. Leach speaking of the agents of trustees says, "If they had reason to believe that Thomas and Fennell (the trustees) were so misapplying the assets, it would be difficult to find a ground which would make them responsible, for paying to their principals the monies which had been placed in their hands for the purpose of being remitted to them: that would be to make every trustee accountable for his conduct in the trust to every agent whom he happened to employ, and would carry the principle of a constructive trust to an inconvenient, and indeed to an impracticable length."

In Davis v. Spurling (1 Russ. & Myl. 64), "An executor, who was employed by his co-executor as his agent to sell an estate, which, under the will of the testator the co-executor alone had power to sell, and who handed over the price of the estate to his co-executor, was held not accountable for the misapplication of that price by the co-executor, because he had no legal right to retain, although, by the will of the testator, the price of the estate when sold was to be considered as part of his personal estate." Sir J. Leach there said, "Colchester (the party selling), had no legal right to retain the price of Whimper Bradey's moiety of the estate; for it was in his hands not as executor, but simply as agent of John Bradey, who alone had the power to dispose of that moiety, and to receive the price of it."

[559] Messrs. Blunt, Roy & Blunt could not have filed a bill of interpleader. Crawshaw v. Thornton (2 Myl. & Cr. 1), or resist payment to Baxter.

There is no case in which a solicitor has been held liable, because with knowledge his client has committed a breach of trust; were it otherwise, it would become the duty of a solicitor to denounce his client whenever he determined to act contrary to the trusts. If it were held, that a person dealing with a trustee without notice of everything relating to the trust, and is bound to see that no breach has been committed therein, even bankers, agents, solicitors, clerks, or messengers when they have dealings with trustees would have the duty imposed on them, to see, in every case, to the due execution of a trust.

There was no loss on the first transaction, and whatever loss may have subsequently happened, arose from the trustees postponing the sale of the property, and from exchanging the securities at a time when it is not alleged that anything was done from Baxter to Messrs. Blunt, Roy & Blunt.

Any claim of the Plaintiffs is barred by the Statute of Limitations, which throws not a bar to a direct trust is a bar to a constructive trust; Beckford v. Beal (17 Ves. 87).

Mr. Kindersley, in reply.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale] (after stating the principal circumstances of the case). It is said by some of the parties in answer to this bill, that although these proceedings in respect of the trust money must be admitted to have been irregular, [560] because there was no authority at all to change the securities, yet it was done manifestly for the advantage of one of the cestui que trusts, and with the consent of some of the others; and if that were so—if all this has taken place with the consent of the parties now complaining, it certainly appears to me that they would not have any right to maintain this suit, for volenti non fit injuria. If they had authorized this course of dealing with their own fund, it would be in the highest degree unjust, to permit them to establish a claim against those who have acted under their authority. There is no evidence upon which I can properly act as to that matter; but I am clearly of opinion that there must be an inquiry whether the investments, or any, and which of them, took place with the consent of any of the parties, with liberty for the Master to state special circumstances.

But there are other persons sought to be charged, as to one of whom, namely, Monro, I conceive there is no doubt at all. The circumstances under which he came into this trust, are not such as appear to me to render him in any degree liable for the breaches of trust that have been committed. The other parties are Messrs. Blunt, Roy & Blunt, in respect of whom alone the argument of this day has been addressed to me. Messrs. Blunt, Roy & Blunt, at the date of the first of the transactions which is now brought into question, happened to be the solicitors of Mr. Thomas Bicliffe Fyler, who calls himself the acting trustee in this matter, and also the solicitors of Mr. Baxter, who desired to have this loan; and it is alleged, that their own personal interests were so involved in the transaction, that they must be considered to have acted not as solicitors and agents alone, but as persons, who, being solicitors and agents, took advantage of their [561] position, to acquire a benefit for themselves at the hazard, if not to the prejudice of the trust; and that, under those circumstances, the Court ought to impute to them the duty of seeing to the due application of this trust money; in other words, will impute to them the character of trustees. The argument, as it was first addressed to me, was certainly pushed to a greater extent than I have ever heard attempted with regard to charging persons with the duty of trustees. It has now been most properly reduced within narrower limits, and their liability turns upon the point which I have last adverted to—whether they can be considered as having so involved their own personal interests, in the matter in which they were concerned as agents, that this Court, in the exercise of its jurisdiction, ought to impute to them the character of trustees. I do not mean to decide it at this moment, because I think I ought to look at one or two cases before I come to a decision upon it; but, looking at the facts as far as they relate to these gentlemen, they stand thus:—Being such solicitors as I have mentioned, at the time when the first transaction took place, a large debt was due to them from Mr. Baxter. The sum which was raised, was received by them for him, carried to the general account between them, and applied therefore in immediate liquidation of the debt which was due to them from Mr. Baxter. So that there can scarcely be a doubt, that they had an immediate advantage from the completion of this transaction; but when it is said, that they got this advantage, by improperly inducing their client the trustee, knowingly to commit a breach of trust. Is that made out? Did they knowingly induce him to commit a breach of trust? They did not apply to him to do this done; on the contrary, he being desirous to effect this object—to change the security so as to procure a higher rate of interest, applied to them, in order that they might assist [562] him in finding a fit security for the purpose, and they, being applied to by him, did, in compliance with his request, look out for a security. Unfortunately they found that security from another client, and therefore got involved in that perplexity, which all solicitors get entangled in, when they are acting for persons who may have opposite interests. A gentleman of the name of Dimond was undoubtedly to have been consulted for the interest of some of this family. In that capacity he was consulted, or what advice he gave, does not very clearly appear to me. It does appear by the whole of the transactions, that Messrs. Blunt, Roy & Blunt, were acting as the solicitors of Thomas B. Fyler, by the preparation of the deeds, by the deeds being in their possession afterwards, and so on. The trust money, which was properly invested, was sold out, Mr. Roy being one of the persons named in the power of attorney for its sale; this fact has not been dwelt upon, but still it is in some respects an important circumstance to take notice of. It appears also that they received the £6000 for Mr. Baxter; Baxter was giving security which turned out to be ample, in exchange for this money, and the trustees, receiving ample security, pay the money to Mr. Roy as the agent, and on account of Baxter. When the trustees got the security, they made it subject to the trust, and the money which was paid over could scarcely then be considered trust money; it was intended to be given to Baxter for his own use, and was paid to him by the hands of Blunt, Roy & Blunt. I do not mean to state fully my opinion upon it, but if this be the state of the transaction, can the case be considered exactly like that of Wilson and Moore, where the agent of the trustee stood in the name of the trustee certain sums of money, which he afterwards, pursuant indeed to the order of the trustees, applied to a purpose contrary to the trust? Was this money, at the moment it was placed in the hands of Messrs. Roy & Blunt, to be considered as trust money? Must they be considered as involved with their client, the trustee, that the exchange of the security for the money cannot be considered as a complete substitution of one for the other, but as continuing to retain its character of trust money? I apprehend really that the whole case depends on this; because it must be admitted that this was the transaction by which all the future loss was occasioned. If this money had been allowed to remain in its original state of investment, no loss could have afterwards taken place, by the diminution of the value of the house in Upper Grosvenor Street; but it was that transaction which led to all the rest. The Plaintiffs in this cause are not content to take up the transaction at the time when the trust money stood in that sufficient and secure investment, partly in stock and partly on the mortgage upon an estate of sufficient value; but professing themselves to be most exceedingly reluctant to do anything by which they may charge Mr. James C. Fyler their benefactor; say in substance, we would rather attack him, however ungraciously, than leave Messrs. Blunt, Roy & Blunt unassailed. If they have a right to charge Mr. James C. Fyler of course they must have the benefit of it; and whatever one may think of the feelings by which persons are actuated in such a case, there is an undoubted necessity to give effect to any rightful claim which they make. Cases which are very painful are not unfrequent in this Court; we find a married woman throwing herself at the feet of the trustee, begging and entreating him to advance a sum of money out of the trust fund to save her husband and her family from utter and entire ruin, and making out a most plausible case for that purpose; his compassionate feelings are worked upon; he raises and ad-[564]vances the money; the object for which it was given entirely fails; the husband becomes bankrupt; and in a few months afterwards the very same woman who induced the trustee to do this, files a bill in a Court of Equity to compel him to make good that loss to the trust. These are cases which happen, they shock everybody's feelings at the time, but it is necessary that relief should be given in such cases: for if relief were not given, and if such rights were not strictly maintained, no such thing as a trust would ever be preserved. The hardship, therefore, of individual cases must not be taken into consideration, and if these parties think fit to insist on their strict rights, they are entitled to have them.

I will look into the authorities which have been cited, and mention this case again but this I must say, that if I should hold that Blunt, Roy & Blunt have made themselves liable, they are entitled, just as much as any other party, to the benefit of an inquiry, whether this was done with the consent of the cestui que trusts.

March 1. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS: In this bill it is alleged, that Messrs. Blunt, Roy & Blunt, the solicitors of Thomas Bilcliffe Fyler, and also of Samuel Baxter, being creditors of Mr. Baxter to a large amount, and being connected with him in his building speculations, or involved by his embarrassments, and liable for the payment of debts which he owed to other persons, did, for the purpose of procuring payment of the debt due to themselves, and relieving themselves from their liabilities to other persons for Baxter, knowingly prevailed upon Thomas Bilcliffe Fyler, who was a trustee for the Plaintiffs, to violate his trust, and lend £6000 trust money to Baxter, in order that they, as Baxter's agents, [565] might receive the amount, and apply the same for their own benefit, in satisfaction of the debts due to themselves, and for which they were liable to other persons. And it is charged, that this loan and the subsequent dealings with the money were not only breaches of trust to which Blunt, Roy & Blunt were parties, but were direct frauds by them against the persons entitled to the trust money. If the facts were, as alleged, I conceive that the Plaintiffs would be entitled to the relief which they pray; but it appears to me, that in the commencement of the transaction, Blunt, Roy & Blunt had no knowledge of the trusts, or of the power of the trustees, and that although they were the solicitors of Thomas Bilcliffe Fyler the trustee, and at his request suggested the proposed security, yet that they neither advised him as to his powers under the trust deed, nor suggested to him the propriety or expediency of the loan; and that the proposed security was suggested by them only in consequence of Thomas Bilcliffe Fyler's application to them. In the progress of the treaty, Blunt, Roy & Blunt became informed that the money intended to be lent was trust money, in which infants were interested (letter of 18th September 1825), and it appears that Mr. Dimond, or the firm of Baker & Dimond, was in some manner employed for the trustees, and cestui que trusts, or some of them. Mr. Roy, in the letter of the 19th October 1825, which was read in evidence, after representing the wants of Baxter, says, "Your surveyor has reported on the value, and we have explained to Mr. Dimond the exact nature of the security, which is simply a lease from Lord Grosvenor; any other circumstances attending it are particularly the subjects of consideration for you and Mr. Dimond."

but you should decide one way or other, as it is a serious inconvenience to Mr. Baxter [566] that the business should continue open." It further appears by the letter of the 20th October that the power of attorney, under which it was intended to transfer the stock, was with Mr. Dimond; and from the whole transaction it must, I think, be collected that the trustee did not rely on Blunt, Roy & Blunt alone. The loan was proposed by the trustee; on his application the particular security was proposed by Blunt, Roy & Blunt; the title was explained to Mr. Dimond; the value was ascertained by a surveyor employed by Mr. Fyler himself; Blunt, Roy & Blunt informed Mr. Fyler that other circumstances attending the transaction were particularly subjects of consideration for himself and Mr. Dimond; and the drafts of the deed and bond, though prepared by Blunt, Roy & Blunt, were sent by them to Baker & Dimond for their perusal and approbation, on the behalf (as it is expressly stated in a part of the answer of Blunt, Roy & Blunt which has been read against them as evidence) of Margaret Fyler and the trustees; and it seems to have been by the advice of Mr. Brodie, obtained by Messrs. Baker & Dimond, that a guarantee was demanded for payment of the ground rent of the house intended to be mortgaged, and of the interest of the mortgage money so long as the house should continue untenanted and unsold. The required guarantee was given by Blunt, Roy & Blunt, and the transaction being completed on the 29th of October 1825, Blunt, Roy & Blunt kept the securities including their own guarantee in their possession for the trustees.

To some extent, therefore, though not to the extent and in the manner alleged, Blunt, Roy & Blunt, notwithstanding the employment of Dimond, or Baker & Dimond were acting as solicitors for the trustees. They were at the same time creditors of Baxter to the amount [567] of nearly £3000, they personally gave the guarantee which was required for completing the security; they received the money and carried it to the credit of Baxter's account with them; and at a subsequent period the account between themselves and Baxter was in favour of Baxter.

But the allegations in the bill that Blunt, Roy & Blunt were connected with Baxter in his building speculations and embarrassments, and that they were liable for debts owing by Baxter to other persons, are wholly unsupported by evidence; and although it appears to me probable that before the transaction was concluded, Blunt, Roy & Blunt had the means of knowing, and possibly did know, that the leasehold security was not authorised by the trust, yet the fact is not proved to have been so, and they do not appear to have advised the trustee on the subject, and they had reason to think that in that matter he acted either on his own opinion or on other advice.

There can be no doubt, but that the transaction on the part of the Fylers, though erroneous, was bona fide intended to be beneficial to Mrs. Fyler, and not prejudicial to her children, but being unauthorised and a subsequent loss (which could not have occurred but for the first deviation from the trust) having happened, the principals may be liable. The transaction was conducted by Blunt, Roy & Blunt, and the charge against them is principally supported by inferences deduced from her interest, and leading, it is said, to the conclusion that they prevailed on the trustee, or being his solicitors permitted him to commit a breach of trust for their benefit, under semblance of the transaction being a loan to Baxter.

But a charge of this nature should be manifest from the transaction itself, and should be distinctly proved; [568] their knowledge of the limited powers of the trustees is not proved, and the facts established do not warrant the inferences drawn from them. The security was of ample value, no mere semblance, but a real and valuable security. Baxter, or Blunt, Roy & Blunt, by means of such security could have had no difficulty in procuring the loan elsewhere; the security in the hands of the trustees afforded them the means of recovering the money; and the facts admitted as to the state of the account between Blunt, Roy & Blunt and Baxter, so far from necessarily leading to the conclusion desired by the Plaintiffs, are consistent with the supposition, that the whole amount of the mortgage money was applied in payments to other persons pursuant to the orders of Baxter. How the case really stood does not appear, but the Plaintiffs who have had the means of investigating the account of the dealings between Baxter and Blunt, Roy & Blunt, and have produced no evidence on the subject, are not entitled to presume all the material facts to be such as will support their charge.

In the transaction of 1825 the breach of trust consisted, not in the misapplication of the money given as a consideration for the mortgage, but in the acceptance of a security not authorised by the trust.

The trustees having, without authority, procured and accepted in lieu of so much stock, an unauthorised but ample security for so much money, became responsible for any future loss traceable to that first error. Upon consideration it appears to me, that solicitors who knowingly procured this to be done for their own benefit, ought to be considered as partakers in the breach of trust; but the case should be proved, and not founded on uncertain and perhaps altogether untrue inferences.

[569] Blunt Roy, & Blunt, by the position in which they placed themselves in relation to the borrower and lender of this trust money, have exposed themselves to this investigation, which I own does not appear to me to have been unreasonably instituted; but I think that the charge against them is not established; and that they are not answerable to the Plaintiffs for the breach of trust which was committed in 1825, or for the unauthorised investment of the trust money which was then made. The ample security which was taken in 1825 was, in 1827, exchanged for other security, part of which ultimately proved to be deficient, and occasioned the loss which has occurred. Blunt, Roy & Blunt were also employed in this transaction, by means of which their guarantee ceased, and this interest has again, I think not unreasonably, subjected their conduct to investigation; but in this case also, Mr Thomas Bilcliffe Fyler took on himself the sole care and responsibility of ascertaining the value of the security; and thinking that Blunt, Roy & Blunt are not answerable for the consequences of the unauthorised investment in 1825, and seeing nothing wherewith to charge them in the transaction of 1827 taken by himself, it does not appear to me that they are chargeable for the loss occasioned by the deterioration of the house in Upper Grosvenor Street.

Though the direct allegations of fraud against Blunt, Roy & Blunt are unfounded, yet seeing that, by involving their own personal interests in the transactions, they have rendered an investigation into their conduct not unreasonable; I must, in dismissing the bill against them, do so without costs.

As to Mrs. Fyler, an inquiry must be directed as to her concurrence.

[570] COLVILLE v. MIDDLETON. Dec. 18, 19, 21, 24, 1840.

A testator devised his estate X. to trustees, for sale, for payment of his debts and legacies, in exoneration of his personal estate; and after reciting that he became entitled on his marriage to a sum of £7442 of which he had received £2442, and the £5000 remained due, he bequeathed £2442 to be paid out of the produce of the estate X., and the sum of £5000 when and if the same should be received or got in, but not otherwise, to A., B., C. and D. equally; and in case the £5000 should be received by him in his lifetime, he directed the same to be raised out of the estate X. The testator received the £5000. Held, that the legacy was demonstrative, and that it was a charge upon the general personal estate as well as on the estate X.

Personal estate held, upon the context of a will, not exonerated from the payment of debts and legacies; where a real estate devised for the payment thereof, in exoneration of the personal estate, proved to be insufficient.

The testator, Nathaniel Lee Acton, being possessed of several estates, distinguished by the names of the Claydon estate, the Bamford estate, and the Baylham estate, his will dated in 1823, devised his Claydon estate to trustees to sell the same, or so part thereof, as would, in exoneration of his personal estate, raise money sufficient to pay the mortgages thereon, and the legacies payable under his father's will, and the interest thereon, and all his debts due on simple contract, and the several legacies and sums by his said will given and directed to be paid, not charged upon any of his said real estates; together with such costs and charges as should be necessarily incurred by his said trustees and his executors, by reason of or in any manner incident to the sale, or the execution and performance of his will and the trusts thereof; and should apply the same in payment thereof accordingly; and the residue was to be laid out in land, to be settled to the uses declared concerning his manor of Baylham.

The testator also devised his Bamford estate, subject to the payment of the mortgages thereon, to trustees for 500 years, for payment of his bonds not connected with any mortgage or mortgages; with remainder to Sir Philip Broke and issue, in strict settlement.

[571] The testator then devised the Baylham estate to Sir William Middleton for life, with remainders in strict settlement; and after reciting that by the settlement made previous to his marriage, he became entitled to the sum of £7442, being the residue of the portion or fortune of Susannah, his first wife, of which sum of £7442 he had then received only the sum of £2442, and that the remaining sum of £5000 was still due to him, for which he received interest, the said testator N. Lee thereby gave and bequeathed the sum of £2442 to be paid by and out of the monies to arise by the sale of his estates devised to be sold as aforesaid, and also the sum of £5000 when and if the same should be received and got in, but not otherwise, to Hannah Elizabeth Gillman, Emily Gillman, and Francis Gillman, equally to be divided between them, share and share alike; and in case the said sum of £5000 or any part thereof should be received by him the said testator in his lifetime, then he directed that the same or so much thereof as should be so received, should be raised and paid out of the monies to arise by the sale of his real estates devised to be sold as aforesaid. He then gave several general and specific legacies; and after directing the sale of certain specified chattels, he devised the residue of his real estate and all the residue of his personal estate and effects, of what nature or kind soever, which he should die possessed of, or entitled to, or have any power to dispose of, and also the monies lastly thereinbefore mentioned, and which should remain after payment of his funeral and testamentary expenses, and all charges incident thereto, as to one moiety in trust for Lady Middleton, and as to the other moiety in trust for Caroline Middleton.

By a codicil he devised his Crowfield and other estates to trustees, in fee in trust to sell and to pay all [572] such principal monies and interest as he might happen to be due at the time of his decease, either upon mortgage bond, or simple contract; also such charges as should be then payable under his said late father's will, with any interest due or to accrue due for the same, and the several legacies and sums in and under the said testator's will given and directed to be paid, and not charged upon any of his real estates, together with such costs and charges as should be necessarily incurred; it being his will and desire, that his own hereditary estates and property should, if in his power, be left unincumbered, and that, unless it should be necessary, any part of the said hereditaments, which in and by the first thereinbefore recited was in his said will, or those comprised in the said term of 500 years respectively, should be sold or mortgaged by his said trustees.

The testator died in 1836, having in his lifetime received the £5000 referred to in his will, as being due to him under his marriage settlement.

The personal estate, and the produce of the sale of the real estate charged thereon, were together insufficient for the payment of the debts and legacies of the testator.

The first question was, whether the personal estate had been exonerated, altogether, from payment of the debts and legacies; and, secondly, whether the sums of £2442 and £5000 were specific or demonstrative legacies; in other words, whether they were payable only out of the produce of the Claydon estate, or were also a charge on the personal estate.

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Wood, for the Plaintiffs the trustees, who were also named as legatees, cited [573] Hancox v. Abbey (11 Ves. 179), Aldrich v. Cooper (18 Ves. 381), Page v. Leapingwell (18 Ves. 463), Gwynne v. Edwards (2 Russ. 289, n.), and v. Greene (4 Mad. 148).

Mr. C. P. Cooper and Mr. Blunt, for Lady Middleton the residuary legatee, contended that the personal estate was exempted as against everyone, except creditors; and that the testator had charged the Claydon estate with the costs, charges, and expenses of administration, which would otherwise have fallen on the personal estate; and that this and other circumstances shewed that it was the testator's intention that the residuary legatees should take the personal estate, exonerated from the payment of the debts and legacies, and charged only with the "funeral and testamentary expenses, and all charges incidental thereto;" Bootle v. Blundell (1 Mer. 193), Silk v. Prims (1 Dick. 384, and 1 B. C. C. 138, n.), Morrow v. Bush (1 Cox, 185), Williams v. The Bishop of Landaff (Ib. 254).

Mr. Kindersley and Mr. James Parker, for Sir W. Middleton, the devisee of the Baylham estate, contended that the bond debts unconnected with mortgages were payable wholly out of the 500 years' term; so as to leave the personal estate applicable to the payment of the other debts not otherwise provided for; that the mortgage debts on the Claydon and Baylham estates, by the express terms of the will ought to be wholly paid out of the former; that the mortgage debts on the Claydon estate, but not those on the Bamford estate, ought to be paid out of the personal estate, both as against the residuary legatees, notwithstanding the bequest was after payment of funeral and testamentary expenses (Ram on Assets, 44), and as [574] against the legatees unsatisfied by the estates devised for sale; and lastly, that the legacy to the Gillmans was exclusively charged on the Claydon estate.

Mr. Tinney and Mr. Romilly, for Sir Philip Broke and another, the devisees of the Bamford estate, contended that the bonds and mortgages were primarily chargeable on the personal estate, and then on the real estate; and that there ought to be a contribution as between the Claydon and Baylham estates, in those cases in which both estates were included in one mortgage security. They cited Noel v. Lord Henley (Dan. Rep. 211).

Mr. Girdlestone and Mr. Shadwell, for the legatees of the £7442, contended that although the legacy was directed to be paid out of the real estates devised to be sold, still it was not less payable out of the general personal estate, it being in the nature of a demonstrative and not of a specific legacy. They cited Roberts v. Pocock (4 Ves. 150), Smith v. Fitzgerald (3 Ves. & B. 2), Mann v. Copland (2 Madd. 223), Fowler v. Willoughby (2 S. & S. 354), Willow v. Rhodes (2 Russ. 452), M'Leland v. Shaw (2 Sch. & Lef. 538), Savile v. Blacket (1 P. Wms. 775).

Mr. Coleridge, for a trustee.

Mr. Pemberton, in reply.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS was of opinion, that the monies, arising from the sale of the testator's real estate devised in trust for sale, were primarily applicable to the payment of the simple contract debts and legacies, and that the personal estate was then liable to make [575] good the deficiency; and he reserved his judgment on the other point.

Dec. 24. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. I have read over the will in this case, and the authorities cited, and I think that these two legacies are demonstrative and not specific. [His Lordship referred to the terms of the bequest and proceeded.] If the expressions of the testator had been, "I hereby give this sum to these persons," it is conceded that the bequests would have been demonstrative, but it is alleged that the particular words which he has used have a different effect. The case of The Attorney-General v. Parkin (Ambler, 566) was much stronger; there, the testator enumerated mortgages, bonds, and notes due to him, and gave, out of the interest, an annuity to A. for life, and after her death directed the securities to be vested in trustees for charitable uses. Some of the securities were paid off, and new securities taken after the will, the bequest was held to be demonstrative and not specific.

In Cartwright v. Cartwright (2 Bro. C. C. 114) the bequest was, "I give £1400 for which I have sold my estate this day," &c. The testator afterwards received the whole money, paid it to his banker, and drew out of his hands £1100 of that money. Lord Bathurst held this to be a legacy of quantity, and that the receiving was no ademption on the authority of The Attorney-General v. Parkin; though Lord Thurlow observed that it was questionable, whether the case of The Attorney-General v. Parkin supported the decision in Cartwright v. Cartwright, yet he did not state the decision to be wrong.

[576] There are other circumstances in this case which fortify the conclusion which I have come, namely, that this is a demonstrative legacy, and is to be paid in the same manner as the other legacies.

[576] SALT v. CHATAWAY. March 5, 6, 1841.

A testator devised and bequeathed his real and personal estate, in trust to sell, and constituted a mixed and blended fund. He thereout gave J. B. £100 and one-eighteenth of the residue, and he gave the remaining portions of the residue to other persons. J. B. died in the testator's lifetime. Held, that the next of kin and heir were entitled to their proportionate part of the lapsed share of the residue, and that the legacy of £100 fell into the residue and passed by the gift thereof.

The testator Thomas Salt, by his will dated in 1831, having appointed three executors, devised and bequeathed to them all his real and personal estate, "subject to the payment thereof of his just debts, funeral and testamentary expences" upon trust, "as soon after his decease as they should think fit," to sell and receive the purchase-money for the same estates, and all money that might be owing to him at his decease; "and thereout and out of the ready money he might die possessed off," to pay certain legacies, and amongst others to "pay unto his grandson John Blaydon £100, when he should attain the age of twenty-one years," and then to "divide all the residue of the monies to arise as aforesaid into three equal parts," and after paying a certain legacy, to place out or continue at interest the remainder of such one-third share on security, until his six grandchildren, John Blaydon and five others named, should respectively attain the age of twenty-one years, "and when and as each of them should attain his or her age of twenty-one years, should pay him or her an equal part hereof;" the testator then proceeded to dispose of the remaining two-thirds of the residue.

John Blaydon died in the testator's lifetime, an infant, and unmarried, and the principal question was, what [577] was to become of the £100 legacy, and the one-eighteenth of the residue intended for him, but which had lapsed by his death in the testator's lifetime.

Mr. Spence and Mr. Parker, for the Plaintiffs.

Mr. Tillotson, Mr. Tennant, and Mr. T. Parker, jun., for several persons being the next of kin.

Mr. Whitmarsh, for the heir at law.

Mr. Lewis, for Anthony Salt.

Mr. Treslove, for the five brothers and sisters of John Blaydon.

Ackroyd v. Smithson (1 Bro. C. C. 503), Durour v. Motteux (1 Ves. sen. 320), Roberts v. Walker (1 Russ. & Myl. 752), Kennell v. Abbott (4 Ves. 802), Green v. Jackson (Russ. 35, and 2 R. & Myl. 238), were cited. And see Stocker v. Harbin, 3 Nev. 479.

March 6. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. The testator in this case, having appointed certain persons to be executors, devised and bequeathed to them all his real and personal estates (subject to the payment of his funeral and testamentary expences and debts), on trust to sell and convert the whole into money; and having constituted a mixed and blended fund, consisting partly of personal estate and partly of the produce of real estate, he thereout gave certain legacies, and then disposed of the residue. He gave to John Blaydon a pecuniary legacy of £100, and an equal sixth part of one-third share of the residue.

[578] John Blaydon having died in his lifetime, the intentions of the testator, as to him, were disappointed. The gifts to him lapsed, and with respect to the share of the residue, I am of opinion that the heir at law and next of kin are entitled to it, in shares proportioned to the respective amounts of the testator's real and personal estate.

The real estate is by the will directed to be converted into money, i.e., into personal estate, for the purposes of the will; the testator thereby determined the quality of the property which the legatees were to take; but he has expressed no intention to convert it for any purposes, other than those mentioned in the will; and to the extent to which those expressed purposes have failed; that is, as to any part of the property in respect of which no intention of the testator is expressed, the law is to determine to whom it belongs ; and the two sorts of estate being blended, each contributing, in proportion, to fulfil the purposes which can be accomplished, the share of residue which has lapsed must be deemed to consist of proportionate parts of the two sorts of estate ; and that being so, the proportion of the lapsed share of residue which consists of the produce of real estate, having been directed to be converted for a purpose which is disappointed, belongs to the heir.

It is not easy to reconcile all the cases which are to be found in the books on these subjects ; and the question whether the lapsed pecuniary legacy passes by the gift of the residue, or ought to be considered as undisposed of, appears to me to be attended with more doubt than the other ; but considering, however, that the conversion of the real estate must be deemed to have been made for all the purposes of the will ; that, besides the [579] intention to give a legacy of £100 to John Blaydon, there was also an intention to dispose of the residue after payment of the legacies ; that the testator had determined the qualities of the property which his legatees were to take ; and that the gift of residue is made in terms to give the residuary legatees of personal estate the benefit of lapsed legacies—it appears to me that the proper course is to follow the decisions of Durour v. Motteux (1 Ves. sen. 320 ; 1 Sim. & St. 292), and Green v. Jackson (5 Russ. 35, and 2 Russ. & Myl. 238), and in conformity with those cases, I am of opinion that the lapsed legacy of £100 must be held to have fallen into the residue, and to have passed by the gift of the residue.

[579] JEW v. WOOD. March 17, 19, 1841.

Upon the death of a landlord, the tenant, in ignorance of the rights of the parties, attorned and paid rent to A., who claimed as devisee. The right of A. to the property was afterwards disputed by B., the heir. Held, that the tenant might maintain a bill of interpleader against A. and B.

This was a bill of interpleader filed by a tenant against the alleged devisees and co-heirs of his deceased landlord, under the following circumstances. The Plaintiff, Mr. Jew, was the tenant from year to year under James Wood, of a freehold house in Gloucester. James Wood died in April 1836, leaving certain testamentary papers, under which the Defendant, Sir M. Wood and the other executors therein named, claimed to be entitled to his real estate.

Immediately after the testator's death, the executors represented to the Plaintiff that they were entitled to the estate under the alleged will ; and the Plaintiff, believing such representation, attorned to the Defendants, the executors, and paid his rent to them down to [580] September 1837, the last payment being made in February 1838. In the meantime, the validity of the testamentary papers being impugned, a suit was instituted in the Ecclesiastical Court, which proceeded until the month of February 1839, when judgment was delivered against the propounded papers, and the title of the executors, as regarded the personal estate, was thereby displaced. (Some of the facts are stated in 2 Beavan, 289, and ante, p. 504 ; and see 2 Moore, P. C. C. 355.)

In March 1839 the alleged co-heirs gave notice to the Plaintiff not to pay his rent to any other person than to the co-heirs or their agent ; and in August 1839 the Defendant, Sir M. Wood, and the other alleged devisees gave a counter notice to the Plaintiff.

On the 15th of June 1840 the Defendant, Sir M. Wood, levied on the Plaintiff's goods for the rent in arrear ; the Plaintiff replevied, and on the 19th of December 1840 declared in an action of replevin ; on the 17th of December the Defendant Wood avowed, &c., and on the 27th of January 1841 the Plaintiff pleaded non tenuit, and on the 3d of February 1841 issue was joined and notice of trial given.

On the 9th of March the Plaintiff filed this bill of interpleader against the alleged heirs and devisees ; and upon bringing his rent into Court and on making the usual affidavit, the Plaintiff obtained an injunction.

The Defendant Wood, having filed his answer, now moved to dissolve the injunction.

Mr. Pemberton, Mr. G. Turner, and Mr. Walker, for Sir M. Wood, argued, first, that the Plaintiff had by his [581] delay disentitled himself to relief; secondly, that the Plaintiff was colluding with the co-heirs for the purpose of turning the devisees out of possession; and thirdly, that this was not a proper case for interpleader, for the settled rule was, that a tenant could not dispute his landlord's title, and that the tenant, against whom the devisees had a personal equity by reason of his attornment, did not stand in the situation of a party indifferent to the claims of the Defendants whom he called upon to interplead; and that, therefore, according to the decision of Crambly v. Thornlon (7 Sim. 391, and 2 Myl. & Cr. 1), the Plaintiff had no right to maintain a bill of interpleader. They cited on the point that a tenant could not dispute his landlord's title, Hall v. Butler (10 Ad. & E. 204); and that a tenant could not maintain a bill of interpleader against his landlord and a person claiming adversely, Dungey v. Angove (2 Ves. jun. 304), Smith v. Target (2 Anst. 529), Johnson v. Atkinson (3 Anst. 798).

Sir F. Pollock, and Mr. S. Sharpe, for the co-heirs, were indifferent as to what might be done on the present motion, provided the rights of the co-heirs to recover the rents or mesne profits were not prejudiced. They objected, however, to try their title in an action of replevy, as it would bind nobody, and would extend only to the small part of the real estate of James Wood occupied by the Plaintiff.

Mr. Kindersley and Mr. Chapman Barber, for the Plaintiff, proposed that the rent should be paid over to the devisees, unless the heirs would undertake to defend the action, Stevenson v. Anderson (2 Ves. & B. 407), or that the [582] matter should be put in a train of investigation, as in Townley v. Deare (3 Beavan, 213).

They contended, that there had been no improper delay, and that it was no objection that the bill had been filed on the eve of trial, Vicary v. Widger (1 Sim. 15); that there was no collusion between the Plaintiff and the co-heirs, although they employed the same solicitor.

On the third point they argued, that the rule that a tenant could not make his landlord interplead, did not apply to a case in which the difficulties arose out of the act of the landlord, as in the present case, Clarke v. Byne (13 Ves. 383); and that although, by the general rule, a tenant could not dispute his landlord's title, yet that he might dispute the title of a party to whom he had attorned in ignorance that his title was in dispute, Gregory v. Doidge (3 Bing. 474), Gravenor v. Woodhouse (1 Bing. 38); or where the tenant had not originally received possession from such person, Beggs v. Pitcher (6 Taunt. 202), Cornish v. Searell (8 B. & Cr. 471).

Mr. Pemberton, in reply.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS reserved his judgment.

March 19. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. In this case the Plaintiff is tenant from year to year of a portion of the estates of the late James Wood. His [583] tenancy began in the year 1831. The landlord died in April 1836, leaving a will, the validity of which is in dispute; so that it is not now known, whether he died testate or intestate. The rent which is due from the Plaintiff, and which he admits to be due, is now claimed both by the devisees under the alleged will and by the co-heirs under the alleged intestacy. The devisees have levied distresses, and the co-heirs have appeared and declared their intention to hold the Plaintiff answerable to them; and the rent reserved by the lease from James Wood being in demand from both parties, and the right to the land (in which the Plaintiff has no interest) being the only subject of contention, the case is a proper case for interpleader, unless there be some special circumstances to make it otherwise; and the Plaintiff is entitled to relief, if he be not precluded by some act or omission of his own.

It has been argued, that the Plaintiff is not entitled to relief, because of his delay in filing the bill after he had notice of the conflicting claims, and because of his attempts to defend himself at law, by his action of replevin; and still more, because of his alleged collusion with the Defendants, the co-heirs, to whose purposes, it is argued, he has lent himself in these proceedings.

It does not appear to me that there has been any improper delay; and though I had some hesitation at first, I think, that the defence set up at law ought not to preclude the Plaintiff from relief in this Court. I have felt more difficulty as to the supposed connection between the Plaintiff and the co-heirs.

It seems that the expediency of instituting this suit was suggested to the Plaintiff by the solicitor of Wilkins, the tenant of another portion of the lands in dispute between the devisees and the co-heirs of James Wood, [584] who had filed a bill for the like purpose, and obtained an injunction. The solicitor of Wilkins, being the attorney of the co-heirs in actions of ejectment brought by them to recover the lands in question, and the effect of the interpleader being, if successful, such as to answer an alleged purpose of the co-heirs, it is said, that some connection at least, if not collusion, must necessarily be inferred from the conduct which is pursued.

The devisees naturally desire to avoid anything which may bear the appearance of their being turned out of possession; and it is their avowed object to procure, as speedily as possible, an examination in open Court of the witnesses who are to prove, as they suppose, the validity of the will; and not being able to force on a trial of the ejectment, in which they do not deny the title would be better proved, they insist upon their right, and allege it to be an important object to them to proceed upon the avoweries in the Plaintiff's action of replevin; and they impute to the co-heirs a desire to turn them out of possession, and to postpone the examination of the same witnesses in open Court, till some proceedings elsewhere have been brought to a conclusion.

The co-heirs do not deny their intention to postpone the trial of the ejectment, but they assign a totally different motive; and if it is true that their only object is such as is stated, it does not appear to me to be unreasonable.

Upon these points I have no means of forming any opinion; the circumstances are such as, of themselves, to lead to a conjecture that the Plaintiffs may be aiding the purpose of the co-heirs; but I think that the affidavits are such as to make it impossible for me to come to that conclusion.

[585] The continuance of the injunction, therefore, depends on the question, whether this is a proper case of interpleader.

The special circumstances relied upon, are those which tend to shew, that after the death of James Wood the Plaintiff attorned to, and commenced a new holding under the devisees; and it is argued, that however doubtful it may be, whether, under the circumstances, a new holding commenced or not, yet that it is a question raised upon a case subsisting between the Plaintiff and the devisees, independent of the question of title subsisting between the devisees and the co-heirs, and is to be determined on the Plaintiff's behalf by the establishment of the case for himself against the devisees; and that the mere existence of such a question, precludes the Plaintiff from the right to bring a bill of interpleader.

I cannot, however, think that the mere suggestion of a question between the Plaintiff and one of the Defendants to a bill of interpleader is a sufficient bar to any relief being given by the bill.

It is evident in this case that the question of title between the devisees and co-heirs is the only substantial, if not the only existing question between those parties. The answer, though it states the transactions said to amount to an attornment, does not insist on them as affording a distinct subject of contest with the Plaintiff. In argument, indeed, the point has been strenuously brought forward; but, under such circumstances, I consider it to be my duty to look at the facts out of which the question arises, for the purpose of considering whether there is such a question to be tried, as will preclude the Plaintiff from seeking the relief he now asks for.

[586] In the case of Clarke v. Byne (13 Ves. 383) an attornment was relied on as disentitling the Plaintiff to maintain a bill of interpleader, but the demurrer was overruled; and being of opinion that the attornment in this case, if such it were, could not give to the devisees against the Plaintiff any claim or title independently of that which they claimed as devisees, it does not appear to me that there is any fact to be tried any question but that of the title between the devisees and the co-heirs; and, thinking this a proper case of interpleader, I must refuse to discharge the order for the injunction. (Affirmed, 1 Craig & Ph. 185.)

NOTE.—The cause was heard by Sir J. L. Knight Bruce, on the 17th of March 1842, when the injunction was continued: the Plaintiff was ordered to pay his rent into Court, and was awarded his costs of suit out of the fund in Court. The other costs were reserved.

[587] ELLIS v. MAXWELL. March 19, 21, 26, 1841.

[S. C. 10 L. J. Ch. 266; 12 Beav. 104. See Weatherall v. Thornburgh, 1878, 8 Ch. D. 271.]

A party, whose interest in a fund had not vested, Held, under the terms of a power in a will, entitled to maintenance, even after attaining twenty-one.

The Thellusson Act (39 & 40 G. 3, c. 98), does not permit accumulation during a minority, and any time to elapse between the death of the testator and the commencement of the minority, or in favour of any person who would not, for the time being, if of full age, be entitled to the annual produce of the fund.

A testator directed the accumulation of the whole of his personal estate for the benefit of his grandchildren; and he gave to his wife "anything which he might not have sufficiently disposed of." Held, that the accumulations of the fund, which were void under the Thellusson Act, belonged to the widow, notwithstanding the grandchildren took vested interests.

A testator devised his freeholds to pay certain annuities, and accumulate the surplus rents so as to become part of his personal estate: and, subject to the charges, to the use of the first and other sons of his son A. in tail, with remainder to his daughter B. for life, with remainder to her first and other sons in tail, &c.; and he directed that no person should, under the limitations, become entitled in possession while any antecedent limitation remained in contingency. And he gave his personal estate to the children of A. and B., "except the eldest son," to be transferred to all his younger grandchildren, equally to be divided between them as and when the sons attained twenty-one, and the daughters attained that age or married, it being his will that each of their several shares and interests should become vested at that age, or the previous marriage of daughters, though such shares should not become payable or transmissible till after the demise of both his son and daughter; but, in the meantime, he empowered his trustees, though the parents of his grandchildren should be living, to apply the interest of each grandchild's "presumptive share, even including an eldest son's share, in their maintenance and education;" and the surplus was to accumulate and be payable along with their respective original shares when the same became vested and transmissible, and the payments were to be allowed to the trustees, though such grandchildren should not gain a vested interest. And the testator declared, that after the death of A. and B., as well as during their lives, his trustees should, in the meantime, and until the share or shares of all his grandchildren of and in the trust funds should become vested and assignable, transferable or payable, apply the dividends of the trust funds towards the maintenance and education of every such child and children respectively, including even the eldest.

A. and B. were still living; A. had no children, but B. had an eldest son and other children. Held, first, that the eldest son of B. had not a vested interest in the personal estate; secondly, that the other children took vested interests, subject to be divested partially by the birth of other children; and, thirdly, that all the children of B., including the eldest son, who had attained twenty-one, were entitled to have maintenance.

The testator William Maxwell by his will, dated 25th of March 1818, after referring to the insanity of his son John Maxwell, devised his freehold estates to his wife the Defendant Jane Maxwell, and to the Plaintiffs in fee, to the intent that his wife might receive an an-[588]-nuity of £1000 for her life out of the rents and profits if sufficient, but if not then out of his personal estate; and to the further intent that his son John Maxwell might receive or have applied for his benefit, an annuity of £1000, which might be increased under circumstances in the will mentioned; and the testator directed the residue of the rents, so charged, to be invested and accumulated, to the end that the same might become part of his personal estate. And, subject to the charges, the testator directed his trustees to stand seised of his freehold estate, to the use of the first son of the body of his son John in tail male, with remainder to the other sons of his son John, successively in tail male, with remainder to his daughter Ann Lyte for life, with remainder to the use of the first son of the body of Ann Lyte in tail male, with remainder to the other sons of the body of Ann Lyte, successively in tail male, with remainder to the daughters of his son John and daughter Ann Lyte as tenants in common in tail, with other remainders over. And the testator directed, that no person should under the limitations and trusts aforesaid become entitled to the lands in possession, or to the rents and profits thereof during such time as any antecedent limitations remained in contingency.

The testator then disposed of his leasehold estates; and he gave his personal estate to his trustees and executors desiring them to pay his debts and certain legacies; and he directed that after payment of his debts and legacies, his trustees should stand possessed of his personal estate, upon the trust after mentioned, for the benefit of all the sons and daughters of his son John Maxwell and his daughter Ann Lyte, "save and except a first born or eldest son, or such other son as by the death of an elder brother might become an eldest son, and as such would be entitled to a considerable portion of his [589] fortune under the limitations of his will, whether such eldest son should be the son of John Maxwell or of Ann Lyte, but the son of his said son John Maxwell was to be preferred before the son of the testator's said daughter; and to that end, he directed the trustees to transfer the trust funds unto all his younger grandchildren equally to be divided between them, as and when being sons they should attain the age of twenty-one years, or being daughters they should attain that age or be previously married, it being his will, that each of their several shares and interests should become vested at that age or the previous marriage of daughters, though such shares should not become payable or transmissible until after the demise of both his son and daughter;" and he directed, that if only one grandchild should live to attain such vested interest, the whole fund should go to such only grandchild.

But in the meantime his will was, that although the parents of his grandchildren, or either of them should be living, it should be lawful for the trustees to apply the interest of each grandchild's presumptive share, even including an eldest son's share, or such portion thereof as in their discretion they should think fit, in the maintenance and education of all his grandchildren, or in aid thereof; and the surplus, if any, was to be laid out and accumulate, and be payable and paid along with their respective original shares when the same should become vested and transmissible, together with all such benefits of survivorship, amongst his younger children as after mentioned; and such several applications and payments by the trustees were to be allowed in their accounts, even though such grandchildren so maintained and educated should not afterwards live to gain a vested interest under his will. The will then provided for [590] giving to surviving grandchildren the benefit of the original or accruing share of any who should die without having acquired a vested interest. And the testator then expressed his will to be, that from and after the decease of both his son John Maxwell and his daughter Ann Lyte, as well as during the lives of both, or the life of one of them, his trustees should in the meantime and until the share or shares of all his grandchildren of and in the trust funds should become vested and assignable, transferable, or payable to him, her, or them respectively, pay, apply, and dispose of the dividends, interest, and annual proceeds of the trust funds, or any part thereof, in and towards the maintenance and education of every such child and children respectively, including even the eldest, in such manner as the trustees should in their discretion think fit. The testator afterwards directed, that if there should be anything which he might not sufficiently have disposed of, the same should go and belong to his wife Jane Maxwell as his residuary legatee.

At the date of the will the testator's son John Maxwell was, and still remained, a lunatic and unmarried.

The testator died on the 8th of September 1818.

The daughter Ann Lyte had no child born at the time of the testator's death. She has since had four children, the eldest of whom was born on the 29th of September 1818, and consequently attained his age of twenty-one years on the 29th of September 1839. The youngest was born on the 10th of January 1828.

The term of twenty-one years after the testator's death expired on the 8th of September 1839.

[591] The will was very inaccurately expressed, and was in some respects contradictory; and several questions were raised upon the construction.

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Purvis, for the Plaintiffs, who were two trustees.

Mr. Lewin, for Jane Maxwell, the widow and residuary legatee, contended that the bequest of the residuary estate amounted, in effect, to a trust for accumulation during the lives of the testator's son and daughter, and the survivor of them; that it was void for the excess above twenty-one years; and that the widow was entitled to the income which could not lawfully be accumulated. He further contended that the trustees had no power to apply any part of the income towards the maintenance of any grandchild who had attained the age of twenty-one years.

Mr. Kindersley, for the Defendant Henry William Maxwell Lyte, who was the eldest son of Mrs. Lyte, and had attained his age of twenty-one years, contended, that although he was now the eldest grandson, yet that as he might be excluded from all benefit of the limitations of the real estate by the birth of a son of John Maxwell, and was, during that contingency and the life of his mother, excluded from any interest in possession in the lands, he ought to be considered as a younger grandchild, and as having acquired a vested interest in a share of the personal estate; and he claimed either to have such share now paid to him, or, at least, to have his right thereto declared; and if he should not succeed in establishing that claim, he contended, that even as eldest grandson he was entitled to have an allowance for his maintenance and education, until the shares of the younger grandchildren became payable.

[592] Mr. Tinney and Mr. Morley, for the younger grandchildren, contended that Henry William Maxwell Lyte, being, at this time, eldest grandson, entitled in expectancy to the freehold estate, could not, whilst he held that character, be entitled to a share of the personal estate, though he might become so, if, by the birth of a son of John Maxwell, his expectancy should be further postponed; and they submitted to the Court, whether he was entitled to an allowance for his maintenance out of the income.

For the younger grandchildren, it was further contended, that the trust for accumulation, whether expressed or implied, was a trust during the minorities of children, who, under the uses of the will, would, if of full age, be entitled to the income; that such accumulation was lawful under the statute. It was also insisted on their behalf, that when they respectively attained the age of twenty-one years, they would become entitled to vested interests, subject only to partial divestment, in the event of other grandchildren coming into existence; but that until such grandchildren should be born, each of the present younger grandchildren would, on attaining twenty-one years of age, be entitled to receive the income arising from his or her presumptive share.

The following authorities were referred to:—39 & 40 G. 3, c. 98, Mills v. Norris (5 Ves. 335), Haley v. Bannister (4 Mad. 275), Shaw v. Rhodes (1 Myl. & Cr. 135), O'Neil v. Lucas (2 Keen, 313), Macdonald v. Bryce (Ib. 276), Eyre v. Marsden (Ib. 564), Pride v. Fooks (2 Beavan, 430), Evans v. Hellier (5 Cl. & Fin. 114).

[593] April 26. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale], after stating the circumstances and the points argued, observed as follows:—The will is very inaccurately expressed, and is in some respects contradictory, and several questions are raised upon the construction.

As there is not at present any surplus of the rents of the real estates, and as none of the younger grandchildren have attained the age of twenty-one years, some of the questions which arise upon this will do not now require decision. The questions which it is necessary to consider are:—

1. Whether the Defendant, Henry William Maxwell Lyte, the eldest grandson, for the time being, is entitled to a vested interest in a share of the personal estate.
2. If he is not, whether he is, nevertheless, entitled to an allowance for his maintenance and education, or for his maintenance, out of the income of the personal estate, notwithstanding his having attained his age of twenty-one years.
3. Whether the trust for accumulation is void for the time exceeding twenty-one years, after the testator's death.

1. As to the first it appears to me, that the words "save and except a first-born or eldest son, who, as such, will be entitled to a considerable portion of my fortune under the limitations of this my will," the eldest son answering that description is excluded from the class for whose benefit the capital of the personal estate is given; and this construction is, I think, confirmed by the mode in which the testator has taken care to provide for the maintenance of such eldest son [594] out of the income; thinking it necessary, on two distinct occasions, to include him specially as one of the grandchildren to be so maintained. It may happen that a son of John Maxwell may be born; such son will, by the express words of the will, be entitled to a prior interest in the real estate; and, in that event, the eldest son of Mrs. Lyte will, I conceive, upon the construction, have the rights of a younger grandchild to a share of the personal estate; but at present, I think, that he is not entitled to a vested interest in the capital.

2. I think that the intention to be collected from the will is, that the shares of the grandchildren should not be paid during the lives of John Maxwell and Mrs. Lyte, or the life of the survivor of them. The testator has distinctly contemplated the two periods of time, the time of vesting and the time of payment; but the will is expressed very inaccurately as to what is to be done on each occasion, and in the meantime. In one place he directs the shares to be paid to the grandchildren, as and when they respectively attain the age of twenty-one years; in the same clause he says, that the shares are to vest at twenty-one, but not become payable or transmissible till after the death of both his son and daughter; and having in one place expressed himself so as to exclude an eldest son from any share, he in another place speaks of an eldest son's share. But, upon the result of the whole, I think, that according to the terms of the will, the eldest son, though excluded from a vested interest in the capital, is entitled to an allowance out of the income for his maintenance and education; and then the question is, whether the trustees have authority to continue this allowance after the eldest son's attainment of twenty-one years of age. And whatever ambiguity there may be in the first clause relating to maintenance, I think that, upon the second, the trustees [595] have such authority. The words are, "that from and after the decease of both his son and daughter, as well as during the lives of both, or the life of one of them, the trustees shall, in the meantime, and until the shares of all the grandchildren shall become vested and assignable, and transferrable or payable to him, her, or them respectively, pay, apply, and dispose of the income or any part thereof, in and towards the maintenance and education of every such child or children, including even the eldest son, in such manner as they shall think fit."

This clause is expressed generally, without distinctly referring to the ages of the children; the words "vested and assignable, transferrable or payable," appear to me to shew, that the testator contemplated a period beyond the time, when, according to the former clause, the shares were to become vested, but not payable or transmissible; and upon the best consideration which I have been able to give to the case, I think that there are no words in the will which lead necessarily to the conclusion, that the operation of this clause, which itself contemplates a longer period, should be confined to the minorities of the children, who are to be maintained in the event of a majority being attained, during the lives of the son and daughter. I am therefore of opinion, that the Defendant Henry William Maxwell Lyte is entitled to an allowance for his maintenance, notwithstanding his having attained his age of twenty-one years.

3. With respect to the question relating to accumulation, the words of the statute permit accumulation for the term of twenty-one years from the death of the testator; or during the minorities of any person who shall be living or in ventre sa mere at the time of the death [596] of the testator; or during the minority only of any person, who, under the uses of the will, would for the time being, if of full age, be entitled to the annual produce directed to be accumulated.

Mrs. Maxwell admits the accumulation to be good for twenty-one years; she has scarcely suggested that it may not be good during the minority of Henry William Maxwell Lyte, who was in ventre sa mere at the time of the testator's death; but she insists that it can be good no longer; whilst the younger grandchildren insist, that they are persons who under the uses created by the testator, will upon attaining the age of twenty-one years be entitled to the annual produce of the whole fund.

The difficulty of attributing a distinct and efficient meaning to all the words of this Act has frequently been acknowledged. If the accumulation is permitted only during the minority of a person entitled under the uses of the will, and no time is to be allowed, either before the minority commences or after it has ceased, it does not seem that anything is added to the permission to accumulate during the minority of a person living at the death of the testator. But taking the words as they are, they do not appear to permit accumulation during a minority and any time to elapse between the death of the testator and the commencement of the minority, or in favour of any person who would not for the time being, if of full age, be entitled to the annual produce of the fund; and accordingly, in the case of Longdon v. Simson (12 Ves. 295), where an accumulation was intended to be made till unborn children attained twenty-one, Sir William Grant decreed an [597] accumulation for twenty-one years only; and in Haley v. Bannister (4 Mad. 277), Sir John Leach expressed his opinion to be, that the statute prevents an accumulation during the minority of an unborn child. These cases prevent me from considering that upon the construction of the Act the accumulation would be lawful during the minority of any grandchild born after the death of the testator. Moreover, upon the construction of this will, it will have to be considered whether the younger grandchildren attaining twenty-one will be entitled to the annual produce of the fund, although it may be lawful for the trustees to make them an allowance for their maintenance and education out of it, after they have attained twenty-one.

In the view which I have taken of the case, it does not appear to me that the circumstance of the younger children taking vested interests at twenty-one makes any material difference. They will, as it seems to me, be vested interests, subject to be partially divested by the births of after born children; but in Eyre v. Marsden the interests were vested on the death of the testator, subject to be divested in a particular event; and yet the grandchildren were held not to be entitled till the time of distribution appointed by the testator.

It appears, therefore, to me, that the trust for accumulation after the attainment of twenty-one years by William Henry Maxwell Lyte is void; that an allowance ought to be made, out of the annual produce of the fund accumulated up to that time, for the maintenance and education of all the grandchildren, including William Henry Maxwell Lyte; and that the surplus if any of such annual produce belongs to Jane Maxwell as residuary legatee.

[598] BROWN v. SAWER. March 25, 1841.

One of two Co-plaintiffs who had authorised the institution of a suit refused to proceed therein. The other Plaintiff obtained, on motion, an order to amend by making him a Defendant, and to pay the costs.

This bill was filed by William Frederick Brown and Martha Gresham against several Defendants, pursuant to a written retainer given by them to their solicitor.

After the answers had been got in, the Plaintiff W. F. Brown alone disapproved of the suit, and was desirous that the same should be compromised; and by a written notice given to his solicitor, he withdrew from the suit, and forbade him taking any further steps therein. This was stated in the answer of one of the Defendants, and was also proved by affidavit.

A motion was now made, on behalf of Martha Gresham, the other Co-plaintiff in this suit, that she might be at liberty to amend the bill by striking out the name of W. F. Brown as a Co-plaintiff, and by making him a Defendant; and that W. F. Brown might be ordered to pay to Martha Gresham the costs occasioned by such amendment, and also the costs of giving any security for costs, which the Defendants or any or either of them might be declared entitled to, in consequence of such amendment, and incidental thereto; and also the costs of and incident to this application, to be taxed as between solicitor and client.

Mr. Anderdon, in support of the motion, referred to a case of Miller v. Smith (1) (before the Vice-Chancellor in 1839) and Small v. Atwood (Younge, 407).

(1) He stated this case in the following terms:—A cause being at issue, one of the Co-plaintiffs, for good reasons, refused to proceed; this refusal of one paralyzed the proceedings, and the other Plaintiff gave notice of motion to be at liberty to have the future prosecution of the case, and to name a solicitor to act therein. The only other course would have been to have dismissed the bill. The Vice-Chancellor made an order that the Co-plaintiff making the application should have the future conduct of the cause, and that the other Co-plaintiff should pay the costs of the application.

[599] Mr. Wilcox, for the Plaintiff Brown, and

Mr. Terrell, for the principal Defendant, opposed the motion, and contended that, although a Plaintiff might be made a Defendant where his evidence was required as a witness, still one Plaintiff could not, adversely, obtain such an order as was now asked, merely because he could not agree with his Co-plaintiff in the mode of prosecuting the suit; especially where, as in the present case, the state of the pleadings would be materially altered; Holkirk v. Holkirk (4 Madd. 50), Lloyd v. Makeam (6 Ves. 145), Motteux v. Mackreth (1 Ves. jun. 142), The Attorney-General v. Cooper (3 Myl. & Cr. 261).

Mr. Hall appeared for other Defendants, who had no objection.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. I think I must make the order. It is a case in which two Plaintiffs claiming similar rights gave joint authority to institute the suit. The bill was filed, and the answer states that one of the Plaintiffs impeaches the propriety of the suit; by letter also he forbids its further prosecution, and thus compromises the rights of the other Co-plaintiff. If the case stood here, I believe it would be in the same situation as Small v. Atwood; but this case goes further; for the Plaintiff, who had, in this case, given written instructions [600] to his solicitor, afterwards revokes the authority, and prevents the other Plaintiff going on with the suit. The case is within the words of the case of The Attorney-General v. Cooper, the suit cannot be prosecuted unless the alteration is made, and therefore "justice will not be done unless the alteration is made." I think, therefore, that this order must be made, but on such terms as will be just towards the Defendants, and by securing the costs of suit already incurred; and Mr. Brown, the Co-plaintiff, having, by revoking the authority, made this application necessary, ought therefore to pay the costs.

[600] COLLINS v. COLLYER. March 8, 31, 1841.

Under the 1 W. 4, c. 36, a decree, even when there is but one Defendant, cannot be taken pro confesso on motion.

The sole Defendant in this cause was taken upon an attachment for want of answer in June 1840, and on the 2d of November following he was turned over to the Fleet.

The Defendant was now brought up by habeas corpus under the second rule 1 W. 4, c. 36, in order that the bill might be taken pro confesso against him.

The cause had not been set down to be heard.

Mr. Torriano now proposed to take upon motion such decree as the Plaintiff could abide by; he cited Seagrave v. Edwards (1), in which it was held a bill [601] might be taken pro confesso on motion where there is only one Defendant.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS. The Act of Parliament directs that upon the Defendant being brought up in order that the bill may be taken pro confesso against him, "such decree shall thereupon be made as shall be just." The cause is to be heard, and the decree pronounced by the Court; and this cannot be so conveniently or satisfactorily done on motion. I think that the case should be set down. (2)

(1) And see Lewis v. Marsh, 2 Sim. & St. 220; Wooliams v. Baker, 6 Sim. 316; Baker v. Keen, 4 Sim. 498. The cause may be advanced to be taken pro confesso; Barwick v. Ward, 5 Sim. 676; Hart v. Ashton, 1 Mad. 175; Hoyle v. Leveaux, 1 Mer. 381.

(2) The Lord Chancellor afterwards discharged the Defendant upon grounds not stated at the Rolls, see 1 Cr. & Ph. 262. The Master of the Rolls merely decided that the decree could not be made on motion. See Haynes v. Ball [4 Beav. 101].

Reports of CASES in CHANCERY ARGUED and DETERMINED in the ROLLS COURT during the time of LORD LANGDALE, Master of the Rolls. 1841, 1842. By CHARLES BEAVAN,
Esqr., M.A., Barrister-at-Law. Vol. IV. 1843.

[1] FENNINGS v. HUMPHERY. March 27, 29, 1841.

[S. C. 10 L. J. Ch. 251 ; 5 Jur. 455. See Anglo-Danubian Company v. Rogerson, 1867, L. R. 4 Eq. 8.]

A. agreed to grant a lease of a vault to B., and also to erect a crane, &c., and do within a given time certain other acts, which this Court could not decree to be specifically performed. A. having made default, B. sued in this Court for a specific performance, but did not pray that the above-stated acts should be specifically performed. Pending the suit, B. also commenced an action at law against A. for damages suffered in consequence of the non-performance of the acts. Held, that the suit and action were not for the same matter, and an order to elect, obtained by the Defendant, was discharged.

A party served with an order obtained ex parte, may be guilty of contempt for disobedience thereof, in a case where the order ought not to have been made.

A Plaintiff, served with an order to elect between proceedings at law and in equity, afterwards took a step in the action at law. Held, that he might, nevertheless, apply to discharge the order for election.

Whether an order to elect stays all proceedings, quære.

This case came on upon a motion to discharge an order, obtained as of course, whereby the Plaintiff was required to elect, whether he would proceed in this suit, or in an action at law, alleged by the Defendant to be for the same matter; and also upon cause shewn by the Plaintiff, why an order nisi to dissolve an in-[2]-junction obtained by the Plaintiff, to restrain the Defendant's proceedings at law, should not be made absolute.

It appeared that on the 13th of May 1837, the Defendant contracted to let to the Plaintiff certain vaults, then in the Plaintiff's possession, for a term of seven years and a quarter, to commence from Lady Day then last, at a rent of £150 a year; and she also contracted to excavate, build, and finish another vault, with certain specified accommodation, and erect a crane, with proper and convenient works and appurtenances, for the sole use of the Plaintiff during the intended demise; and to complete the vault and works, and give possession thereof to the Plaintiff, in eighteen months from the 24th day of June then next. The Plaintiff was to hold the last-mentioned vault, from the day when possession thereof should be given, for seven years, at the yearly rent of £50. The Defendant agreed, that he would, at any time within seven years and a quarter, execute to the Plaintiff a lease of all the premises, for so much of the term as should then be unexpired, containing the usual and proper covenants on the part of the lessee, for the purposes therein mentioned, and covenants on the part of the lessor, to keep the premises in repair and insured, and for quiet enjoyment by the lessee.

The Defendant did not perform the works according to the agreement, and the rent agreed to be paid by the Plaintiff for the vault in her possession being in arrear, the Defendant brought an action against her for the recovery thereof.

The present bill was filed on the 24th of December 1839; and the Plaintiff thereby prayed, that the agree-[3]-ment of the 13th of May 1837 might be specially performed and carried into execution; and that the Defendant might be ordered to execute a proper lease of the vaults and premises, the Plaintiff offering to perform her part; she also prayed for an injunction to restrain the Defendant from proceeding in his action, and for general relief.

The Plaintiff's bill alleged, that the Defendant had failed to erect the new buildings, to erect the crane, and to keep the premises in repair, according to his covenant; but did not specifically pray that the Defendant might be ordered to do those acts.

The Plaintiff obtained the common injunction to restrain the Defendant proceeding to execution in his action for rent. The answer was filed on the 27th of January 1840, and for more than a twelvemonth no proceedings were taken in this Court; but on the 20th of February 1841 the Defendant obtained the usual order nisi to dissolve the injunction; and on the 26th of February 1841 the Plaintiff commenced an action against the Defendant for damages for breaches of the agreement. The declaration in the action was delivered on the 6th of March 1841. It stated the agreement of the 13th of May 1837, and assigned as breaches by the Defendant, 1st, his neglect to excavate, make, build, and finish, the vault agreed to be made, with such suitable and convenient entrance and communication as therein mentioned; 2dly, his neglect to erect the crane agreed to be erected; and 3dly, his neglect to do the necessary repairs; and it was then alleged, that the Plaintiff had lost profits, which she would have made, if the vaults and works had been made as agreed to; and had, at divers times, between the 24th of June 1837 and the [4] commencement of the action, been put to great trouble and expence by reason of the breaches assigned.

This declaration being delivered on the 6th March, the Defendant on the 11th, alleging that he was doubly vexed by the Plaintiff prosecuting him at law and in this Court for one and the same matter, obtained the common order, that the Plaintiff should, in eight days after notice, elect in which Court she would proceed; this order was served on the Plaintiff on the 13th of March. The Plaintiff afterwards made an application to Baron Alderson, in the common law action, to amend her declaration, and leave was given on the 15th of March. The Plaintiff now sought to discharge the order, for election, for irregularity, as having been obtained on a false allegation that the Plaintiff was prosecuting the Defendant at law, and in this Court, for one and the same matter.

The Plaintiff also now shewed cause why the order nisi, obtained by the Plaintiff, to dissolve an injunction to restrain the Defendant's proceedings at law, should not be made absolute.

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Jemmett, for the Plaintiff, as to the order for election, contended, that it had been obtained on a false suggestion; inasmuch as the object of the suit and of the action were distinct, the first seeking to obtain the lease, and the second for damages which the Plaintiff had suffered, up to the time of bringing the action, in consequence of the non-performance by the Defendant of his agreement to repair, &c.

On the second point, as to the injunction, they argued that the Defendant ought not to be permitted to sue the Plaintiff for rent, while he refused to perform his part of the agreement.

[5] Mr. Bethell and Mr. Dunn, contra, contended that the subject of the suit and action were the same, and arising out of the same agreement; and that this Court would not permit a party to sue at law for damages, on the same contract which he in this Court sought to have specifically performed.

That the Plaintiff by proceeding at law after she had been served with the order to elect, had thereby made her election to pursue her remedy at law.

That the Plaintiff retaining possession ought to pay her rent; that the contract was for two distinct matters, and that it was no answer to the Defendant's demand for the rent of the vault, to say that the second part of the agreement, for which a distinct rent was reserved, had not been performed by the Defendant.

The following cases were cited as to the Plaintiff's right to proceed at law notwithstanding the present suit; Mills v. Fry (19 Ves. 277), Carrick v. Young (4 Mad. 437), Reynolds v. Nelson (6 Mad. 290), Frank v. Barnett (2 Myl. & K. 618), Orme v. Broughton (10 Bing. 533), Trimleston v. Kemmis (1 Ll. & Goo. 29).

As to the effect of the order to elect; Mills v. Fry (Cooper, 107), Amory v. Brodrick (Jacob, 530), Carwick v. Young (2 Swan. 239).

As to the Plaintiff's relief in equity for damages; Nelson v. Bridges (2 Beavan, 239), Mundy v. Jolliffe (9 Sim. 413).

[6] THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. The Plaintiff's bill alleges that the Defendant has failed to erect the new buildings, to erect the crane, and to keep the premises in repair, according to his covenant, but does not specifically pray that the Defendant may be ordered to do those acts; and the acts are of such a nature, that this Court could not order them to be specifically done. Upon this occasion, I have not to consider whether the Defendant may have any equity to restrain the Plaintiff from proceeding in her action, other than that equity which arises from the allegation, that the proceedings at law and in this Court are for one and the same matter. Whatever other grounds for relief the Defendant may have, the order which he has obtained cannot be supported, if the legal remedy which the Plaintiff is seeking at law is consistent with the equitable remedy which she is seeking in this Court.

As by the bill, she asks for a specific performance of the agreement, if, by the action, she sought for compensation for its entire non-performance, one proceeding would allege that the agreement could and ought to be performed, and the other proceeding would allege or imply, that the performance of the agreement, having been abandoned or become impossible, compensation in lieu of performance should be given. The two proceedings would be inconsistent with each other. The Plaintiff would be in one Court, suing for the thing itself, and in the other for compensation in lieu of the thing itself. She would, I think, upon a fair construction of the words of the order, be prosecuting the Defendant at law and in this Court for one and the same matter; in different forms indeed, but still in substance, for one and the same matter, and I should think the order valid.

[7] But considering the allegations in this bill and the relief specifically prayed for; considering the particulars of the agreement, and what parts of it this Court can, and what parts of it the Court cannot, decree to be performed in specie; and considering that the action is brought for damages for the non-performance of particular acts, the performance of which is not specifically prayed by the bill; and which, if they may be conceived to be included in the general words "specific performance," or in the prayer for general relief, are not acts, the specific performance of which can be decreed; and, moreover, that the action is brought only for such damages as were sustained up to the time when the action was brought; it appears to me, that the action was not founded on any implied abandonment or cesser of the agreement, but is consistent with the continued existence of the contract, and of the Plaintiff's title to have it specifically performed, if there be no other objection to its specific performance. Under these circumstances, I think that the action and the suit are not prosecuted for one and the same matter, and I am therefore of opinion that the order of the 11th of March ought not to have been made.

But it has been argued, that even if the order were not originally valid, the Plaintiff by her proceedings at law, after the order was served upon her, has lost the right of applying to discharge it. It is clear, that a party who is served with an order, may be guilty of contempt for disobedience, in a case in which the order ought not to have been made. He is not to determine for himself, but ought to come to the Court for relief, if advised that the order is invalid; and the argument in this case is, that an order for the Plaintiff to elect whether she will proceed at law or in equity, operates as an injunction from the time when it is served, and [8] that any proceedings, either at law or in equity, after service of the order, may be treated as a contempt; but that in another view, it may be considered as an election to abide by the proceedings which have been continued since the service of the order; and that the election having been made, it is too late to apply to discharge the order, under or after which it was made. There are indeed several dicta, to the effect, that an order to elect stays all proceedings. The correctness of those dicta, and the limitations under which they must be received, may be the subject of consideration on a proper occasion, but on this occasion, and even on the supposition that all proceedings ought to be stopped on service of the order, and that the Plaintiff is liable to be charged with disobedience on account of her proceedings afterwards, I am of opinion, that the argument that he is not at liberty to move to discharge the order cannot be sustained. No authority for it has been produced. Lord Eldon, indeed, in Mills v. Fry, expressed a doubt whether the Plaintiff, having proceeded in equity notwithstanding the order, or to have the benefit of the order; i.e., supposing the order to be valid, Lord Eldon doubted whether proceeding in one Court afterwards, might not be considered an election made, depriving the party of the benefit of future choice. But this is nothing like an intimation, that the party is to be precluded from moving to discharge an order which he is advised is invalid, or that he is to be deemed to have made an election, in a case in which he offers to shew to the Court that he ought not to be compelled to elect at all. The argument is inapplicable to a case, in which the Plaintiff might have proceeded in both Courts, after service of the order; and it appearing to me that, in this case, the Plaintiff is at liberty to move to discharge the order, and that the order itself is not valid, I am of opinion that it must be [9] discharged. But I think it right to observe, that if the question as to the prosecution of the suit, and of the action at the same time, had not been brought forward in this particular form, there are many other circumstances which would have required consideration before it could have been satisfactorily held that the two proceedings might go on together.

With respect to the cause shewn against dissolving the injunction to stay proceedings in the Defendant's action for rent, I cannot agree with the Defendant in considering the agreement as consisting of two distinct and independent parts. It is but one agreement, though several things are agreed to be done; and as the Defendant admits that he has not done the things which he agreed to do, and even says, that for reasons which he states, he is unable to do them, I think that he ought not to be allowed to receive the rents until the right is determined; and as, on the other hand, the Plaintiff ought not to be allowed to keep possession without paying for it, I think that if this part of the case had come on by itself, it would have been proper to continue the injunction, on the terms of the rent being brought into Court; and if no arrangement can be made, that course must be adopted; but if the Plaintiff will undertake not to take out execution, upon any judgment to be obtained in her action, without leave of the Court, and to pay the rent into Court, if and when the Court shall think fit to order it, I will continue the injunction against the Defendant's proceeding, without now ordering the rent to be paid into Court.

The question of costs having been mentioned,

[10] THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS said, I think I should make no order respecting them; there are many serious matters in this case, the consideration of which has been excluded, by the particular form in which the case has been brought forward.

[10] KNIGHT v. FRAMPTON. March 2, 3, 16, 1841.

The legal estate of a property being vested in A., for the benefit of himself and B. in equal moieties, he mortgaged it unknown to B. B. afterwards paid off the mortgage, and had the legal estate conveyed to him, subject to such equity of redemption as the lands were subject to. Held, that there was not such a perfect union of the legal and equitable estate in B.'s moiety of the estate as to give his widow a title to dower.

The facts of this case appear in the judgment.

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Kindersley, for the Plaintiff.

Mr. Bethell and Mr. Phillips, for the widow.

Mr. K. Parker, Mr. Stuart, Mr. Faber, Mr. Turner, Mr. Lewin, and Mr. Lee, for other parties.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. Mr. Frampton being seised in fee of an estate, to an undivided moiety of which Mr. Knight was equitably entitled, executed a mortgage in fee of the entirety to Lord Petre and others, to secure payment of a sum which, together with a further charge, amounted to £18,000.

After the death of Mr. Frampton, those who claimed under him disputed the equitable right of Mr. Knight to a moiety of the estate. Mr. Knight filed a bill to enforce his right, and the mortgages made by Frampton being disclosed, Mr. Knight paid them off, and made himself liable to pay a prior charge, and took from [11] Lord Petre and others a conveyance of the estate in fee, subject to redemption.

Mr. Knight died intestate. At the time of his death, such equity of redemption as the legal estate was subject to, was vested in the representatives of Frampton, who being, at the date of the mortgage, entitled to the entirety of the legal estate, executed the mortgage for his own benefit, without the authority of Knight, who was equitably entitled to a moiety of the estate. Under these circumstances, the widow of Mr. Knight, alleging that, in equity the representatives of Frampton were only entitled to redeem the estate as to a moiety, and that there was no right to redeem the other moiety: that consequently, as to that other moiety, Knight held the legal estate free from any equity of redemption, and being at the same time entitled to an absolute equitable interest in the same moiety, the legal and equitable estates therein coalesced: and that this having happened during the coverture, contended that she became entitled to dower.

But neither the legal estate which Mr. Knight had as mortgagee in fee in the entirety, nor the equitable estate which he had in a moiety, gave his widow any right of dower; and although the legal estate could only have been redeemed, as to a moiety, by those who claimed under Frampton—although, as against them, Mr. Knight had a right to have it declared, in this Court, that he was entitled to hold one moiety discharged from any equity of redemption, and had a right to foreclose the equity of redemption of the other, it does not therefore follow, that under these circumstances, there was a simple and entire union of the legal and equitable estates in a moiety.

[12] The object of Mr. Knight, as he stated in his bill, was to simplify the matters in dispute between himself and the Framptons, and to avoid the necessity of making other parties to the suit; and whatever were his rights in equity, he took the legal estate expressly subject to such equity of redemption as the lands were subject to in the hands of the first mortgagees. As to a moiety, I think he was entitled to be relieved from that condition in this Court; but during his life he stood in this situation, that he had the legal estate in the whole, subject to the equity of redemption—an absolute equitable estate in a moiety, and an equitable title to have the legal estate in a moiety freed from the equity of redemption.

On the death of Mr. Knight, his real estate descended to his co-heirs. His widow, as his legal personal representative, became entitled to his personal estate, and to the £18,000 mortgage money and interest, and another charge as part thereof; and, in her bill, praying to have such relief as was prayed by Mr. Knight in respect of the mortgage money and another charge, and also to have it declared, that she is dowable of a moiety of the estate, she also prays, that until the mortgage and charge are fully satisfied, the same may be declared to be charged on Frampton's moiety; and also, if necessary, on the other moiety for the benefit of Knight's personal estate, and that the co-heirs of Knight may be declared to be trustees of the entirety of the estate, for the purpose of securing the mortgage money and charge for the legal personal representative.

This particular relief was not pressed for at the Bar; the state of Frampton's assets may have rendered it unnecessary, or the argument may have been thought not likely to assist the claim for dower.

[13] However this may be, I think that, under the circumstances which I have before stated, there was not a perfect union of the legal and equitable estates, to which Mr. W. Knight was entitled, during the coverture, and that there was not such a seisin as gave his widow a title to dower; I am therefore of opinion, that her claim to dower cannot be sustained. (See 3 & 4 W. 4, c. 105.)

An infant feme covert was, by her next friend, made a Co-plaintiff to a bill against her husband and others. Held, upon her coming of age and disapproving of the suit, that she was entitled to have her name struck out of the record as Co-plaintiff; but the application having been made very soon after her attaining twenty-one, and it being suggested, that it was made under the influence of the husband, the Court postponed making the order for a short period, and ascertained from the lady herself, in the absence of her husband, her wishes on the subject.

In the year 1838 a marriage was agreed upon between the Defendant Mr. Fryer and Miss Turner, the only child and heiress presumptive of Sir G. P. Turner. Miss Turner being an infant, and her father having being found a lunatic, an application was made to the Court, under the 4 G. 4, c. 76, for a reference to approve of the marriage.

The matter was referred to the Master, and a proposal for the settlement of the fortunes of the intended wife and husband in a particular way, having been laid before him, he, on that foundation, reported that the marriage was proper, and the report was confirmed.

Mr. Fryer, being desirous of making some alteration in the terms of the settlement, was advised that it could not be done without a further application being made to the Court; and the day for the intended marriage having been fixed, and there being no opportunity for making an application to the Court in the meantime, a [14] new settlement, varying from that proposed, was executed, in which the Plaintiff Cooke was made a trustee. The marriage was shortly after solemnized before the registrar under the provisions of the 6 & 7 W. 4, c. 85, and independently of the sanction of the Court.

The bill was filed by Mr. Cooke and Mrs. Fryer by Mr. Cooke, her next friend, against Mr. Fryer and the other trustees of the settlement, and prayed the execution of the engagement stated by Mr. Fryer in his proposal before the Master.

Mrs. Fryer attained her age of twenty-one years on the 28th of February 1841. A motion was now made on her behalf, that her name as a Plaintiff might be struck out of the bill; she having attained twenty-one, and objecting to be continued a Plaintiff.

Mr. Kindersley, in support of the motion. Though a bill may be filed on behalf of an infant without his consent, the same cannot be done with respect to a feme covert (1 Daniel Pr. 151); and as Mrs. Fryer has attained twenty-one, and now disapproves of this suit, she is entitled to withdraw from it as a Plaintiff, it may nevertheless be continued by Mr. Cooke alone.

Mr. Stuart, contra, resisted the application, and contended the application was, in reality, made by the husband of the lady, the notice of motion being signed by his solicitor. That this suit had been properly instituted on behalf of an infant, and that it was right that it should be continued; and that her name ought therefore to be retained as a Co-plaintiff. He argued [15] that the husband, having once submitted to the jurisdiction of the Court, and having obtained its sanction to the marriage on certain terms, had committed a contempt by procuring the marriage to be solemnised in another form, and by such means evading the performance of the terms of his engagement. That this was an attempt, on his part, to prevent the due prosecution of the suit against him, and that the application was improper, being made under marital influence, and by a party who had just attained her age of twenty-one. He cited Revett v. Harvey (1 Sim. & St. 502), Mellish v. Mellish (Id. 138), Long v. Long (2 Sim. & St. 119), Austen v. Halsey (Id. 123, n.), Hatch v. Hatch (9 Ves. 292), to shew the continuance of the protection afforded by the Court to infants after they attain twenty-one.

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Teed, for Mr. Fryer, contended, that as Mrs. Fryer was not a ward of Court, no contempt had been committed. That under the Act of 4 G. 4 this Court had no authority to approve of any settlement. That it was necessary, in consequence of the lunacy of the lady's father, that the Court should consent to the marriage; but the course at first contemplated had been abandoned, and the parties had married under the provisions of the 6 & 7 W. 4, c. 85, whereby the concurrence of this Court was rendered unnecessary.

Mr. Walford, for Sir W. Trelawney, a trustee.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale] (without hearing a reply). This is a motion, that the name of a married woman, who, by her next friend, has been joined as a Co-plaintiff [16] in this suit, may be struck out of the record. The substantial question is, whether any person, assuming to be the next friend of a married woman, has a right, against her consent, to make her a Plaintiff in a cause? If it be a clear proposition that he has no right to do so, the only remaining question will be, whether this married lady does dissent, or whether the circumstances in which she is placed are such, that the Court ought to require further evidence of that fact?

A great variety of circumstances have been stated during the argument involving the inculpation of character. Irrelevant as most of them are, it has been my painful duty to hear a long unnecessary defence made against those inculpations; but I have not now to determine any question in the cause, or whether any fact alleged on the pleadings is or is not true; the only question which I have to determine is, whether the circumstances of this case are such, that I ought to feel assured the married woman dissents from the prosecution of this suit.

The general rule of the Court I apprehend to be perfectly clear. You may, in the character of next friend of an infant, prosecute a suit on his behalf without his consent, and even against his strongest remonstrances; subject only to such enquiries as this Court in a proper case will direct, whether it is prosecuted for the benefit of the infant, and subject of course to all the liability of the next friend to costs, if it turns out that he is not acting for the benefit of the infant; but I have never before heard that a person can treat a married woman, and a married woman of full age too, as if she were possessed of no sense or understanding, and can say that he will proceed with a suit on her behalf without her approbation. The difficulty in this case, if there be [17] any difficulty, is, that the suit was instituted during the infancy of this married woman, and this application is made immediately after she has come of age, and under circumstances which render me not perfectly assured that she has deliberately given instructions for this application.

Upon that ground, and that ground alone, I must pause before I dispose of this motion; and I will order it to stand over, in order that I may be better satisfied than I am now, that this lady does deliberately desire her name to be struck off the record. If I am satisfied of that, I shall not hesitate to comply with the motion.

I must see the lady personally in the absence of her husband, but as she has recently come of age, I think I had better let the motion stand over until Easter term, I shall then know whether she does give her consent to having her name struck off the record.

His Lordship afterwards saw the lady in the absence of her husband, and having ascertained her wishes, made the order.

[18] FARROW v. REES. Nov. 17, 1840.

A party entitled to an estate, subject to terms vested in trustees for securing a jointure and portions, mortgaged it; but retained the title-deeds in his possession. Held, that this omission, on the part of the mortgagee, was not sufficient to postpone him, in favour of a subsequent purchaser for valuable consideration.

A general recital in a deed, that there were mortgages on the estate, held to affect parties claiming under the deed with notice of a mortgage not specified therein.

An estate subject to two charges, was devised to the party entitled to the first charge; and by the settlement made on her marriage, to which the second incumbrancer was no party, it was agreed that the charge should not be raised, and the estate was thereby settled. Held, that the first charge could not be set up against the second incumbrancer.

Where costs are vexatiously and improperly incurred by a successful party, and can be clearly distinguished from the rest, the Court will make a provision for them, otherwise they must be left to the Master.

On a bill for foreclosure, an infant partially interested in the equity of redemption can not adversely insist on a sale.

By the settlement, made on the marriage of Sir Watts Horton, certain estates were conveyed to Sir Watts Horton for life, with remainder to trustees for 500 years, to secure a portion of £800 a year to Lady Horton; with remainder to trustees for a term of 1000 years, to raise £10,000 for the child or children of the marriage, other than an eldest son; with remainder to the first and other sons of the marriage in tail; and for default thereof, as to the estates at Thornton, &c., to Sir Watts Horton in fee; and as to the estates at Chadderton, &c., to Sir Thomas Horton for life, and to his issue in tail.

There was one daughter only of the marriage.

In 1798 Sir Watts Horton mortgaged the Thornton, &c., estates for a term of 1000 years, for securing £1500. The title-deeds were not handed over to the mortgagee, but were retained by Sir Watts Horton.

In 1810 the mortgage was transferred to a gentleman of the name of Lord, when a further advance of £2500 was made. On this occasion, the title-deeds were not handed over to the Lords, but were retained as before. This mortgage became afterwards vested in the Plaintiff.

Sir Watts Horton, by his will, devised his real estates to his wife, with remainder to his only child Henrietta S. A. Horton, and he died in 1811.

[19] After his death, an agreement was entered into between Sir Thomas Horton and the widow and daughter of Sir Watts Horton, whereby the charges on the several estates were apportioned; and it was agreed that £4952, part of the sum of £10,000, should be raised out of that part of the estate limited, by the settlement, in default of male issue of Sir Watts Horton, to Sir Thomas Horton, "and that the remainder of the estate limited for raising the said sum of £10,000 should be freed and exonerated from any liability as to raising or paying the residue thereof."

In 1813, a marriage having been agreed upon between the Defendant Mr. Rees and Miss Horton, a settlement was executed, whereby, after reciting the settlement of 1778, the will of Sir Watts Horton, the agreement with Sir Thomas Horton, and "that the personal estate of Sir Watts Horton was not sufficient to pay his bond and mortgage debts, and the other debts owing from him at his decease, and that there was a considerable sum remaining unsatisfied on that account; and also reciting, that it had been agreed by Lady Horton, for the purpose of enabling her daughter to make that settlement, to give up her life-estate in the property; "and that it had also been agreed, on the treaty of the said intended marriage, that so much of the said sum of £10,000, as remained a charge upon the said estates to which Miss Horton was entitled, should not be raised; but, in consideration of the same being waived by Miss Horton, she, in the event of her surviving her intended husband, should have a jointure of £800 a year;" the estates were conveyed to trustees, in trust, as to part, to sell and pay the debts of Sir W. Horton, and the residue of the money arising therefrom to the Defendant Mr. Rees; and as to the remainder of the estates, to pay £403 a year, the apportioned part [20] of her jointure, to Lady Horton; with remainder to Mr. Rees for life, and then to pay £800 a year jointure to Miss H., with remainder to the issue of the marriage in strict settlement.

Lady Horton died, and her daughter Mrs. Rees afterwards died, leaving issue of the marriage.

Interest was paid on the Plaintiff's mortgage down to 1820 by the agent of the Defendant Mr. Rees, but, as the latter alleged, without his knowledge. The gentleman who acted as the solicitor for Mr. Rees in preparing the settlement, was the family solicitor of the Hortons, and had also prepared the mortgages.

This bill was filed in 1833 against Mr. Rees, his children, and the trustees, to foreclose the mortgage. The defence set up by Mr. Rees was, that under his marriage settlement, he was a purchaser for valuable consideration without notice of the Plaintiff's mortgage; and that, in consequence of the neglect of the mortgagee to take possession of the title-deeds, they ought to be postponed. He also insisted that the charge of £10,000 had priority over the Plaintiff's mortgage.

Mr. Pemberton, Mr. Hodgson, and Mr. Piggott, for the Plaintiff, cited Toulmin v. Steers (3 Mer. 210); and see Smith v. Phillips (1 Keen, 694) and Parry v. Wright (1 Sim. & St. 369, and 5 Russ. 142).

Mr. Kindersley and Mr. Roupell, for Mr. Rees, cited Mouniford v. Scott (Turn. & R. 274).

Mr. Girdlestone, for the children of Mr. Rees.

[21] Mr. Follett, for the Earl of Derby, a trustee.

Mr. Cooper and Mr. Clark, for the administrator of Sir Watts Horton.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. The first objection made to the mortgage to Holt in 1798 is this, that no title-deeds were handed over to the mortgagee, and that therefore, in this Court, the transaction must be regarded as so suspicious as to defeat the Plaintiff's claim. No authority has however been cited for the proposition, that the mere omission to hand over the title-deeds is, in all cases, to be considered as a proof of fraud, as against subsequent purchasers for valuable consideration; but here the estate was vested in trustees, and was subject to a term for securing the jointure of the wife, and the portions of the younger children. I am of opinion, that the omission is not of itself sufficient to invalidate the mortgage, and for this I believe there is ample authority (see Evans v. Bicknell, 6 Ves. 183, and the cases there referred to; and Cootes on Mortgages, 511); though I admit a mortgagee may omit to take the title-deeds, under such circumstances as to displace his priority, in favour of a subsequent mortgagee.

This mortgage was transferred to Messrs. Lords in 1810, and a further advance was then made; and again it is alleged, that on this occasion there was a great omission on their part in not obtaining the title-deeds, and that this must be considered as evidence of fraud. I am of opinion under the circumstances, and considering what were the previous uses and the duties [22] which the trustees had to perform, that, in this respect, there is nothing to impeach the validity of the mortgage.

In 1811 Sir Watts Horton died, indebted on mortgage bond and simple contract. By his will he devised his estates to his wife for life, with remainder to his daughter in fee. Nothing can be more clear than that they took under the will, subject to all the charges affecting the estate of the testator. In 1813 Mr. Rees proposed marrying Miss Horton, and the settlement then made, recited, that there were mortgage bond and simple contract debts of Sir Watts Horton unpaid. Mr. Rees was therefore clearly informed, that there were some mortgages and debts unpaid, though they were not particularized or stated in the schedule. I am of opinion that Mr. Rees cannot be heard to say, in this Court, that he had no notice of any mortgages affecting the estate. This therefore is not the case of a purchaser for valuable consideration without notice; besides which, the parties who took the estate subject to those charges, could not get rid of them by this mode of dealing. If notice to Mr. Rees were required, I think that notice must be imputed to him, because he had that before him, which made it his duty to enquire into these matters.

The marriage took effect; and it appears perfectly clear, that interest was paid, from time to time to the mortgagee, down to 1820. What further was it possible for the mortgagee to do for the confirmation of his claim? the mortgage was admitted by the agent of the persons interested in the estate, and the interest was paid. The mortgagee was satisfied, and there was no neglect on his part. It is said that these acts of the agents have been disavowed by Mr. Rees. I feel reluctant [23] to refer in detail to the evidence, which establishes beyond controversy, that, although Rees might not have been acquainted with what had been done by the agent at the very time, yet, that when he did afterwards obtain knowledge, he found no fault with what had been done. His letters shew no dispute or denial of the mortgage, but that for his own convenience he was desirous of making a provision for it in a particular way.

Another point raised was, that priority ought to be given to the charge of £10,000; I am of opinion, that, under the circumstances, there is not the least foundation for that claim; and finding nothing which can call into serious question the claims of the Plaintiff, I have no hesitation in making a decree according to the prayer of the bill. There must be an account of what is due to the Plaintiff, in the usual form, and he must have the costs of the suit, unless there have been some improper proceedings in the prosecution of the suit, which ought to except it from the ordinary rule. If there have been any such lavish and improper expense in the proofs, as is alleged, counsel may address themselves to that point. On a question of costs they may read the answer, which they cannot do as to the merits.

Mr. Kindersley then argued the point as to the costs of the evidence taken in the cause. He contended that it had been very improperly taken, and that the Plaintiff ought to pay the costs occasioned by the useless mass of depositions. He observed, that the evidence amounted to 120 brief sheets, which had been caused by the Plaintiffs having examined numerous witnesses as to a single fact: thus, he said, twelve witnesses proved that Mr. Lee was an attorney and solicitor; seven witnesses proved [24] that Dame Henrietta Horton was the person named in the pleadings; six witnesses proved the loss of the assignment of the mortgage; he mentioned other instances of useless multiplicity of proofs, and argued that the expense of this evidence ought to fall on the Plaintiff. He stated also, that London witnesses had been taken into the country to be examined under the commission, instead of being examined in the usual way by the examiner in London.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS (without hearing a reply) on this point, said, if it had been made out that the Plaintiff had occasioned all this useless expense for the purpose of prejudicing the Defendant, I should then go out of the usual course, and make him bear the costs. Here the depositions were taken by Commissioners appointed by both parties to take the depositions, and many witnesses appear to have been examined to the same point. I am not prepared to say that it is the fault of the Plaintiff. If the evidence had been taken in open Court, the Judge would not have permitted such a course; but, as it is, I am by no means satisfied that the fault lies with the Plaintiff.

As to the second point, a difficulty arose in consequence of a deed being lost, and the Plaintiff being put to the proof of the fact, and of the contents, the expense could not be avoided.

If witnesses have improperly been taken down to the country to be examined, I think the Master in the taxation of costs will take notice of any improper charges in that respect; if he does not, it will be open to the Defendant to make an application to the Court. This is not the first occasion in which a similar point [25] has been brought before me. (Booth v. Booth, 1 Beavan, 130.) If that part which was improper and vexatious were clearly distinguished from the rest, I would make some provision for the costs of it, in the same way, as where a bill contains unnecessary charges, or where the bill or answer contains allegations which fail in proof, and great expense has been occasioned, the Court, in such cases, makes a special provision for the costs of such portion. I am not now in a situation to determine this point; it must therefore be left to the Master: he will see what proper costs ought to be allowed.

Mr. Girdlestone, for the infant Defendants, asked that a sale of the estate might be directed for payment of what was due to the Plaintiff.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS. I am not aware of any case in which an order for sale has been made adversely.

[26] WHITMARSH v. ROBERTSON. Dec. 18, 1840.

On an application for payment of money into Court, it was objected that persons having an interest were not before the Court. The order was made, on the undertaking of the Plaintiff to make them parties.

In 1837 the Defendant Milcham intermarried with Mrs. Milcham, then a widow. At the time of the marriage, a sum of £1757 stood in the names of trustees in trust for Mrs. Milcham for life, with remainder to the children of her former marriage (of which there were seven), and by the settlement of the fund, it was declared, that it should be lawful for the trustees, but with the consent of Mrs. Milcham during her life, to raise any part of the portions of the children, notwithstanding the same should not then have become vested or payable, and apply the same for the preferment, advancement, or benefit of such children, as the trustees in their discretion should think fit.

No settlement was made on the second marriage.

In April 1837 Mr. and Mrs. Milcham, for valuable consideration, assigned the life interest of Mrs. Milcham in the fund, to the Plaintiff, and notice of the assignment was given to the trustees.

The Plaintiff, not being able to obtain payment of the dividends as they became due, filed this bill in August 1840 against the trustees and Mr. and Mrs. Milcham, for compelling payment.

By the answer it was stated that Mrs. Milcham requested the trustees by writing, dated November 1840, to raise a moiety of the expectant shares of three of the children for their benefit; and the trustees, by their answer, stated they were desirous of doing so forthwith.

[27] A motion was now made for payment of the funds and the dividends into Court.

Mr. Pemberton, in support of the motion.

Mr. Stuart, contra, for Mr. and Mrs. Milcham, contended that the order could not be made in the absence of the children, and that the proviso empowering the trustees to advance the children, being intended for their benefit, could not be defeated by the wife's assignment. (But see Noel v. Lord Henley, M'Cl. & Y. 302.)

Mr. Koe, for the trustees.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. One of the objections made to this motion by the lady who has executed the assignment is this. She says, though I have executed the deed and joined in conveying my life-estate to the Plaintiff, yet, as the trustees, with my consent have the power to advance my children, I can defeat my assignment and the rights of my husband, and take away from the Plaintiff that which he had contracted to purchase: and it is broadly stated that she has a right, however fraudulent, to do so. I should be very unwilling to do anything which could in any way affect the rights of the infant children; if they were here, I should have no hesitation in ordering the payment into Court; but they not being here, I think I ought not to make the order at present.

Mr. Pemberton said he would undertake to make them parties.

[28] THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS. If you undertake to make them parties, I shall not have any hesitation in making the order.

NOTE.—The children were made parties, and the cause was heard by Sir J. L. Knight Bruce, on the 15th of July 1842.

[28] HADDELSSEA v. NEVILE. Jan. 21, 1841.

All the Defendants having answered, the Plaintiff obtained an order to amend, and added new Defendants. The answers of the original Defendants became sufficient. Held, that any application for a further order to amend must be made to the Court, and not to the Master.

This was a motion on the part of the Plaintiff, for leave to amend his bill under the following circumstances:—

The bill was filed on the 24th of December 1839, against two Defendants, Nevile and Cartwright, who respectively filed their answers on the 10th and 13th of March following. The last of those answers became sufficient on the 8th of May (4th General Order, 3d of April 1828) (Ordines Can. 6).

On the 10th of June the Plaintiff obtained an order to amend the bill; which he accordingly did, by adding considerably to the statements, and also by making additional Defendants.

The two original Defendants filed their answers on the 31st of October 1840, but the other Defendants had not yet answered.

[29] The Plaintiff having since the last amendment found a letter of the Defendant's, now applied for an order to amend his bill.

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Wright, in support of the motion. The Plaintiff is right in coming to the Court for liberty to amend. The 13th Order, 3d of April 1828 (Ordines Can. 9), is positive that "no order to amend shall be made after answer and before replication, either without notice or upon affidavit in manner hereinbefore mentioned, unless such order be obtained within six weeks after the answer, if there be only one Defendant, or after the last of the answers, if there be two or more Defendants, is to be deemed sufficient." This refers to the time when the answers of the original Defendants became sufficient, which was on the 8th of May; Attorney-General v. Nethercoat (2 Myl. & Cr. 604). After that time, the Master had no jurisdiction to entertain an application for leave to amend under the 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 94, s. 13; Lloyd v. Wait (4 Myl. & Cr. 257).

Mr. James Russell, amongst other objections, contended that the application ought to have been made to the Master first, because the new Defendants had not yet answered, and because when notice of this motion had been given, the answers of the original Defendants to the amended bill could not be deemed sufficient. He also objected that the affidavit in support of the motion was insufficient.

Mr. Pemberton, in reply, contended that the six weeks from the last answer being sufficient, meant six [30] weeks from the last answer to the original bill, so that after the 8th of May the Master had no longer any jurisdiction, otherwise the six weeks might be made to run on at every successive amendment.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale] thought that the Plaintiff was right in coming to the Court in this case, but that the affidavits were defective. He however said he would make the order on the proper affidavits being produced, but the Plaintiff must pay the costs.

See Matchitt v. Palmer, 10 Sim. 241. And as to the cases in which application ought to be made to the Court in the first instance, and not to the Master, see Strickland v. Strickland, post, p. 146.

[30] WIGGINS v. LORD. Jan. 22, 23, 1841.

On a contract for purchase, a part of the purchase-money was paid as a "deposit" to the vendor's solicitor, who paid it away at the desire of the vendor, without the concurrence of the purchaser. This created a difficulty in completing the purchase, as a mortgagee of the estate would not join in the conveyance without payment to him of the deposit. In a suit by the purchaser for specific performance, the solicitors were declared liable to make good the money.

In August 1831 Richard Lord agreed to sell an estate to the Plaintiff, and by the contract it was agreed "that a deposit of £350 should be paid in part of the purchase-money into the hands of Messrs. Harris & Wise," who were the solicitors of the vendor.

The abstract being delivered, it appeared that the estate was subject to mortgages exceeding its value. The mortgagees, however, consented to concur in the sale, on the whole of the purchase-money being paid to the first incumbrance. Messrs. Harris & Wise, [31] without the concurrence of the purchaser, paid over the deposit of £350, according to the order of the vendor, to two of the mortgagees in discharge of interest due to them.

The vendor died. The title was accepted, but a difficulty then arose in completing the purchase, in consequence of the mortgagees refusing to concur, unless the whole of the purchase-money were paid. This was prevented by the circumstance of the deposit having been applied in the manner above stated. It was also alleged by the Defendant that the first mortgagee insisted on a deed being handed over to him which the Defendant Lord (the heir, executor, and devisee of the vendor) stated he was unable to procure.

The bill was filed against Lord alone; but an objection having been taken for want of parties, Messrs. Harris & Wise were made Defendants: the bill prayed a specific performance and payment of the £350.

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. J. Prescott White, for the Plaintiff, asked an inquiry whether the Defendant Lord could procure the concurrence of the mortgagees in the conveyance, and that Lord and Messrs. Harris & Wise might be declared liable to repay the £350.

Mr. Girdlestone and O. Anderdon, for the Defendant Lord.

Mr. Temple and Mr. James Parker, for Messrs. Harris & Wise, contended that the claim as against them was purely legal, and ought to be the subject of an action at law and not of a suit in equity (see Denton v. Stewart, 1 Cox, 258; Greenaway v. Adams, 12 Ves. 395; Todd v. Gee, 17 Ves. 273; Nelson v. Bridges, 2 Beavan, 239); that even the return [32] of a deposit was not the subject of equitable jurisdiction when the vendee was Plaintiff; that it did not appear that the Plaintiff had any interest in the £350; for if the contract were to be completed, it would be part of the purchase-money and would belong to the vendor.

Mr. Pemberton, in reply.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. The Defendants Messrs. Harris & Wise had clearly a duty to perform, which was, to keep the money in their hands as a deposit for the person ultimately entitled. Instead of doing that, they paid it away, according to the direction of the vendor, without regarding their duty to the Plaintiff. It is argued they are not in any way liable for what they have done, because at present it is unknown whether the contract can be completed. But is the purchase-money to remain in the meanwhile in its present situation? The case is put thus: if the contract is to be performed, the deposit will belong to the vendor, and if not performed, then that they must either pay voluntarily, or an action at law must be brought against them for its recovery. I think they and the estate of the vendee are liable to pay this sum, and it must be brought into Court. There must be an inquiry whether the Defendant Lord can procure a proper conveyance, and on what terms, with liberty for the Master to state special circumstances; and there must be a declaration that Messrs. Harris & Wise, and the estate of Lord the vendor, are liable to make good the £350.

[33] FROST v. HAMILTON. Jan. 28, 1841.

Bill by assignee of a trust fund to obtain payment. The trustees having stated they were ignorant as to the execution of the assignment, the Plaintiff moved, under the 5th General Order, 9th May 1839, for a preliminary inquiry as to that fact. Held, that the case was not within the order.

In 1796 General Christie transferred a sum of money in the funds to trustees, in trust as to a moiety for his daughter Mrs. Tunstall, with remainder to her children. Her children, as was alleged by the bill, sold and assigned their reversionary interests to the Plaintiff.

Mrs. Tunstall and all the trustees were dead, and this bill was filed against the executor of the surviving trustee, who had declined to make a transfer of the fund. His answer stated that he knew nothing about the matter, having left it to his solicitor.

The Plaintiff now moved, under the 5th General Order of the 9th of May 1839 (Ordines. Can. 136), for a reference to the Master, to inquire whether any and which of the children of James Tunstall and Sarah his wife executed the indenture of assignment in the pleadings mentioned to bear date the 28th of May 1832, and when they executed the same.

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. R. Palmer, for the Plaintiff.

Mr. Kindersley and Mr. Keene, contrâ.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale] said that he did not consider that this was such a preliminary inquiry as was contemplated by the General Orders, but was a matter proper for proof in the cause.

[34] DAY v. CROFT. Feb. 9, 1841.

Principles on which it was considered necessary, previous to the General Order of 3d April 1841, to serve all parties interested with an application for a stop order.

Mr. Evans made an application similar to that in Trezevant v. Fraser (3 Beavan, p. 283): he cited a case of Martin v. Drinkwater, before the Lord Chancellor, on the 24th of December 1840.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS said he had communicated with the Lord Chancellor on the subject; and found that the order in Martin v. Drinkwater had been obtained without a proper explanation of the facts. He observed that it could not be doubted, where a fund was standing in the names of three persons jointly, and an application was made by one of such persons, for payment of part of the fund, that no order could be made in the absence of the other persons interested. On the same principle, if one of several parties interested came for a stop order on a fund, upon notice to all other parties interested in it, there would be no objection. But in the absence of any provision as to costs it was unjust that a person should obtain an order affecting another party's fund, in his absence; for the latter might afterwards obtain an order for payment of his share; and, on going to the Accountant-General's office, learn, for the first time, that a stop order had been placed on the fund by a stranger. Payment would be refused, and the party would be thus unjustly exposed to delay, inconvenience, and expense. If means could be found of charging the party obtaining a stop order affecting funds in which others were interested with the costs thereby occasioned, it might become proper to grant stop orders, without requiring notice to be given to all parties interested in the fund; but till then no such order ought to be made.

Order refused.

See General Order of April 3, 1841. Ordines. Can. 161.

[35] EVANS v. JOHN. Feb. 13, 1841.

A father, on the marriage of his daughter, agreed to pay, by way of portion, a sum of money to trustees to be held in trust for the husband, daughter, and children of the marriage in succession. The trustees named in the settlement having refused to act, the father paid the money to the husband. Held, that the payment was wrongful; and the money having been lost, the father was held liable, at the suit of a child of the marriage, to pay it a second time.

By the settlement made on the marriage of David Evans with Elizabeth, the daughter of David Griffiths, a settlement, in 1828, dated the 11th of February 1828, was made, whereby, after reciting that it had been agreed that a sum of £300 and other property which David Griffiths had agreed to give as a marriage portion, should be vested in John John and Peter Davies, it was witnessed that Griffiths assigned to John and Davies the sum of £300, in trust for the husband and wife for their lives, with remainder to the children of the marriage.

The deed was never executed by the trustees.

The Plaintiff was the only child of the marriage, and her surviving parent having died in 1837, she filed this bill in January 1838, against John, Davies, and Griffiths, seeking to make them responsible for the £300, which had never been vested in the names of the trustees. Davies had never acted in or accepted the trusts; and John stated that he had never acted or executed the settlement, but that the deed had been delivered to him for safe custody about a week after the marriage, until a proper person should be agreed upon to keep the same; and that it remained in his possession six months, when, no person having been appointed to keep the deed, he delivered it to the wife.

Griffiths, it appeared, paid to D. Evans, the husband, the sum of £260 shortly previous to the marriage; and he paid the remaining £40 on the evening of the marriage [36] to the husband and wife; and he paid the same under the impression that they were competent to receive the same, and give an effectual discharge for the same. The husband died insolvent, and the money was lost. By his answer Griffiths also insisted on the Statute of Limitations.

Mr. Kindersley and Mr. Rolt, for the Plaintiff, insisted on the liability of Griffiths to make good the money lost; and also on the liability of John, either as an actual or constructive trustee.

Mr. George Turner and Mr. Bevir, for the Defendant John, contended that he had never accepted the trusts, and that the possession of the deed and knowledge of its contents, were not sufficient to charge him.

Mr. Pittman, for the Defendant Griffiths. Stacey v. Elph (1 Myl. & K. 195) and Wilkinson v. Parry (4 Russ. 272) were cited.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. I take the facts of this case to be these. The trustees of this settlement refused to accept the trusts. They, however, were the only persons entrusted. Griffiths thought fit to substitute the husband of his daughter for the trustees, and he paid him the money. The money was therefore paid to the wrong person: and it appears it has been lost by his insolvency. There can be no doubt that Griffiths is liable to pay the money again.

As to John, I think there is not enough to charge him as with a breach of trust. Looking at the deed [37] which was in his possession, he could hardly fail to see that he was named a trustee; but, on the other hand, he says he never acted; and it is expressly shewn that he received the deed for safe custody only, until someone else could be found to undertake the trust. I think there is not enough to charge him.

[37] FRANK v. MAINWARING. Nov. 12, 1839; Feb. 19, 1841.

Form of issue for trying the validity of deeds, executed by a party found by inquisition to have been a lunatic from a time anterior to the execution of the deeds.

A bill was filed on behalf of an infant, with the sanction of the Master, to set aside deeds, executed by a lunatic at a time subsequent to that, at which he had been found lunatic by inquisition. An issue having been directed, the jury found in favour of the deeds. The bill was dismissed with costs of suit and of the issue.

This case is reported in 2 Beavan, 115.

It was a suit commenced by an infant by his next friend, under the sanction of a report of the Master in favour of the proceedings.

Its object was to set aside certain deeds executed by the Plaintiff's grandfather, the Reverend Edward Frank, in April 1817, at which time it was alleged he was of unsound mind: he having, in August 1825, been found to be a lunatic, and to have been so from the 25th of October 1816.

He continued a lunatic until his death in 1834.

The Court at the hearing, directed an issue to ascertain whether Edward Frank was of unsound mind when he executed the deeds, &c. The minutes of the decree became the subject of discussion. They were as follows:—

[38] "It is ordered, that the parties do proceed to the trial at law, at the sittings of the Court of Common Pleas, in the county of Middlesex, after Hilary term, then next, upon the following issue, that is to say: whether E. Frank, deceased, in the pleadings named, was of sound mind, so as to be sufficient for the management of himself, his manors, &c., goods, and chattels at the several and respective times following, that is to say: when he executed the indenture of feoffment, bearing date the 15th of April 1817, and the other indenture bearing date the said 15th of April 1817; and when the recovery, had and suffered in Easter term 1817, of the freehold parts of the estates in the pleadings mentioned, was had and suffered; and when he executed the indenture of demise on the 8th of March, and made between, &c., in the records of court rolls of the manor of Tanshelf and Carleton in the county of York; and when he executed the authority or warrant of attorney, or warrant in writing in the said records or court rolls; and when the common recovery had and suffered on the 3d of September 1821, one of the copyhold parts of the said estates held of the manor, &c., was had and suffered, or at either and which of the said times." The Defendant Edward Bacon Frank, who claimed under the deeds, was directed to be Plaintiff in the issue.

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Lovat, supported the minutes.

Mr. Kindersley, Mr. Koe, Mr. Tinney, Mr. Wright, Mr. Walker, and Mr. Hallett, contrà, objected to the minutes, contending that they were too extensive.

The following authorities were referred to: In re Humpbley (Shelford on Lunacy, 262), Jones v. Roberts (Reg. Lib. A. 1830, fo. 397), an unreported [30] case of In re Jervis, before Lord Eldon, and In re Holmes (4 Russ. 182).

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. An inquiry as to the sanity of an individual at a time, overreached by the finding of an inquisition, is one of great difficulty. Here the Plaintiff undertakes to shew that he was "not of sound mind," &c. I think the minutes right.

On the 5th of December 1840 the issue was tried, and the jury found for the Plaintiff in the issue, thereby establishing the sanity of Edward Frank at the time he executed the deeds.

Feb. 19, 1841. The cause now came on for further directions, when

Mr. Lovat argued that, under the circumstances, the Plaintiff in equity ought not to be made to pay the costs of the investigation, and that part of the costs ought to be paid by the Defendants.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS, without hearing the other side, said, if the Plaintiff in equity had succeeded in establishing the allegations of the bill, he would have recovered the estate. Having failed, I see no reason for departing from the ordinary practice; the bill must therefore be dismissed, and the Plaintiff must pay the costs thereof, and of the issue.

Injunction, in a suit for specific performance, to restrain a vendor from letting or selling the estate refused.

This was a bill filed by the purchaser of an estate in Herefordshire, against the vendor for a specific performance of the contract for sale. The bill alleged that the Defendant had, since the contract, let the estate, and he threatened to sell it to another purchaser.

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Stevenson now moved for an injunction to restrain the Defendant from letting the estate, and from selling and conveying the same except to the Plaintiff.

Mr. G. Turner, contrà, contended that there was no valid contract, and that the injunction asked would be nugatory.

Mr. Pemberton, in reply.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale] said that he would not now decide on the validity of the contract; and, as to the injunction to restrain the Defendant from selling or letting, that a purchaser pendente lite, would take subject to the rights of the Plaintiff.

His Lordship refused the motion; but ordered the costs to be costs in the cause.

There is no rule, that a Defendant must answer affirmatively or negatively his own recent facts. All that the Court can do, is to compel a Defendant to afford such a discovery as he swears he is able to give.

By an agreement, dated the 3d of January 1835, the Defendant undertook to grant a lease of a house and premises to a Mr. Foskett, who afterwards transferred the benefit of this agreement to the Plaintiff. The Defendant refusing to complete his contract, this bill was filed in November 1839 for a specific performance.

The bill set out the agreement verbatim, and, amongst other things, interrogated the Defendant "whether the term was not to commence from the time in the bill mentioned, or from some other, and what time?" "And whether the memorandum of agreement was or not in the words, or to the purport and effect thereinbefore in that behalf mentioned and set forth, so far as the same was thereinbefore mentioned and set forth; or in some other words and figures, or to some and what other purport and effect."

The answer stated, that by arrangement between the Defendant and Mr. Foskett, the agreement and counterpart had been burned in January 1839. The Defendant admitted he had agreed to let the house for twenty-one years; but he stated that the agreement being destroyed, he was unable to set forth as to his knowledge, &c., whether or not such term, &c. (following the first of the above interrogatories); or whether the memorandum, &c. (following the second of the above interrogatories).

The Plaintiff took exceptions to this answer for insufficiency, which were allowed by the Master. The [42] Defendant took exceptions to the Master's report, which now came on for argument.

Mr. Bethell and Mr. O. Anderdon, for the Defendant. The Defendant's answer is sufficient on both points. The Defendant has given all the information in his power; and the effect of holding the answer insufficient will be to render the Defendant liable to imprisonment for life, unless he admits the terms of the agreement as stated in the bill, which he swears he does not know. In Farquharson v. Balfour (Turn & Russ. 204), "The Lord Chancellor repeatedly observed, that it was not the truth or consistency of the examination that he was bound to insist upon. That the examination might be quite sufficient, though it might not be true, and that, in deciding upon the question of insufficiency, the principle of the Court was, that the Plaintiff must be satisfied with what the conscience of the Defendant would allow him to swear, for that the Court could give him no more; that if the Plaintiff wished to try the truth of the examination, he must treat it in a different manner, for that although there might be a probability, that that which was sworn was not true, yet that it must be taken to be true; and it was not within the jurisdiction of the Court to try whether it was true or not."

Mr. Bates (in the absence of Mr. Pemberton), for the Plaintiff, contended, that the finding of the Master was right. That the rule of the Court was, that a man's own facts must be answered in the affirmative or negative without traverse; Williams v. Lighton, and Onsald v. Pennant, Tothill 9; and an answer to a matter charged as the Defendant's own fact must be direct, without saying it is to his remembrance, or as he be-[43]-lieveth, if it be laid as done within seven years before. Beames' Orders, 28. Here the agreement was in the Defendant's possession from 1835 to 1839, and he could not, therefore, be permitted to say that he knew nothing about it. That as the Defendant had received the rent, he must therefore know whether it was of the amount stated in the agreement set out in the bill.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. It is probable that the Defendant knows more than is stated in the answer. He has not, however, been interrogated, step by step, as to the rent, and the other particulars of the agreement, but is asked whether the agreement was not to a particular effect, or to some other and what effect? The agreement having been destroyed, the Defendant says he is unable to set forth whether it was to the effect stated, or to what other effect. It is possible he may be able to answer some of the particulars in detail if put to him by amendment; but considering the way in which the bill and the interrogatories are framed, I think the answer is sufficient.

With regard to the rule stated, that a man must either admit or deny his own recent facts, it is possible that a Defendant, with the most delicate conscience, may be unable to do so; and I know of no means, by which a discovery can be obtained from a Defendant, as to matters on which he swears he is ignorant. All that the Court can do, is to get from him such an answer as he swears he is able to give; it can do no more than compel him to state the impression on his mind. If his statement can be proved to be untrue, he will be liable to the penalties of perjury.

[44] GREENWOOD v. EVANS. March 2, April 2, 1841.

Leaseholds for lives being devised in trust for parties in succession, with a direction to renew out of the rents or by mortgage. The Court sanctioned a reference to the Master to inquire whether it would be for the benefit of all parties that the future fines for renewal should be provided by an insurance on the lives of the cestui que vie.

Difficulties in arranging the proportions of the fines which the parties in succession ought to bear in such cases.

The question in this case was, as to the mode in which the fines for the renewal of church leaseholds ought to be provided for and paid, as between the parties entitled thereto in succession, under the will of the testator.

It appeared that the testator, John Bowle, was entitled to a lease of the rectory and tithes of Idminster, under the Dean and Chapter of Salisbury, which was held by him for the lives of himself and two other persons, and for the life of the survivor.

By his will, dated in 1836, he confirmed the settlement made on the marriage of his daughter Anna Maria Evans; and, inasmuch as the Winterborne estate thereby settled was subject to the life-estates of John Templeman and Nathaniel Templeman, he gave to the trustees of the settlement "two-thirds of the clear net proceeds" of the great tithes of Idminster, to be payable during the lives of John Templeman and Nathaniel Templeman, and to be applied in the same manner as the rents of the Winterborne estate would be applicable if J. Templeman and N. Templeman were dead.

And he gave certain specific property, and the impropriate rectory and tithes of Idminster, and all the residue of his real estate, subject to the trusts aforesaid, unto his trustees, "Upon trust to cause themselves to be admitted to the said copyhold premises, and by and out of the rents, issues, and profits, or by mortgage thereof, or any or any part thereof, to levy and raise the [45] fines and fees to become payable thereupon; and at the usual times and periods, or at such other times or periods as the trustees or trustee for the time being should deem expedient, to use their or his best endeavours to procure a renewal of the lease or leases of such of the same premises as were held under any renewable lease or leases; and out of the rents, issues, and profits of the same premises, in the meantime, or by mortgage thereof, if found expedient, levy and raise a sufficient sum or sums of money for paying the fines and other expenses of the said renewal or renewals; and for the purposes aforesaid, to surrender the subsisting lease or leases, for the time being, of the same leasehold premises, and stand possessed of the said freehold and copyhold estates thereinbefore mentioned, to be thereby lastly devised, and also of the said leasehold premises, as well in the meantime until, as subsequently to, any renewal under the trusts aforesaid, upon trust for his daughter Isabella Bowle for life," with power to her to appoint a life-estate to any husband with whom she might intermarry; with remainder to her children, with remainders over.

After the death of the testator the Plaintiffs, the trustees and executors, applied, out of the personal estate, a sum of £1153 in the renewal of the lease of the great tithes of Idminster; and in order to provide a fund for the payment of the fine upon the future renewal of the leaseholds, they effected a policy of assurance on the lives of the cestui que vie named in the lease, for the sum of £1150.

In taking the accounts of the testator's estate, the Master had disallowed these payments to the Plaintiffs.

The cause now came on for further directions.

[46] Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Bird, for the Plaintiff.

Mr. Lee, for the trustees of Mr. Evan's settlement.

Mr. Anderdon, for Isabella Bowle.

Mr. James Russell, for the children of Mrs. Evans.

The point argued was, as to the proportions of the fines of renewal which the several parties entitled in succession to the leasehold estate should bear; and in what manner the fines for the future renewals should be provided for. It was contended, that the most equitable and convenient mode for all parties would be by keeping up an insurance on the lives of the cestui que vie out of the yearly rents, and thus, upon its becoming necessary to renew, a fund would be provided for that purpose.

Playfers v. Abbott (2 Myl. & K. 97), The Earl of Shaftesbury v. The Duke of Marlborough (Id. 111), and Nightingale v. Lawson (1 B. C. C. 441), were cited.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale] during the argument, observed on the very great difficulty which arose in cases of this description, in arranging the liabilities of the parties entitled in succession to renewable leaseholds. He remarked, that if a tenant for life was bound only to keep down the interest on a mortgage effected for the purpose of renewing, the party in remainder might become entitled to the lease when nearly expiring, and yet have to bear the whole of the principal money raised by mortgage for its formal renewal; that the remainder-man would thus sustain a considerable burthen, [47] without receiving a corresponding benefit. That, besides this, if the tenant for life paid the interest merely, and no fund was provided for ultimately paying off the mortgage, the estate might be wholly destroyed by the accumulation of monies charged on the estate for the purposes of renewal.

On the other hand, that in making the parties bear the burthen in proportion to their enjoyment, great difficulty would arise, in some instances, in arriving at anything like an accurate calculation of the relative liabilities.

His Lordship, however, expressed himself favourable to the mode proposed, of providing a fund by means of an insurance on the lives of the cestui que vie, if that could be done consistently with the practice of the Court.

April 2. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS again mentioned the case, and approved of a principle which was embodied in the following order:—

"Declare, that the sum of £1153, 6s., paid by the Plaintiffs for the fine, fees, and expenses of and attending the renewal by them of the testator's said lease of the tithes of Idminster, &c., is a charge upon the same leasehold premises, and that the interest due, and to accrue due thereon, ought to be paid out of the yearly proceeds of the said tithes, parsonage house, glebe lands, and premises, and ought to be borne by the respective tenants for life of the same premises, under the said testator John Bowle's will, in proportion to the yearly value of their respective shares of such proceeds, and let it be referred to the said Master to apportion the [48] same accordingly. And declare, that the persons interested in the clear net proceeds issuing out of and arising from the great tithes of Idminster, devised by the said testator John Bowle's will to the trustees of the marriage settlement of the testator's daughter, the Defendant Anna Maria Evans, during the lives of John Templeman, Nathaniel Templeman, and the life of the survivor of them, ought to bear a proportion of the aforesaid charge of £1153, 6s. with reference to the benefit derived by them from the aforesaid renewal by the Plaintiffs of the lease of the said tithes, &c. And let it be referred to the said Master to inquire and state to the Court, what is the amount of such benefit, and how the ultimate payment of such amount may be best secured or provided for, and whether the Defendant, Isabella Bowle, derives any benefit from the aforesaid renewal, and, if so, what is the amount of such benefit, and how such amount may be best secured or provided for. And let the said Master also inquire and state to the Court, whether it will be for the benefit of all parties interested, that the said £1153, 11s. advanced by the Plaintiffs out of the residuary personal estate of the testator John Bowle, upon the security of the deed of the 5th of January 1837, in the Master's report mentioned, should be continued on such security. And, by consent, let it be referred to the Master to inquire and state to the Court, whether the effecting the policy of insurance, in the Master's report mentioned to have been effected by the Plaintiffs, in order to procure a fund for a renewal of the lease of the said tithes, parsonage house, glebe lands, and premises granted to the Plaintiffs as aforesaid upon the dropping of any life therein named, was for the benefit of all parties interested, and whether it will be for their benefit that future renewals of the said lease, upon the dropping of any other life or lives, should be provided for in like [49] manner; and that the yearly premiums payable upon the policies effected, and to be effected, for that purpose, and the expenses of effecting the same, should be paid out of the rents and profits of the same leasehold premises; and what proportions, if any, of such premiums and expenses, ought to be borne by the respective tenants for life of the same premises, under the said testator John Bowle's will, or in what other manner it would be most for the benefit of all parties interested, that the renewals of the said lease should be, from time to time, provided for."

[49] MOUSLEY v. CARR. March 4, 1841.

- A trustee wilfully applying trust monies to his own use is chargeable with interest at 5 per cent. ; but where, under the trusts of a doubtful will, the tenant for life, who was also a trustee, neglected to make proper investments, she was held chargeable with interest at 4 per cent. only and the decree was made without costs.
- A testator gave his real and personal estate to trustees, in trust to permit his wife to receive "the annual produce, interest, rents, and profits thereof" for life; and after her death, in trust to stand seised and possessed of the said real and personal estate for A. and B. And he directed his trustees to carry on his partnership trade, in which he was engaged, or such part as they should think proper, for the benefit of his wife and those in remainder. Sir John Leach held that the widow was entitled to any increase in the value of the testator's capital, which took place between the death and the expiration of the partnership; but the decision was reversed by Lord Brougham.

The testator, Thomas Hardcastle, was engaged in partnership with two other persons as a coal merchant, and in working coal mines, of which they had obtained a lease. He was entitled to one-third thereof, and of the plant, machinery, &c., and of the lease of the mines, which expired in 1806.

By his will, dated the 2d of July 1789, he devised and bequeathed his real and personal estate to his wife and Robert Berry, in trust to permit and suffer his said wife to have, receive, and take the use, annual produce, [50] interest, rents and profits thereof, and of every part thereof, for and during the term of her natural life, subject only to the payment of the legacy and annuity thereafter mentioned; and from and after the death of his said wife, in trust to stand seised and possessed of and in the said real and personal estates for the benefit of his nephew John Hardcastle, and his niece Elizabeth Haynes, their respective heirs, executors, and administrators, as tenants in common, and not as joint-tenants; and the testator directed his trustees to carry on his partnership concerns under the firm of Hustler, Hardcastle & Co., or dependent thereon, or so many and such parts thereof as they should think proper, or be obliged, for the benefit of his said wife during her life, and afterwards for the benefit of the persons to whom he had thereby given the residue of his estate. And he declared that his executors should not be, in anywise, liable for any business they might carry on respecting his effects or property, or wherein he was engaged or in anywise connected, or wherein they might be connected by means of his present engagements in business.

The testator died in the same year, and his will was afterwards proved by his widow and by Berry.

The widow principally acted. She received the assets and carried on the partnership business until the expiration of the lease in 1806, when the partnership was dissolved. Upon that event she received the amount of the one-third share of the partnership business. She made no investment on account of the testator's estate, and died in December 1826.

This bill was filed in May 1827 by the representatives of John Hardcastle against the executors of Mrs. [51] Hardcastle and others, simply praying an account of the estate of the testator, but raising the question of construction on the will of the testator, as to the widow's rights in respect of the trade which had been carried on under the trusts of the will.

The cause having come on for further directions in June 1834, Sir John Leach referred it to the Master to ascertain what was the value of the testator's capital engaged in the partnership trade in the pleadings mentioned at the time of the testator's death, or at the next settlement. And His Honor did declare that Mary Hardcastle was entitled to any increase in the value of such capital which might have taken place between the time of the death of the testator and the expiration of the partnership. (See Goodenough v. Tremamondo, 2 Beavan, 514, and the cases in the note.) On the 20th of November 1834 Lord Brougham however held, on appeal, that she was not entitled to the increase, and decreed accordingly; and it was referred to the Master to take the accounts, who found a large balance due from her estate.

In 1836 and 1840 respectively the executors of the widow paid into Court two sums, amounting in the whole to £4319, being the total balance found due from her estate.

The cause now came on for further directions, and the questions were first, as to the mode in which the widow ought to be charged; and secondly, as to the costs of the suit.

Mr. Bethell and Mr. L. Wigram contended, that the widow had committed a breach of trust for her own [52] benefit, by retaining in her hands monies which she ought to have invested, and that she ought to be charged with the stock which would have been produced if the fund had been invested; or at least with the monies and 5 per cent. interest; and that her executors ought out of her assets to pay all the costs of the suit.

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Lloyd, contra, argued that this suit had been rendered necessary by the doubtful construction of the testator's will. That the rights of the parties could not be determined except by a suit; and that as the widow had acted bona fide, and had even been held by Sir John Leach to be right in her notion of the true construction of the will, she ought not to be charged with the investments which might have been made; and that if charged with interest, it should be at the rate of 4 per cent. only, and not 5; they contended also that the costs of the suit, which was for the administration of the testator's estate, ought to be paid, as usual, out of the testator's assets.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. The prayer originally was for an account of the testator's estate; but afterwards, questions arose as to the relative rights of the widow, and the parties entitled in remainder, which depended on the construction of the testator's will. Sir John Leach thought the widow was entitled to any increase in the testator's capital; but Lord Brougham reversed that decree. It is not for me to make any observations on that order: it is my duty implicitly to act on it; but I must say this, that the expense of the suit has principally arisen in consequence of the difficulty in construing this will, on which two Judges have entertained different opinions.

[53] If a trustee having trust money in his hands, knowingly applies it to his own use or in his trade, he is charged with interest at the rate of 5 per cent. Here it is admitted that the money was applied by the widow to her own use; but did she know that it was trust money, which it was her duty to invest? She could not have known it, for it depended on the taking of the accounts, the mode of doing which could only be ascertained upon the determination of the true construction of this doubtful will; and this remained a matter of doubt till the decision was pronounced by the Court upon appeal. I should be afraid to say, that if in a case of doubtful construction of a will, an executor makes a mistake, and afterwards it turns out upon the decree, that he was in error, he should be treated as a trustee wilfully committing a breach of trust. I think that this lady's estate must be charged with interest after the rate of 4 per cent. and no more.

The question as to the costs of the suit depends in some degree on the same points. The answer admitted that the widow applied this money to her own use, and states that no balance was due from her; a balance has, however, been found due from her on taking the account. If she had had no personal interest, and had been a mere trustee or executor, I should have thought that she was not only not chargeable with the costs, but entitled to them. That she committed a mistake is now beyond all doubt, according to the decision on the appeal, but, under these circumstances, I think that the decree must be made without costs.

[54] DAVIES v. DAVIES. March 5, 1841.

By marriage articles, a husband covenanted, in consideration of his wife's portion, to settle an estate to his own use, and after his decease to the use of his heirs on the body of his intended wife, and for want of such issue to his own right heirs for ever. The articles did not express any further intention of providing for the children of the marriage, and made a provision for the intended wife in lieu of dower. No settlement was executed; and the husband mortgaged the estate, and at the same time delivered the articles to the mortgagee. Held, on his death, that under the articles, he was entitled to a life-estate only, and that the mortgagee took with notice, and could not therefore hold as against the issue of the marriage.

In 1772 a marriage was agreed upon between John Davies and Elinor Davies, and by articles of agreement made between James Jenkins (the grandfather of John Davies), of the first part; John Davies of the second part; and Mary Davies (the grandmother of Elinor Davies), of the third part, it was agreed, in consideration of £40 to be paid to John Davies, with a good and valuable chamber furniture by Mary Davies, immediately after the said intended marriage should take effect, as the portion of the said Elinor Davies, in consideration of which and of the natural love and affection which the said John Davies bore, and for other valuable considerations him thereunto moving, the said John Davies, covenanted with the said Mary Davies to convey and settle, by feoffment or otherwise, specified freehold estate belonging to him; to have and to hold the said demised lands and premises to the uses, intents, and purposes thereafter mentioned, declared, and expressed; that is to say, "to the only proper use and behoof of the aforesaid John Davies; and after the time of the decease of the said John Davies, and from and after his decease, to the use and behoof of the heirs of the said John Davies, begotten or to be lawfully begotten on the body of the said Elinor Davies, and for want of such issue to the right heirs and assigns of the said John Davies for ever." The articles of agreement also provided for the payment of an annuity to Elinor Davies, in case she should survive John Davies, in lieu of dower and right of dower.

[55] The marriage took effect, but no settlement was ever executed.

In 1817 John Davies mortgaged the premises by demise to Evan Davies, and for better security John Davies and his wife levied a fine of the premises. The articles were thereupon handed over to the mortgagee.

John Davies survived his wife, and died in 1833, leaving the Plaintiff, the eldest son of the marriage. By this bill, filed against the representatives of Evan Davies, the Plaintiff sought to have the estate conveyed to him as tenant in tail, discharged of the mortgage.

Mr. Rolt, in the absence of Mr. Pemberton, for the Plaintiff, contended that the articles being executory and in the nature of heads for a future agreement, the Court, in carrying it into execution, would limit an estate for life only to the parent, and an estate tail to the children as purchasers.

That the mortgagee took with notice of the articles, and was therefore affected by the trusts thereof, and could not retain the estate as against the claim of the Plaintiff.

Mr. George Turner and Mr. Piggott, contra. The Court in carrying into execution marriage articles, will mould the words of limitation, and give to the parent an estate for life, only in those cases where it appears to have been the intention of the parties to provide for their issue; but no such intention appears upon the present articles; there is no intention recited of benefiting the children of the marriage; the whole scope of the settlement is to secure a jointure to the [56] widow, in consideration of the £40 paid by her grandmother.

The jointure is given "in lieu of dower and right of dower," and she could have no right to dower in the property unless her husband took an estate of inheritance. It is clear, therefore, that the intention was that the husband should take such an estate as would give his wife a claim to dower thereout, unless otherwise provided for.

On the question of notice, they contended, that a purchaser was not bound to take notice of an equity arising out of the mere construction of words which are uncertain; Cordwell v. Mackrill (2 Eden, 344); and that here the mortgagee might well suppose that the mortgagor was entitled to charge the estate. Cusack v. Cusack (6 Bro. P. C. 116) and White v. Thornburgh (2 Vern. 702) were cited.

Mr. Blunt and Mr. Evans, for other parties.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. With respect to the merits of this case there is really no reasonable doubt. The Plaintiff is the eldest surviving son of John Davies; and it appears that on the occasion of his father's marriage, articles were entered into on which the question in this case arises. That question is, whether there was an intention to benefit the children of the marriage. I should rather expect that a negative was to be proved by the party who denied it. It is said there is no such intention, because it is not recited: but there is a provision made for the "heirs of John Davies to be begotten on the body of Elinor Davies." I am, therefore, surprised at the inference drawn.

[57] It is then objected that the intention of benefiting the children is inconsistent with the estate of inheritance in the father. But the argument that an estate of inheritance in the husband must be inferred from the fact of the widow taking a provision in bar of dower, may just as easily be turned the other way; and it would be quite as plausible to say, that since the husband does not take such an estate under the settlement as to entitle his widow to dower, therefore another provision shall be made for her in lieu of it. On these articles, I do not think that there is any reasonable ground, for inducing the Court to act at variance with the general principle which is to make a provision if possible for the children of the marriage.

The Court in these cases adopts this principle, that there shall not be such an estate in the parent as wholly to deprive the children of the marriage of every benefit; for this purpose, where an estate of inheritance is, by marriage articles, given to the parent, the Court, in executing the settlement, will cut it down to a life-estate, in order to effect the intention of providing for the issue of the marriage.

When the mortgage was made, the articles themselves were delivered over to the mortgagee; and it is ingeniously argued that these limitations are so difficult to be construed, that the mortgagee might have supposed that the mortgagor was entitled to an estate of inheritance. But here is first an estate limited to John Davies:—this might have misled an ignorant person; but it goes on further; and says that after his decease the estate is to go to the heirs of John Davies on the body of his wife. Here at least there was a clear and distinct intention of benefiting the issue of the marriage, which could not have misled an unprofessional person.

[58] The possession of these articles gave to the mortgagee a sufficient notice of the Plaintiff's title, and the Plaintiff is therefore entitled to the relief he asks, with costs.

[58] TOWNSEND v. WESTACOTT. July 14, 1841.

[See S. C. with note, 2 Beav. 340; 48 E. R. 1212.]

Voluntary settlement, by a party considerably indebted and who became insolvent within three years after, set aside as fraudulent.

Trustee of a voluntary settlement was made a party to a bill to set it aside. The decree setting it aside was made without costs as against the trustee.

This case is reported in 2 Beavan, 340, and now came on upon the Master's report.

The Master reported that debts were due from the settlor at the time of executing the voluntary settlement to the amount of £3500.

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Chandless asked for a declaration, that the deed was fraudulent and void; for an account of the receipts of Loosemore, the trustee, thereunder, and that he might pay the costs.

Mr. Elderton, contra, did not argue that the deed ought not to be set aside; but submitted that Loosemore ought not to pay the costs, for it was not alleged that he was cognizant of the insolvency of the settlor; besides which, he was a mere trustee, and as such a necessary party to the suit and ought rather to have his costs. He observed, that the bill stated, that previous to the institution of the suit, an application had been made to him, to concur in a sale of the estate, for the benefit of the creditors, and that he had refused; his answer however stated, that he consented to comply on being indemnified. That this was a reasonable requirement, inasmuch as there was an infant and a married woman who claimed under the deed.

[59] THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. The deed must be declared void. As to Loosemore he claims under a fraudulent party, and has interfered with the right of the proper owners of the property. I will, therefore, neither give him nor make him pay costs.

[59] JACKSON v. COCKER. March 11, 12, 1841.

The purchaser of "script certificates" in a proposed railway company which had not obtained any Act of Parliament: Held, after the Act had passed, and in the absence of any special contract, not bound to take a transfer of the corresponding shares from his vendor, or to indemnify him from the amount of calls subsequently made.

In the year 1836 a railroad between Bolton and Preston was projected; and an Act of Parliament being necessary for the purpose of effecting it, the promoters of the undertaking entered into a subscriber's agreement, by which they severally agreed to contribute to the expenses of procuring the Act of Parliament, and to take a specified number of shares. They also signed the subscription contract, required by the Standing Orders of the House of Commons. (Halcombe, Supplement, 8, 78.)

Script certificates were thereupon issued, in the following form:—

"Bolton and Preston Railway certificate.

"£50 Share. No. 1232.

"The holder of this certificate, having signed the subscriber's agreement and executed the Parliamentary contract, is the proprietor of the above share in this undertaking.

"B. DOBSON. } Members of the Committee.
"B. HICKS. }

"Bolton, 19th July 1836."

[60] In August 1836, and before the passing of the Act of Parliament, the Plaintiff sold forty of the script certificates, some of which stood in his own name, to the Defendant for £100. No particular contract was entered into on the occasion, but the Defendant, on payment of the money, received and retained the certificates.

In 1837 the Bolton and Preston Railway Act passed (1 Vict. c. cxxi., local and personal) whereby the company was made a corporation: was empowered to raise money in shares, and issue certificates, which were to be prima facie evidence of the title to shares; and the shares were to be transferable by writing. The Act also contained the other usual clauses in Railway Acts.

The bill stated, that several calls had been made on the shares since their purchase, and insisted that the Defendant, having purchased and accepted the certificates, was bound to take transfers of the shares, and to pay the calls and indemnify the Plaintiff thereupon; but that he had refused so to do. That the Plaintiff had become exposed and liable to be sued at law and in equity for payment of the amount of the calls; and that he had been called upon, and required to pay the same, and had been threatened with proceedings for the non-payment of the same.

The bill prayed the specific performance of the agreement to purchase the forty shares, and that the Defendant might indemnify the Plaintiff against the calls on the shares, &c., and, if necessary, might be decreed to take a transfer thereof.

The Defendant stated that he bought the certificates on a speculation to sell them at an increased price, [61] but without any idea of having them transferred to him.

Evidence was entered into, to shew what, in the market, was understood to be the liabilities of purchasers of script certificates, in the absence of any special contract. The cause now came on for hearing.

Mr. Tinney and Mr. Walker, for the Plaintiff. The Defendant, having agreed to purchase these particular shares, is bound, in equity, to perform his contract, and clothe himself with all the liabilities in respect of them. It would be most unreasonable if he were entitled to the benefit of any rise in the shares, leaving the Plaintiff subject to all the liabilities, if the speculation did not succeed. When a party purchases property, though nothing is expressed to that effect, the law will imply a contract to indemnify the vendor in respect of liabilities attached to that property. Thus where a leasehold was assigned, by deed-poll, subject to the covenants, the Court of K. B. held that the assignee, by an implied contract, was bound to indemnify the assignor from the consequences of breaches of covenants in the lease; Burnett v. Lynch (5 B. & C. 589). In the same way, where the purchaser of an equity of redemption enters into no personal obligation with the vendor, to save him harmless from the mortgage debt: "yet this Court, if he receives possession, and has the profits, would, independent of contract, raise upon his conscience an obligation to indemnify the vendor against the personal obligation to pay the money due upon the vendor's transaction of mortgage; for, being become the owner of the estate, he must be supposed to intend to indemnify the vendor against the mortgage;" Waring v. Ward (7 Ves. 337).

[62] This is properly a case for equitable interference: adequate relief cannot be obtained at law; Doloret v. Rothschild (1 Sim. & St. 590).

Mr. Kindersley and Mr. James Russell, contra. This is a case of the first impression. The Defendant has fully performed every contract entered into on his part, and if a contract, different from that which the Defendant agreed to enter into is to be implied, the remedy ought to have been by an action at law, and not by coming into equity, for relief on a legal title. The Defendant never contracted to become a shareholder; he became the mere purchaser of a paper called "a certificate," which conferred no rights, and imposed no obligations. It is proved that, by the custom of brokers and persons dealing with such certificates, a purchaser contracts no liability towards the vendor, unless there be a special contract.

The contract, if any, is not such as to be the foundation for relief. Here it was illegal, "inasmuch as it was bargaining about an Act of Parliament to be obtained in future," which Lord Tenterden thought void by the common law; Josephs v. Pebrer (3 B. & C. 639).

Mr. Tinney, in reply.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. This has very justly been termed a bill of the first impression; for I certainly know of no bill in the least degree like it. The case has been brought forward in great confusion, and very imperfectly; but the Defendant, by waiving the advantage of that confusion, and by agreeing to have this considered as a case founded [63] on the facts as now admitted, has relieved the case from many difficulties which might otherwise have arisen in that respect.

The bill is filed for the specific performance of an alleged agreement for the purchase of certain shares in a railway company. It seems that in the month of July 1836, certain persons proposed to apply for an Act authorizing the construction of a railway from Bolton to Preston. For that purpose they entered into subscriptions; and we may assume they contemplated raising a capital to defray the expenses of applying for promoting the progress of and completing the Act of Parliament, and for executing the necessary works if the Act should be obtained. Two things were important for them to do; one was to come to such an agreement amongst themselves as should provide for a due contribution towards the expenses in all events, whether the project should succeed or not. Another was, that they should comply with the regulations which have been adopted by Parliament in cases of applications for bills of this nature, and which require that a contract which is called a "subscription contract," shall be signed in a particular manner. The common effect of Acts of Parliament of this sort when passed, is, as we know, to incorporate the persons who have subscribed, or shall subscribe, towards the undertaking, and their several and respective successors, executors, &c., to enable them to raise money amongst themselves to a limited amount; and to divide that amount into shares, which are to be transferable; but the transferable shares in the capital are the result of the Act and of the powers and privileges given by the Act. Subscription contracts must be made to a certain amount and in a certain manner, before the bill can be introduced into the house. Now in this, as in all other cases of the kind, the per-[64]-sons who subscribe for the purpose of obtaining the Act and the fruits of the Act, very naturally proportion their subscriptions to the amount of the shares which they desire either to possess or to have the means of dealing with; and their hopes or expectations of obtaining shares or the right to deal with shares, have been commonly, but very erroneously, called "shares." But the Act alone when passed constitutes shares, and makes them transferable. Here, however, the subscribers have divided their subscriptions into shares, and have taken upon themselves to grant certificates as evidence of the right to shares, or of the right to obtain shares; these certificates have been often considered as evidence of the shares, and to distinguish them from the real title to shares, they have been called as in this case "script certificates." Not only have such certificates been granted, but they have been bought and sold; and as all of us must too well know, they have been made the means of gambling, bribery, and frauds of the most extensive character. Whether they are legal, is a question which might deserve greater consideration than it has received to-day, and I am by no means disposed to treat lightly the suggestions of Lord Tenterden in Josephs v. Pebrer (3 B. & C. 644); and nothing has occurred to incline me to think that that question is not one worthy of most serious consideration. It does not however appear to me necessary to decide it on the present occasion; and considering that there is here no imputation of fraud or malpractice of any kind, we are to look to the nature and facts of the transaction, and see if there is any such right as that claimed by the Plaintiff.

The subscriber's contract was entered into on the 13th of July 1836, and, as it is admitted, before the date of [65] one of the certificates which has been produced; and certain persons having subscribed, and made themselves liable to the expenses, having done what was necessary to induce Parliament to entertain the bill, they called these subscriptions "shares," and issued certificates thereof, which were thus expressed, "The holder of this certificate having signed the subscriber's agreement, and executed the Parliamentary contract, is the proprietor of the above share in this undertaking;" that is, a proprietor of a share which could not be constituted or exist until the Act of Parliament incorporating the company and giving them the means of having a transferable joint stock, had passed. The holder, too, "is the proprietor of the above share;" but when is he the proprietor? upon "having signed the subscriber's agreement, and executed the Parliamentary contract." Assuming that which is not proved, that the first holder of this certificate had done this and obtained this certificate, he would not be the proprietor, but the person who, if the Act of Parliament passed, would be entitled to become the proprietor of the share. Having such a certificate, the Plaintiff passes it for valuable consideration into the hands of a third person, who signs no special agreement and does nothing in any way to bind him to indemnify the party from whom he received it from his liabilities in respect of the subscriber's agreement or the Parliamentary contract; and who signs no agreement engaging to become a proprietor in the undertaking, but simply pays a sum of money (£3 a share in this case), and receives what is termed the "certificate." Then here is a certificate in the hands of a person who has done nothing whatever but paid a sum of money, who has neither signed the "subscriber's agreement" nor the "Parliamentary contract;" and who is neither at the present time nor prospectively, "the proprietor of the above share in this undertaking," [66] because he is not the person who has done these things.

The whole argument in favour of the Plaintiff, as I collect it, is this: having possessed himself of his certificate, he must be understood, by law, to have taken with it an obligation to do all necessary things to constitute himself a proprietor, and thereby indemnify the party from whom he has received it; or if he does not become a proprietor before the other party has been subjected to liabilities, then, besides becoming a proprietor, which would exonerate the other party from all future liabilities, he ought also to do some act by which he may exonerate that party from all past liabilities which may have been incurred.

We come, then, to the real question, whether in a transaction of this nature the law will raise such an implied special contract as is contended for? I have listened in vain for any satisfactory reason to convince me that there is any such implied contract. All that the Defendant has done is this: he has obtained a certificate expressed with studied ambiguity, but which tells him that upon doing certain things he will become a proprietor if the Act passes; but all these circumstances must concur to make him a proprietor.

One argument used was rather extraordinary. It is said that brokers who deal in these certificates found that they could not procure so good a sale if they clearly expressed that which the vendor intended; and then the vendor, or the broker acting as the agent of the vendor, intending that the law should raise, by implication, a contract, but not thinking proper to express it, because if he did the purchaser would be put on his guard and would not enter into the engagement, expresses the matter am- [67] -biguously; the vendor, it is argued, is afterwards to take advantage of the ambiguity, and fix on the purchaser an obligation, which the contract (if such it may be called), does not import, and which the purchaser did not intend.

This is called a purchase of shares when it is a purchase of mere certificates, and the question is, whether there is a contract on the part of the Defendant to become a proprietor at all events? I cannot find it expressed, and I cannot raise it by implication of law. There is not, in my opinion, any evidence of such an agreement as the Plaintiff seeks to have specifically performed; and the bill must therefore be dismissed, with costs.

[67] ATTORNEY-GENERAL V. THE DRAPERS' COMPANY. (KENDRICK'S CHARITY.)
March 19, 1841.

[S. C. 4 Beav. 305.]

A. B. bequeathed to a company a sum to purchase lands of the clear value of £100 a year, and gave £96 to charity, and "the residue of the said sum of £100, being £4 yearly, to the company for their pains." Held, that all the objects were entitled rateably to the increased rents.

Accounts in a charity case limited to the filing of the bill, where, from the institution of the charity, the funds had been improperly applied, the trustees retaining for themselves more than they were entitled to.

Where charity trustees have, from accident and without wilful default, committed an error, which they take the first opportunity to correct, the Court does not make them pay costs, though a decree is made against them; but the rule does not apply, where they set up their interests adversely in the suit.

The testator, John Kendrick, by his will, dated in 1624, bequeathed to the Drapers' Company "the sum of £2400 to purchase lands and hereditaments to the clear yearly value of £100 for ever over and above all charges and reprises, and with the same to perform the good uses thereafter mentioned, that is to say:—"

[68] The testator then gave ten several sums, amounting in the whole to £96, to several distinct charitable objects, which it is unnecessary to specify; and he then proceeded as follows:—"The residue of the said sum of £100 a year (being £4 yearly) for ever, I entreat the four wardens of the same company to accept for their pains, to be equally divided between them, by 20s. to each of them, for the time being, yearly, for ever."

The testator died in 1624; and the sum of £2400 was paid to the company in January 1625. In the following year the sum of £2500, composed of the charitable legacy of £2400 and a legacy of £100 left by the testator to the company to buy plate, was lent to the East India Company at £6, 10s. per cent.

In 1637 the company laid out £2550 in the purchase of freeholds producing an annual rent of £170. They were burnt down at the Great Fire; but the property was afterwards let out on building leases, and now produced a rental of £311 a year. The company, however, applied £96 only to the charitable objects mentioned in the will; and carried the surplus, after payment of incidental expenses, of about £18 per annum, to their general funds.

This was an information filed by the Attorney-General, praying a declaration, that the whole rents ought to be applied to the purposes of the will; and that the company might make good the amount retained by them.

The Defendants, by their answer, stated, that of the £2550, £150 was part of their own proper monies, and not derived from the charitable gift. The entry in their books, however, stated it to be "advanced by the com-[69]-pany for the mainteyning of Mr. Kendrick's charitable bequests, which the company is interested with to see performed." The answer also stated, that the surplus, though carried to their general fund, had from time to time been expended in charitable gifts, "and that this course had been pursued for a great number of years."

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Blunt, in support of the information, contended that this was not a gift, subject to an obligation to apply a fixed sum; but a trust to purchase lands of £100 a year, which was distributed, by the testator's will, amongst different objects, in a way which exhausted the whole. That any increase, therefore, in the revenues, must be apportioned amongst the different objects. They asked that the company might account for the surplus for twenty-four years back, and might pay the costs.

Mr. Kindersley and Mr. E. Lloyd, contrâ. The trust was to purchase £100 a year, and the company having performed that trust became entitled to the surplus.

If the company have acted under an erroneous construction of the will, they have followed the usage of their predecessors, practised for years. No application was made to them previous to filing the information. The accounts ought, therefore, to be limited to the time of filing of the information, and the Defendants ought not, under such circumstances, to be visited with costs; Attorney-General v. Caius College (2 Keen, 150).

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. Upon the construction of the will, I do not entertain the least doubt. I am of opinion that the testator intended the whole income of the property to be applied to the purposes he has specifically stated in his will; and that he did not intend to give to the company any surplus which might exist beyond the £96. It seems the company, having received this legacy of £2400, did not immediately apply it, according to the trusts of the will, in the purchase of lands. There is no imputation upon them, I apprehend, in that respect, because they might not have had an immediate opportunity of doing so; but what they did, was to lend it out upon interest at $6\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., which produced £156 a year. That income stood in the place of the income which would have been received from the rents of the lands to be purchased. That sum the company received, but did not apply it to the purposes of the charity. In the year 1637 an opportunity occurred of making an investment in land; and at that time, I think, they must be considered as accountable for the surplus income which had not been applied to the purposes of the charity. The land they agreed to purchase required a sum of £2550, being £150 more than the charitable legacy; and the next question which is raised upon this information is, whether the sum of £150 ought to be considered as a sum contributed by the company, out of their own funds, towards this purchase, and in respect of which, they are entitled to a beneficial interest in the land which was purchased. If this could really be considered as their own money, and contributed by them, a question might be raised whether they did not, by this mode of dealing, devote it to the purposes of this charity; but without saying whether that could be maintained or not, I think the justice of the case requires that they should be considered as having been chargeable with the surplus interest for twelve years, and that the purchaser ought in equity and justice to be considered as made for the charity. The £150 must [71] be regarded as contributed out of the debt due from them; and therefore the whole land must be considered as belonging to the charity.

There are only two remaining questions, first as to the costs of the suit, and next, as to the time from which the account ought to be carried back. Now here the company have undoubtedly been acting upon the impression that they were right in what they did. They appear to have proceeded upon this impression from the very commencement of this foundation, and to have gone on in that course of proceeding from that time up to the present. The disposition on my part has always been, in such cases, not to carry back the account further than the filing of the information.

Then comes the question as to the costs; there has not, in this case, been a saving of anything; there is no fund to which we can have resort for the payment of the costs, unless we resort to that fund, the whole of which, in my opinion, ought to be applied to the purposes of the charity. The question therefore is, whether the charity shall hereafter be diminished to the extent of the costs of this suit. Are the company then to be considered as entitled to costs at the expense of the charity? It is certainly my opinion, that parties ought not to be visited with costs, who have, from accident and without any wilful default, been led to commit an error which they have taken the first opportunity to correct; and there are many cases, in which (when I could do so consistently with my duty) I have abstained from charging them with costs, when there was a fund which could be resorted to, and when the Defendants have in fact taken the first opportunity of correcting the error, after it was brought to their notice. But that course has not been extended to cases, in [72] which the Defendants, taking advantage of the suit, have insisted on their individual rights, and have brought the question under the consideration of the Court, and argued it adversely. I do not mean to impute to the Defendants anything more than error; but being informed that the matter was complained of, instead of acknowledging and correcting the error, they state the facts (quite fairly and correctly it must be admitted), and avail themselves of the opportunity offered them by the filing of the information, and say, we will try if we cannot induce the Court to think we are right; we will take the opportunity of insisting, that no error has been committed, and that we are entitled to the benefit we have appropriated to ourselves. By acting in this way, I am of opinion, they have occasioned costs which they must pay. I think, therefore, the Defendants must pay the costs of the suit, but the account ought not to be carried back further than to the time of filing the information.

The Court declared that the increased income ought to be applied to the several objects mentioned in the bill in proportion to their respective amounts. An account was directed against the company from the filing of the information with costs of the Attorney-General, as between party and party up to the hearing of the cause.

A testatrix, after reciting that the rent of a property was £10, devised it to Christ's Hospital, a charitable foundation, in trust as to £6 for the poor of three parishes, and as to £4 to A. B. for life, and after her death, in trust for the three parishes. Held, that Christ's Hospital took no interest in the increased rents.

Where trustees of a charity and their predecessors have, for a long course of years, administered the funds erroneously, but being called upon duly to administer them, they insist on their own rights adversely and fail, they must pay the costs, notwithstanding the contrary usage of their predecessors.

Lady Ramsay, by her will dated in 1601, and after reciting, that she was seised in fee of a messuage, &c., in Broad Street, London, of the yearly rent of £10, did make her last will for the devising, and bestowing, and establishing the inheritance of the same messuage, in manner after mentioned; and she did devise the same to the Governors of Christ's Hospital (a charitable foundation) for ever, "upon special trust and confidence," that they should pay to the parsons and churchwardens of the three parishes of St. Peter's, St. Andrew's, and St. Mary, for ever, 40s. a-piece, for the most needy poorest of their parishes, and to pay Elizabeth Worley the sum of £4 yearly for life, and after her decease then the £4 to be divided as follows: 40s. to the parson and churchwardens of St. Peter's parishes in augmentation of the relief of the poor, and 20s. parcel of the above sum of £4 to the parson and churchwardens of St. Andrew's parish in further augmentation, &c., and 20s. residue of the said last-mentioned sum of £4, to be paid to the parson and churchwardens of St. Mary's parish yearly for ever, for the further augmentation of the relief of the poor of the said parish.

The rent of the house in question had increased and now amounted to above £82. The governors had uniformly from the foundation of the charity applied the surplus rents after payment of the specific sums mentioned in the will, to the benefit of Christ's Hospital.

[74] This was an information filed by the Attorney-General, insisting that the whole rents ought to be applied for the benefit of the specific objects mentioned in the will.

The Defendants, the Governors of Christ's Hospital, stated the uniform practice of their predecessors; and they submitted and insisted, that according to the construction of the will, the surplus rents belonged to the Defendants as Governors of Christ's Hospital, and were applicable to the purposes of such hospital.

Mr. Kindersley and Mr. Blunt, in support of the information, contended, that the Defendants were not entitled to the surplus, the whole rent at the date of the will having been given to the specified charities, and the Defendants taking expressly "upon trust." They cited The Attorney-General v. Skinners' Company (2 Russ. 435), where Lord Eldon says, "There are several other cases on the subject; and, upon a consideration of them all, I adhere to the same view which I took of them in The Attorney-General v. The Corporation of Bristol. In the first place, if a testator by his will gives the whole of the then value of the lands to charitable purposes therein expressed, denoting, upon his will, that he knows what is the whole value of the lands, giving the yearly value is equivalent to giving the rents and profits; and giving the rents and profits is equivalent to giving the lands themselves. The consequence must be that the increase of the rents and profits will belong to those to whom he has given the yearly value, alias the rents and profits, alias the lands themselves."

Mr. Stuart and Mr. E. R. Daniell, contrà. This is not like a gift to a private individual, in trust, [75] for a certain charity; but to the governors of a charitable institution in trust, to a certain extent for other charities. The case cited does not apply. By a gift to Christ's Hospital, some intention to benefit it must have been intended. If the rents had increased in the life of Mrs. Worley, neither she nor the three parishes would have been entitled to it. The same result would take place after her death. They cited Attorney-General v. Corporation of Bristol (2 Jac. & W. 294), and Attorney-General v. Haberdashers' Company (4 Bro. C. C. 103).

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale] said, the testatrix considered that she had an estate of the value of £10 per annum, the whole of which she exhausted in the several charitable gifts mentioned in her will. That he was of opinion, that the whole rents belonged to the specific objects stated in the will of the testatrix; and that the Defendants must account from the filing of the information, and as they had taken the opportunity of insisting on their rights adversely, they must pay the costs of the information.

[76] FROWD v. BAKER. READ v. BAKER. March 23, April 16, 1841.

Pending a litigation in the Ecclesiastical Court, as to the validity of a will, a creditor filed a bill for a receiver, &c. The alleged will being held invalid, an administrator was appointed; whereupon another creditor filed a cross-suit, and rapidly obtained a decree. The Plaintiff in the first suit was declared entitled to his costs out of the estate.

The Plaintiff Frowd was a creditor of John C. Beckett, who died in April 1839. On his death a will was found, purporting to affect the real and personal estate, which gave rise to a suit in the Ecclesiastical Court.

In February 1840, Frowd filed a creditor's suit against all the parties claiming (fourteen in number), for a receiver pending the litigation in the Ecclesiastical Court, and for an account and administration of the real and personal estate, when a legal personal representative had been appointed. (See De Feuchères v. Dawes, 5 Beav. 110.) An order for the appointment of a receiver was made on the 27th of March 1840; but before one had been appointed, and on the 13th of May 1840, sentence was pronounced in the Ecclesiastical Court, declaring an intestacy; and John Smith, the heir at law, was appointed administrator. Frowd, on the same day, filed a supplemental bill against all the parties.

On the 21st of May, Read, another creditor, filed a second creditor's suit against John Smith alone; and having got in his answer, obtained a decree, by consent on the 2d of June. By these means the first suit became nugatory.

Frowd, being threatened by some of the Defendants in his suit with a notice to dismiss for want of prosecution, gave notice of motion that the costs of all the parties to his suit might be paid out of the estate.

[77] Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Piggott, in support of the application.

Mr. Kindersley and Mr. Bacon, contrà, for the Defendant Smith, opposed the application; and contended, that at all events the other parties who failed in their litigation in the Ecclesiastical Court ought not to have their costs.

The other parties did not appear.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. This, in substance, is an application to dismiss these bills with costs of all parties, to be paid out of the estate of Beckett.

It is alleged that the bill was filed by Frowd, acting in collusion with the parties who insisted on the validity of the will in the Ecclesiastical Court, and not for the purpose of administration. If that had been established, it would have been difficult to allow him his costs; but the allegation has not been proved. Where collusion is alleged, it ought to be distinctly proved, or be shewn from circumstances leaving no doubt in the mind of a Judge.

As the sentence in the Ecclesiastical Court could not determine the question as to the real estate, though it afforded an important indication of the validity of the will as to the real estate, I think Frowd cannot be considered wrong, in making the claimants on the real estate parties to the supplemental bill.

The parties to the third suit obtained a decree by so rapid a proceeding, that I think they had no right to stop Frowd's suit except on payment of his costs. The other side say, "There is an intestacy, then why is the [78] estate to be charged with the costs of all the other claimants?" but Frowd was not wrong in bringing them here, though I cannot now say whether they ought or ought not to have their costs.

I must stay all the proceedings in Frowd's suit, giving him his costs out of the estate. I have felt some difficulty in dealing with the costs of the other parties, and I will leave them to make such application as they may be advised, for payment of the costs out of the estate, or by Frowd.

NOTE.—On the 16th of April, the case was mentioned on the minutes of the above order, when the point, by arrangement, having been discussed, costs were given to Baker, a trustee and executor under the alleged will, but refused to Jones and the other devisees, who had insisted on its validity.

[78] THE KING OF HANOVER v. SIR HENRY WHEATLEY AND OTHERS.
March 22, April 1, 1841.

New commission granted to cross-examine Plaintiff's witnesses abroad, upon subsequent discovery of matter material for such examination; but, Held, that the Plaintiff could only be allowed to re-examine on a special case being made, and then only as to matters not comprised in the former interrogatories.

Form of the order in such cases.

On the examination of witnesses before the examiner, new interrogatories may be, from time to time, exhibited, for the examination of the same or other witnesses; but secus in an examination before Commissioners, except by leave of the Court.

The bill in this cause was filed in August 1839, but the answers of the Defendants were not filed until November 1840.

The Defendants had notice, in November 1840, that the Plaintiff intended to examine witnesses in Hanover, who the witnesses were, and to what point they were to [79] be examined; and they were asked if they would join in the commission, which they declined.

The commission for the examination of the Plaintiff's witnesses accordingly issued, and was executed. It was closed in December 1840, and was returned into Court in the 1st week in January.

The rule to produce witnesses was given in January; but the rule to pass publication had not been given, nor had the cause been set down for hearing.

On the 18th of March 1841 the Defendants gave notice of motion, that they might have a commission for the examination of witnesses in Hanover or elsewhere, returnable without delay, to take the cross-examination of Mrs. Charlotte Beckedorff and Miss Beckedorff, two of the witnesses examined on behalf of the Plaintiff, &c.

The application was supported by the affidavit of the Defendant's solicitor, stating, that since the execution of the said commission, and the return thereof, he had discovered new matter, which he was advised and verily believed to be material for the cross-examination of the above-named Mrs. Charlotte Beckedorff and Miss Sophia Beckedorff; and that such matter was not discovered or known by the deponent, nor by the Defendant, as the deponent had been informed and verily believed; nor had he, the solicitor, nor the Defendants, as the deponent verily believed, any reason for suspecting its existence, until after the execution and return of the aforesaid commission.

That he was advised that he could not safely go to a hearing in this cause without the testimony of the above-named witnesses on cross-examination.

[80] Mr. Wigram and Mr. Wray, for the Defendants, in support of the application.

Sir Charles Wetherell, Mr. Pemberton, and Mr. Loftus Wigram, for the Plaintiffs.

The following authorities were referred to; Beames's Orders, 30, Turbot v. — (8 Ves. 314), Campbell v. Scougal (19 Ves. 552), Carter v. Draper (2 Sim. 52), Bond v. Bond (4 Sim. 518), Vaughan v. Worrall (2 Mad. 322), The Dean of Ely v. Warren (2 Atk. 189), The Dean of Ely v. Stewart (2 Atk. 44), Smith v. Biggs (5 Sim. 391).

The points principally discussed were, first, as to the terms of the order; secondly, whether the Defendants might cross-examine on new matter; and, thirdly, whether the Plaintiffs were to be at liberty to re-examine the witnesses.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. Since this case was last mentioned I have caused the registrar's book to be searched, and have obtained copies of several orders, by which new commissions for the examination of witnesses have been directed to be issued.

The order in Campbell v. Scougal, as it was at first pronounced, is the only one of the form of which is applicable to the present application. (1)

In Campbell v. Scougal the application was by the Defendant, to suppress the depositions taken at Leghorn [81] on the behalf of the Plaintiff. The order as it was at first pronounced was, "That the Defendants be at liberty to sue out a new

(1) EXTRACT FROM ORDER in Campbell v. Scougal (19th January 1816):—That the Defendants be at liberty to sue out a new commission for the cross-examination of the Plaintiff's witnesses at Leghorn, returnable without delay; but they are not to examine any new witnesses under the said commission. But in case the said Plaintiff's witnesses shall not attend to be cross-examined, having due notice, the said Defendants are to be at liberty to make or cause to be made affidavits before the proper authorities at Leghorn to prove their refusal, and also to prove that the said Plaintiff's witnesses attended to complete their evidence for the said Plaintiffs under the said former commission in this cause, after notice from the said Defendants that they intended to cross-examine such witnesses, and to prove that the Defendants at that time were prepared to cross-examine them, the said Plaintiffs, by their counsel consenting that such affidavits shall be read at the trial of the action at law; and the Plaintiffs are to be at liberty to make or cause to be made affidavits explanatory or contradictory on their part respecting the same matters, which, by consent, are likewise to be read at the said trial, without the Defendants objecting thereto; and each party, before making any such affidavits, is to give to the other party a copy of the affidavits so to be made; and the Commissioners to be named in such commission are to be at liberty, if necessary, to swear one or more interpreter or interpreters. And it is ordered that the Plaintiff's clerk in Court do, within six days after notice hereof, join and strike Commissioners' names with the Defendant's clerk in Court, in default thereof that the Defendants be at liberty to take out such commission directed to their own Commissioners. And the said new commission is not to be directed to any of the Commissioners named in the former commission, and ten days notice of the execution of such commission to any two of the Plaintiff's Commissioners, in case the Plaintiff join in such commission, is to be deemed good notice to the Plaintiffs. And it was ordered that the depositions of the witnesses already examined be kept close. And the Defendants are to state upon affidavit the names of the witnesses they mean to cross-examine, and to undertake to cross-examine such witnesses.

commission for the cross-examination of the Plaintiff's witnesses at Leghorn, returnable without delay, but they are not to examine any new witness under the said commission; and the [82] Commissioners to be named in such commission are to be at liberty, if necessary, to swear one or more interpreter or interpreters to interpret the oath and interrogatories to be made use of on such commission to such witness or witnesses, as may not be able to speak the English language, and to interpret the deposition or depositions of such witness or witnesses who cannot speak the English language into the English language. And it is ordered, that a clause be inserted in the said commission for that purpose; and it is ordered that the Plaintiff's clerk in Court do, within six days after notice hereof, join and strike Commissioners' names with the Defendant's clerk in Court, or in default thereof, that the Defendants be at liberty to take out such commission directed to their own Commissioners; and ten days' notice of the execution of such commission, to any two of the Plaintiff's Commissioners, in case the Plaintiffs join in such commission, is to be deemed good notice to the Plaintiffs. And it is ordered that the depositions of the witnesses already examined be kept close, and the Defendants are to state upon affidavit the names of the witnesses they mean to cross-examine, and to undertake to cross-examine such witnesses."

Afterwards, on application to vary the minutes of the order, some special clauses were, by consent, ordered to be made, to the effect, that in case the said Plaintiff's witnesses should not attend to be cross-examined, having due notice, the said Defendants were to be at liberty to make or cause to be made, affidavits before the proper authority at Leghorn to prove their refusal, and also to prove that the said Plaintiff's witnesses attended to complete their evidence for the said Plaintiff under the said former commission in this cause, after notice from the said Defendant that they intended to cross-examine such witnesses; and to prove that the [83] Defendants at that time were prepared to cross-examine them, the said Plaintiffs by their counsel, consenting that such affidavits should be read at the trial of the action at law; and the Plaintiffs were to be at liberty to make or cause to be made affidavits explanatory or contradictory, on their part, respecting the same matters, which, by consent, were likewise to be read at the said trial, without the Defendants objecting thereto; and each party before making any such affidavit, was to give the other party a copy of the affidavit so to be made. And further, that the said new commission was not to be directed to any of the Commissioners named in the former commission.

I think that this order as originally made, affords a precedent for the order to be made on the present occasion.

But it is desired, on the behalf of the Plaintiff, that he may have leave to re-examine his witnesses upon the former interrogatories, or upon new interrogatories to be exhibited at the execution of the commission to be now issued.

By Order 68 of Lord Bacon, the examination of witnesses was to be on interrogatories annexed to or inclosed in the commission. (Beames's Ord. 30.) But afterwards it became a general practice, by consent, to examine the witnesses on interrogatories exhibited to the Commissioners on opening the commission. (Curs. Can. 243, Gilb. For. Rom. 126.) And in the oath to be taken by the Commissioners, before acting in the commission, it is expressed that they are to examine on the interrogatories then produced and left with them. (Beames, 328.)

[84] Since this time the practice has been to produce the interrogatories to the Commissioners at the time; and it seems, that in the case of Campbell v. Scougal (19 Ves. 554), Lord Eldon was erroneously informed by counsel that it was the practice to feed the Commissioners with fresh interrogatories from time to time. (See Andrews v. Brown, Prec. Ch. 387.)

On examination of witnesses before the examiner, new interrogatories may be, from time to time, exhibited before the examiner for the examination of the same or other witnesses, up to time of publication; and for the examination of witnesses before Commissioners, by leave of the Court, new commissions may be issued at the instance, or new interrogatories may be exhibited on the behalf of persons, who might, with proper diligence and attention, have examined their witnesses on the execution of the first commission.

On such occasions the Court may adopt such precautions as may be thought proper according to the circumstances of the case.

In Coventry v. Coventry (1 Dickens, 25) it was referred to the Master to settle the interrogatories, and make them extend "so far as naturally and properly arises from the matters in issue, and no further."

In this case, all that is asked is leave to cross-examine witnesses already examined by the Plaintiff; and in the absence of any special case, I do not think it necessary or right to do more than make an order similar to that which was made in Campbell v. Scougall.

[85] I do not think that it would be consistent with the practice of the Court, or the principles upon which it acts in such cases, to permit the Plaintiff to re-examine his witnesses-in-chief to the interrogatories already exhibited. But it appears to me, that the Plaintiff is entitled, upon a special case, to exhibit new interrogatories for the examination of other witnesses as to any matters in issue in the cause, and even for the examination of the same witnesses to matters in issue in the cause, which were not comprised in the former interrogatories.

If any such special case were made, the commission would not be merely for the cross-examination of the Plaintiff's witnesses, but for a commission, in which Plaintiffs and Defendants being jointly interested, the object would have to be so stated, and the expenses to be borne in the usual way.

If no such special case be made, I think that the order must be such as was pronounced in Campbell v. Scougall, before the special directions were introduced by consent of parties.

FORM OF ORDER.—The following was the order drawn up in this case :—

That the Defendants Sir Henry Wheatley Thomas Wood and Her Majesty's Attorney-General be at liberty to take out a commission for the cross-examination of Charlotte Beckedorff, widow, and Sophia Beckedorff, spinster, in the kingdom of Hanover, returnable in five weeks from the date hereof (the said Charlotte Beckedorff and Sophia Beckedorff having been already examined as witnesses for the Plaintiff under the commission sued out by him), and the Plaintiff's clerk in Court is to be at liberty, in six days after notice hereof, to join and strike Commissioners' names with the said Defendants' clerk in Court, or in default thereof the said Defendants are to be at liberty to take out such commission directed to their own Commissioners. And it is ordered, [86] that the said Defendants, and also the Plaintiff in case he shall join in the said Defendant's said commission, be at liberty to name eight Commissioners on each side, with liberty for each side to strike out four of them. And it is ordered, that the Defendants also be at liberty to take out a duplicate of such commission. And in case the Plaintiff shall join in such commission, he is to be at liberty to take out a duplicate thereof. And it is ordered, that fourteen days' notice of the execution of the said commission to the Plaintiff's Commissioners, or any two of them, be deemed good notice to the said Plaintiff. And the said Commissioners, after they have entered on the execution of the said commission, are to be at liberty to swear one or more interpreter or interpreters upon his or their oath or oaths, solemnly, well and truly to interpret the oath or oaths, and interrogatories which shall be administered and exhibited to such witness or witnesses who do not understand the English language, into the language of such witness or witnesses, and also to interpret their respective depositions taken to the said interrogatories, out of the language of such witness or witnesses into the English language; and to return such depositions in the English language, and to keep such depositions secret until publication shall duly pass in this cause. And the said Commissioners are to certify, in what manner they administered the oath or oaths to such witness or witnesses respectively, that shall be examined under the said commission, who cannot understand or do not speak the English language. And it is ordered, that the Defendants do pay the Plaintiff's costs of and relating to this application, and of the said commission, and the execution thereof, including the costs, travelling, and other expenses of the Plaintiff's Commissioner and solicitor going from this country to Hanover, and returning, attending the execution of the said commission, such costs and expenses to be taxed by the Master in case the parties differ about the same. But this is to be without prejudice to the Plaintiff's right to enter his rule to pass publication, and to set down the cause for hearing in the same manner as if this order had not been made.

[87] In re CONGREVE. April 1, 1841.

The Master's certificate on taxation of costs cannot be questioned without the special leave of the Court, to be obtained by petition, setting forth the grounds of complaint, and the charges alleged to be erroneous.

Principles on which the Court acts in permitting a review of such certificate.

The Master, on evidence before him, allowed a few items on the taxation of a solicitor's bill for business, as to which there was a conflict whether the solicitor had authority to perform it. Held, that this was not a sufficient reason for permitting a review of the taxation.

On petition for liberty to file exceptions to the Master's certificate of taxation, the Court will sometimes decide the point in dispute without putting the parties to file their exceptions.

This was a petition, by a client, for liberty to file exceptions to the Master's report on the taxation of his solicitor's bill of costs: on the ground that the Master had allowed certain charges for business, which, the Petitioner alleged, the solicitor had no authority to do.

Mr. Anderdon, in the absence of Mr. Pemberton, in support of the petition, contended that this was a proper case for review, and had been brought forward in a proper form; and further, that the Court seeing the error, would now correct it, without putting the Petitioner to the expense of filing exceptions.

Mr. Bethell and Mr. Bird, for the Respondent, contended that the case of the Petitioner involved no question of principle; and they adverted to the great trouble and inconvenience to which the Court would be subject, if the items of a solicitor's bill were to be gone through in open Court, Alsop v. Lord Oxford (1 Myl. & K. 564), Fenton v. Crickett (3 Mad. 496), and Shewell v. Jones (2 S. & St. 170), were cited.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. If anyone supposes that a Judge sitting here has a right to refuse to entertain a question, because it may be very troublesome and occupy a great deal of time [88] the notion cannot be too soon corrected. The duty of the person sitting here is, to attend to those matters which come under his jurisdiction, with all the attention in his power, and give all the time that is properly required for their due consideration and investigation. I apprehend there can be no doubt in anybody's mind on that point, and I cannot therefore attend to the opposite argument.

I conceive it to be established, as a general rule, that the Master's certificate of costs is final, and not to be questioned without the special leave of the Court. That special leave is to be obtained by means of a petition, setting forth the grounds of complaint, and also stating the particular charges which are alleged to be erroneous. When that petition comes before the Court, it will judge of the grounds of complaint which are alleged; and, as truly stated in argument in this case, if, upon the discussion, the grounds of complaint appear to be sufficient, it is usual for the Court itself to examine and decide upon the items (see 2 Smith's Pr. 353; Russell v. Buchanan, 9 Sim. 172; Attorney-General v. Drapers' Company, 4 Beav. 305); but this is not an universal course of proceeding, it being quite open to the Court to give the leave which is asked to file exceptions, and to leave those exceptions to the ordinary course of inquiry and determination.

With respect to the grounds of complaint which are held to be sufficient to induce the Court to open the Master's finding (and that is the material matter to be considered here) they are in general language expressed in the case of Alsop v. Lord Oxford; and, as far as the general rule is concerned, I have certainly not heard that those grounds have been improperly stated: they [89] are perhaps stated somewhat too minutely, perhaps without those qualifications which it would have been more prudent to add to them; but the general grounds are there stated, in the manner in which I think they are ordinarily acted upon.

What is generally understood of the matter is this, that it must be shewn that there has been an erroneous principle upon which the Master has acted; that he has been guided by some error of law or of equity, or by his notion of some general rule, upon which he thought he ought to act. Now I am not prepared to say that the Court can refuse attention to a case, merely because it does not come within those general expressions. In any case, not otherwise provided for by Act of Parliament, I should hesitate very much indeed before I laid it down as a general rule, that there was any decision by, or any proceeding before, the Master, which the Court had not jurisdiction and authority to enquire into. Taking it to be so, and that there may be exceptions to a proposition so general as that which was laid down by Sir John Leach, in that case, the Court must be well satisfied that there are sufficient grounds alleged for an exception, before it will deviate from the general rule.

The real question, therefore, is, whether there is anything in this case which ought to take it out of the general rule. Now what is the complaint here? It is simply this, that the Master has allowed charges with respect to business, which the party alleges he did not authorise the solicitor to do; that is, I think, the simple ground of complaint here; there is nothing else. The Master has received evidence upon the point in discussion between the parties, which evidence, from the mere statement of it which I have had at the Bar, [90] may seem to have well justified the conclusion to which he came. But here are a few items in a solicitor's bill charged for business, which it is alleged on the one side was authorised, and on the other side, that it was not. In respect of this the Master has received and decided upon all the evidence produced before him; and, considering the nature of this case, it does not appear to me to form an exception to that which I consider to be the general and established rule of this Court as to these matters; I must therefore dismiss this petition with costs.

[90] STUBBS v. SARGON. March 25, 1840; Jan. 11, July 30, August 10, 1841.

A purchaser under the Court not being able to obtain an account book delivered over to him, to which he was entitled under his contract, brought an action of trover against some parties to the cause. He was restrained by injunction.

Motion by purchaser under the Court, for a reference to inquire whether it would benefit the parties that the contract should be rescinded, on the ground that the executor had stated he was unable to comply with the conditions, held irregular.

Order held irregular, first, on the ground of its having been made and passed without due notice to the other parties to the cause; and, secondly, as not specifying the evidence on which it was grounded.

An executor, who was under an obligation to deliver a book to a purchaser under the Court, made an affidavit that it was lost. Held, that the purchaser was not bound by that affidavit, but was entitled to an enquiry before the Master.

John White, having become the purchaser of the book debts owing to the testatrix Elizabeth Ives deceased, was entitled, as a condition of his purchase, to have delivered to him, amongst other documents, the day book and ledger of the testatrix and her late partners; John White having, with the assistance of John James Horner, paid his purchase-money into Court, but being unable to obtain possession of the books, commenced an action of trover against George Sargon and others (the executors) for the recovery thereof.

[91] The purchase had not been completed.

Dec. 5, 1839. Mr. Spence, on behalf of the Defendants at law, now moved to restrain the proceedings in the action.

Mr. James Campbell, contra.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS said that the proceeding was most irregular, and he granted the injunction restraining White from proceeding in the action. It was also ordered, by arrangement, that the day book and ledger of the testatrix and her late partners should be forthwith given up to White by George Sargon and Sarah his wife, George Fuller, John Henry Padbury, and Edward Ives Fuller.

March 25, 1840. John James Horner, having supplied White with the money which White paid into Court, in respect of his purchase, it was, on the 19th of December 1839, agreed between White and Horner that Horner should become the equitable assignee of White's interest in the debts.

The day book not having been delivered, pursuant to the order of the 5th of December, and it having been stated by Sargon to have been lost, a motion was made on the behalf of Horner and White that the above order might be rescinded; that the Defendants might be ordered to pay into Court some of the book debts, alleged to have been received by them; and that it might be referred to the Master to inquire, whether it would not be beneficial to the parties in the cause that the contract for sale of book debts should be rescinded.

Mr. C. P. Cooper, in support of the motion.

[92] Mr. Spence, contrà.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. The purchaser has been merely informed that the book has been lost: that may be inaccurate. He is entitled to the day-book, and has a right to enforce the order of the 5th of December, and if it cannot be delivered, he may possibly have a right to rescind the contract, and all the proceedings founded on it; but that is not now the question. He asks to set aside the order of December alone, and leave all the other orders standing. This cannot possibly be done.

As to the reference to the Master, nothing can be more extraordinary than that a vendee should ask for a reference, whether it would be beneficial to the parties in the cause that the contract should be rescinded. The purchaser has no right to propose any such thing. The motion must therefore be refused with costs.

Jan. 11, 1841. On the 30th of July in the same year, on the application of Horner and White, and with the consent of the executors Sargon and wife, George Fuller, J. H. Padbury, and Edward Ives Fuller, an order was made that White should be discharged from his purchase; and that out of the sum of £213, 10s. 8d. paid into Court on account of the purchase, the sum of £65, 15s. 5d., received on account of the debts, and £15 agreed to be paid for costs, making together £84, 15s. 5d., should be paid to Sargon and wife, George Fuller, J. H. Padbury, and Edward Ives Fuller; and that the residue of the same sum of £213, 10s. 8d., being £128, 15s. 3d., should be paid to Horner; and the order was to be without prejudice, as regarded the other parties to the cause, to the question [93] how or by whom, their costs of the sale of debts were to be paid.

The order was made with the consent of Sargon and wife, George Fuller, J. H. Padbury, and Edward Ives Fuller; and the money was paid out of Court accordingly. The order was made and passed without due notice to some other parties to the cause, and after others had stated their intention to oppose it, and without making proper provision for their costs. When drawn up no affidavit of service on the other parties, nor any consent on their part was produced to the registrar.

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Tennant, on behalf of Cookes and wife, one of the thirty-six residuary legatees, moved to discharge the order of the 30th of July 1840. (3 Beavan, 408.)

Mr. C. P. Cooper, contrà, contended that executors alone, who were the vendors, had a right to appear at the hearing of the motion of the 30th July 1840.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. I do not impute any intention of obtaining an order by surprise; but when two parties agree on an order, it cannot be drawn up in the absence of other interested parties who have stated their intention to oppose it. This is, of itself, a sufficient ground to discharge the order. There are other irregularities. The order does not state the evidence on which it was grounded; and if it had been taken on the non-appearance of some of the parties, upon production of an affidavit of service of the notice of motion, the order should not have varied from the notice of motion; for a party served may absent himself, not objecting to an order in the terms of the [94] notice, but objecting to any variation in it. The order must be discharged; and the monies paid out of Court be paid back again, and the costs of Cookes and wife must be paid by Horner.

August 10. The money was accordingly repaid; and it was now moved, on behalf of John James Horner, that he might be substituted for John White, as purchaser of the book debts, and that the day-book might be delivered up to him.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS. I think that if the contract be a contract which can now be performed, Horner is entitled to be substituted for White as purchaser; but Horner insists that the contract cannot be performed without the delivery up of the day-book, which he accordingly requires. Cookes and wife and other persons interested in the purchase-money insist that the contract ought to be performed; and agree with Horner in alleging that the executors can and ought to produce and deliver up the day-book; whilst the executors say, that the day-book is really lost, and cannot now be produced, and that the contract cannot be performed unless the delivery up of the books be dispensed with.

The important question is, whether it is not in the power of the executors to produce and deliver up the day-book. If they can, I think that an order ought to be made in conformity with the notice. If they cannot, no order should be made.

Mr. Sargon has made an affidavit stating that the book is lost, and cannot now be found; but I think that the parties are not bound by that affidavit; and that if [95] they desire it, they are entitled to an inquiry, whether the executors are able to produce and deliver up the day-book; with liberty for the Master to state special circumstances.

[95] WARREN v. BUCK. (Ex relatione.) April 17, 1841.

A suit was instituted by a husband and wife, and a decree made therein. It afterwards appeared that the property in question was limited to the wife's separate use. Held, upon a petition of the wife by a next friend, that the objection of misjoinder could not be then taken advantage of by a Respondent who was not an accounting party.

The bill was filed in March 1831, by a husband and wife as Co-plaintiffs. A decree was made in the cause in March 1833; and the cause was heard on further direction in March 1837.

A petition was now presented by the wife, by a next friend, stating the testator's will, whereby it appeared that the property in question was given to the wife for her separate use.

Mr. Koe, for the Petitioner.

Mr. Steere, for the Defendant Robert Ballinger.

It was objected that the record was incorrectly framed, inasmuch as the husband and wife were joined together as Co-plaintiffs. Wake v. Parker (2 Keen, 59) was cited on the point.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale] said that he had repeatedly had occasion to consider this point; and, inasmuch as Robert Ballinger, the Respondent in the present case, was not an accounting party, he should make the order.

[96] JONES v. POWELL. April 24, 1841.

Trustees of an under-lease of church property authorised to take steps to obtain a clause for compensation for their tenant right of renewal inserted in an Act pending in Parliament, to make a new street, which would require part of the property.

The testator was entitled, as under-lessee, to some leaseholds, held for three lives, under the Bishop of Winchester, and he devised his interest therein to trustees, in trust for his son, an infant, for life, with remainder over.

A decree had been made for carrying the trusts of the will into execution.

The trustees now presented a petition, stating that it was customary for the bishop to renew the leases, from time to time, on the death of the cestui que vies, and for the original lessees thereupon to grant new leases to their tenant on similar terms and covenants as in their former leases; and that the Petitioners were bound by the covenants in the lease granted to their testator to pay their portion of the fines payable by their lessors on renewal to the bishop. It stated also that large sums of money had been laid out on the property in the expectation of a renewal.

The petition further stated that a bill was depending in Parliament for making a new street in the neighbourhood of the property, and that part thereof was comprised in the schedule, and liable to be purchased, and that no compensation was by the bill directed to be given for the tenants' right of renewal; and that the Petitioners were anxious to obtain a clause inserted in the bill, giving the owners of the property liable to be purchased, compensation for their tenant right of renewal.

[97] The bill being now before a Committee of the House of Commons, the Petitioners prayed that they might be authorised to take such steps as might be necessary for obtaining the insertion of a clause of compensation in the bill, and to protect the interest of the parties beneficially entitled to the property.

Mr. Pemberton, in support of the petition.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale] ordered that the Petitioners should be at liberty to take such steps as they might be advised, in order to obtain the insertion of a clause in the bill for the purposes stated in the petition.

[97] HERCY v. FERRERS. April 27, 1841.

[S. C. 10 L. J. Ch. 273. Cf. Balls v. Margrave, 1841, 4 Beav. 119; 49 E. R. 283.]

The Plaintiff was entitled to a legacy which the testator had charged on his estates, not in settlement. The Defendant stated, that the testator was tenant in tail of part of the estate, but did not specify it; and he admitted the possession of a copy of a deed creating the entail, but he stated it did not make out the Plaintiff's case. Held, he was bound to produce it for the Plaintiff's inspection, as tending to shew what estates were in settlement.

The Defendant, being entitled to an estate, subject to a charge thereon belonging to the Plaintiff, mortgaged it, and delivered the title-deeds to the mortgagees, but he retained copies. Held, that he was bound to produce the copies, though the mortgagees were not parties to the suit.

By his will dated in 1795, the testator, who was entitled to an estate called the Baddesley estate, gave the Plaintiff a legacy of £1000 "out of the estates that were not in settlement," and the object of this bill was to obtain payment thereof.

The answer stated, that under a deed in 1763, and subject to certain charges thereon, the testator was at his death tenant in tail of part of the Baddesley estate, consisting of five farms, which the answer, however, did [98] not specify; and it also stated several charges affecting other parts of the estates, of which, subject to considerable charges thereon, the testator was seised in fee; and it stated, that the charges on the Baddesley estate, at the time of the death of the testator, far exceeded the value both of the settled and unsettled part.

The Defendant, who was the grandson of the testator, and who became entitled to the whole estate, subject to the charges, had in 1839 further mortgaged the estate for £12,000, and he delivered over the title-deeds to the mortgagees. By his answer he stated that the deeds were in the possession of the mortgagee; but he admitted that he had in his possession, copies of some of them, including the deed of 1763, the mortgage deed and other documents; but he stated, that they made out the Defendant's title, and did not shew or tend to shew any title in the Plaintiff. He submitted he was not bound to produce them.

The Plaintiff now moved for the production of the copies of the documents. The argument turned principally on the copy of the deed of 1763 and of the mortgage deed.

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Bates, in support of the motion. Where a Defendant admits the possession of documents relating to the matters in question, prima facie, he is bound to produce them. The Defendant must shew a case of exemption. Here the question will be, on what part of the Baddesley estate the legacy is charged. The answer states, that the testator was tenant in tail of a part which is not specified. It is necessary that the deed of 1763 should be produced to ascertain on what [99] part the Plaintiff has a claim, and it may be necessary to apportion the charges among the estates. The Plaintiff is interested in the estate, and is desirous of bringing before the Court, the other parties interested therein. It is therefore necessary for him to see the copies of the deeds shewing the incumbrances thereon.

Mr. Kindersley and Mr. Romiley, contra. The Plaintiff has no interest in any but the unsettled estate, and is not therefore entitled to see the copy of the deed of 1763, and the others relating to the settled estates.

The mortgagees are not parties to this suit; and, therefore, the Defendant is not justified in producing the title-deeds in their absence. Hardman v. Ellames (2 Myl. & K. 732) was cited.

Mr. Pemberton, in reply.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. The substance of the answer is, that though some estates are charged, they are wholly insufficient to pay this legacy and the other charges; and a question is raised, which of the testator's estates are charged with this legacy, or which of the estates were not settled. This can only be determined by ascertaining what estates were settled. Taking the whole of the testator's estates, you must subtract those which were settled, before you can ascertain the estates charged with the legacy. The Plaintiff asks for a production of the documents relating to the matters in question. The Defendant says that they do not tend to make out the [100] Plaintiff's case. Now first as to the deed of 1763, by which the testator became entitled as tenant in tail. The Defendant says that the Plaintiff has no interest in a document, by which alone he can ascertain which portion of the testator's estate was settled and which was not. I am of opinion he has an interest in it, and is entitled to have the copy produced.

The next question is this: it is said that the estates are vested in mortgagees who are not before the Court, and it is objected, that as the mortgagees have an interest in the estate and in the title-deeds, the copies of the deeds ought not to be ordered to be produced in their absence. If I had found that the Defendant held them as trustee for the mortgagees I should have attended to the objection; but they seem to have been retained by the Defendant for his own purposes, and it does not appear what duty the Defendant has towards the mortgagees with respect to them.

It may be necessary for the Plaintiff to pay off the charges on the estate, and it is therefore important to him that he should have an inspection of the copies of the mortgages.

With the exception of the cases and opinions, the production of which is not pressed for, all the documents admitted to be in the Defendant's possession must be produced. (See Balls v. Margrave, post, p. 119.)

[101] HAYNES v. BALL. April 29, 1841.

Where, under the 1 W. 4, c. 36, a Defendant in custody becomes entitled to his discharge, he cannot waive that right by acquiescence or subsequent proceedings.

In August 1840 the Defendant was arrested under an attachment for want of answer, and lodged in Gloucester gaol.

In November 1840 he was brought up and turned over to the Fleet.

On the 31st of March 1841 he was brought up by habeas corpus, when the bill was ordered to be taken pro confesso.

On the 3d of April following, the Defendant, being desirous of putting in his answer, but having been prevented by circumstances, applied to the Master of the Rolls to discharge the above order. His Lordship did so, and gave leave to the Defendant to file his answer, which was done on the 14th of April. The Defendant who was still in custody had not paid the costs of his contempt.

It was now moved on his behalf, that he might be discharged out of custody, on the ground "of proceedings not having been taken in due time."

Mr. C. P. Cooper, for the motion. By the thirteenth rule of the 1 W. 4, c. 36, sect. 15, it is provided, that where a Defendant is in custody for not answering, and shall not "put in his answer within two calendar months after he is lodged in gaol or prison," the Plaintiff "shall, at the expiration of two calendar months, proceed to take the bill pro confesso, and shall accordingly obtain an order for taking the same pro confesso within six weeks [102] after the period, computed from the expiration of such two calendar months, within which he may be able to take the same pro confesso; or in default of so doing," the Defendant shall be entitled to be discharged without paying any costs of contempt.

In this case the Plaintiff not having proceeded to take the bill pro confesso within the time limited by the Act, the Defendant is entitled to his discharge without payment of costs.

Notwithstanding what subsequently took place, the Defendant cannot be considered as having waived his right to be discharged, because in such cases there can be no waiver of rights.

Mr. Prendergast, contra, argued that there had been a waiver of any irregularity.

Collins v. Collyer (Cr. & Ph. 262, and 3 Beavan, 600) was referred to.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. The object of the Act referred to was to stimulate the exertions of the Plaintiff, and to prevent him from causing a Defendant to be taken into custody, and then allowing him to linger in prison. Plaintiffs have now an active duty, which they are bound strictly to perform, and in default the Defendant is entitled to be discharged. If a Defendant has once a right to his discharge, he has neither power nor capacity to waive his right. I think I have already decided that point. (Greening v. Greening, 1 Beavan, 121.)

As to the case of Collins v. Collyer, I think what took place here was very much mistaken. In that case [103] there was a sole Defendant, who being brought up by habeas corpus, the Plaintiff insisted he was entitled at the same time to take a decree dictated by himself, viz., such decree as he could abide by. I was of opinion that it could not be done, and that under the Act, the Court being bound to make such decree "as should be thought just," the cause must be set down, and I still remain of that opinion. (See 2d rule, 1 W. 4, c. 36, s. 15.)

[103] REYNARD v. SPENCE. May 1, 5, 1841.

A tenant in common agreed to make a partition, and by his will he confirmed the agreement, and devised the estate to trustees to convey the part agreed to the other tenant in common and his heirs, and to receive a conveyance of the other part; and he devised it and all his real and personal estate to his trustees to receive the rents and pay an annuity to his widow, &c., &c. Held, that the widow was bound to elect.

A widow, in a case in which she was bound to elect between her dower and an annuity given by her husband's will, received the annuity for five years. Held, that she had not, under the circumstances, elected.

A widow concurred in a partition of her husband's estate, and released a moiety allotted to the other tenant in common from her dower; the other moiety was conveyed to the trustees of her husband's will. Held, that she was entitled to dower out of the entirety of the latter moiety.

This was a creditor's suit, filed in 1830, under which the real estate of the testator Amos Bake having been ordered to be sold, it was referred to the Master to inquire and state whether Mary, the widow of Amos Bake, was entitled to dower out of any of the testator's estates.

By the Master's report it appeared, that in 1823, the testator Amos Bake and his brother Nathan Bake were seised of an estate in the county of York, in equal moieties as tenants in common in fee; that it was subject to the right of dower of Mary, the wife of Amos Bake, and to a mortgage of £4000, and that in September 1823 [104] Amos and his brother Nathan entered into an agreement to effect a partition of the estate in a particular way.

Amos Bake made his will dated September 1823, and thereby, after referring to his title to the property in question, and to his agreement with his brother to effect a partition, he confirmed the said agreement, and devised the estate to two trustees, in trust to carry the agreement into effect, and to execute conveyances for conveying to his brother, his heirs and assigns, the part agreed to be taken by him, and to take conveyances of the part agreed to be taken by the testator, "which said hereditaments so conveyed and assured unto his trustees; and in the meantime his equity therein he gave, devised, and bequeathed, together with all and whatsoever his real and personal estate," unto his said trustees, upon trust to let his said real estates, and receive the rents thereof, and thereout to pay his debts, and to invest the residue; and out of the rents, dividends, &c., of his real and personal estate to pay his wife an annuity of £20 half-yearly for life, and then to pay the residue towards the maintenance, &c., of his children; and when and so soon as his youngest child should attain twenty-one, upon trust to divide, convey, and assure the trust premises (subject to his wife's annuity) amongst his children then living, and if they should all die under twenty-one without issue, then to convey to his right heirs, augmenting his widow's annuity to £30 a year.

The testator had other freeholds. He died on the 24th day of September 1823; and in April 1824 a deed for the purpose of carrying the agreement for partition into execution, was executed between Nathan Bake and his wife of the first part, the trustees of the will of Amos of the second part, Mary the widow of Amos of the third part, and a trustee for the purposes of the deed of the [105] fourth part, and thereby, certain parts of the estate were conveyed to Nathan Bake, and the remainder were conveyed to the trustees of the will of Amos and Mary, and it was agreed that the monies, by the will given to Mary, the widow, should be charged only on the part of the estate conveyed to the trustees of the will of Amos, and for the nominal consideration therein, Mary the widow released the portion allotted to Nathan, "of and from the several annuities of £20 and £30, provided or intended to be provided for her, in and by the will of Amos Bake, and all arrears thereof, and of and from all dower, right and title to dower and thirds, free bench, and other estate, &c., of her Mary Bake."

Mary Bake, the widow, married John Wray on the 20th of April 1826.

It appeared that for five years after the testator's death, his widow received from the trustees the annuity of £20 a year. There was conflicting evidence as to the knowledge of the widow of her rights, and as to her intention to elect; the trustees affirming that she was fully informed of the nature and terms of the testator's will, and was fully aware and cognisant of her right to dower out of the testator's freehold estates previous to receiving any annuity; and on the other hand, Mary the widow deposed, that she acted under the guidance of the trustees; and that when she received the annuity, she was not aware that she was entitled to make any election, or that by accepting the annuity she would relinquish any claim to dower; that she had never been made acquainted that she had any right to dower, and that, though she joined in the deed for the purpose of releasing her dower in part of the real estates, she was not aware of the nature of dower, but signed the deed at the request of the trustees.

[106] The Master found that the widow was entitled to dower out of one undivided moiety of that part of the hereditaments conveyed to the trustees of the husband's will, and he submitted whether she was not in equity, if not at law, entitled to one-third of the other undivided moiety during her life in lieu of her dower in the part conveyed to Nathan Bake; and that she was bound to elect to take the annuity or dower; and the Master was of opinion, that under the circumstances she ought not to be considered as having elected.

No exceptions were taken to the report, and the cause now came on for further directions.

Mr. Kindersley and Mr. G. Y. Robson, for the Plaintiff, a mortgage creditor, contended, first, that under the will of the testator, the widow was bound to elect between her dower and the provision made for her by the will, as the provisions made for her by the will were inconsistent with the assertion by the widow of her right to dower. Roadley v. Dixon (3 Russ. 192), Villa Real v. Galway (1 B. C. C. 292, n., and Ambler, 682), Miall v. Brain (4 Mad. 119), Birmingham v. Kirwan (2 Sch. & Lef. 453), for that the trustees alone were to convey, and the portion of the estate held by the testator with his brother was comprised in the general devise.

Secondly, they contended, that she had elected to take under the will. On this they cited Brice v. Brice (2 Molloy, 21), and argued that the mortgagee would be prejudiced, if the widow were not held to have acquiesced and elected.

Thirdly, they contended, that if the Plaintiff was wrong on the second point, then that the widow was [107] not entitled to dower out of the whole moiety of the hereditaments allotted to the trustees of the will, but out of a moiety only; for though, by the deed of April 1824, the widow gave up her right over the portion allotted to the other tenant in common, yet she acquired no new rights over the remaining moiety, but retained her right to dower out of the moiety of that moiety only.

Mr. George Turner and Mr. Bloxam, contra, cited Rumbold v. Rumbold (3 Ves. 65).

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Atkinson, for trustees.

Mr. Stuart, for a purchaser.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS considered that the widow's claim for dower was inconsistent with the provisions contained in the testator's will, but that under the circumstances he could not hold that she had elected. (And see Dowson v. Bell, 1 Keen, 761.)

The widow by her counsel having elected to take against the will,

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS said, I should have thought that some more direct authority on the remaining point might have been found. I will not, therefore, decide until I have looked at the authorities.

Before the execution of the deed of April 1824, the widow was entitled to dower out of the undivided moiety of the whole estate. By the partition deed in which she occurred, she expressly released her from [106] her annuity and any right of dower, the moiety allotted to the other tenant in common, but no proviso was made in lieu thereof. It is clear that there was a substitution made of an entirety of a moiety for the undivided moiety of the entirety of the estate, and the question is, whether the widow was not, after the execution of the deed, entitled to the same rights against the entire moiety which, by means of the arrangement, the trustees obtained, as she previously had against the undivided moiety of the whole.

May 5. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. In the year 1823 Amos Bake and Nathan Bake were entitled to a certain estate as tenants in common in fee. The share of Amos was subject to the dower of his wife, and the whole estate was subject to a mortgage in fee for securing to Thomas Shaw Banscroft Reade the payment of £4000 and interest.

In September of the same year Amos and Nathan agreed to divide the estate between them; a partition seems to have been their only object. Amos made a will, whereby he directed his trustees to carry the agreement into effect; and then devised his real estates to trustees on various trusts, amongst which was a trust to pay to his wife an annuity of £20, in an event to be increased to £30 a year.

Amos soon afterwards died, and on the 20th of April 1824 a deed was executed between Nathan Bake and Elizabeth, his wife, of the first part; Joseph Spence and William Spence, the trustees of the will of Amos, of the second part; Mary Bake, the widow of Amos, of the third part; and Edward Spence, a trustee for the purpose of the deed, of the fourth part. The sole object [109] of this deed appears to have been, to carry into effect the agreement for a partition which had been entered into by Amos and Nathan in the lifetime of Amos, and to apportion the charges, Nathan, for himself, and his wife, covenanted that they would levy a fine of the moiety conveyed to the trustees of the will of Amos, with a view to discharge the same from the dower of Elizabeth, the wife of Nathan; and it being agreed, that the annuities given to Mary by the will of Amos should be exclusively charged on the moiety conveyed to the trustees of the will of Amos, Mary, the widow, for a nominal consideration, released Nathan, and the share or moiety conveyed to him, from the annuities, and from all dower, right, and title of dower, and other estate of her the same Mary, of, in, to, and out of the same premises.

Being of opinion that Mary Bake the widow, who is now Mary Wray, was entitled to dower out of her husband's estate, and bound to elect between her dower and the annuities given to her by her husband's will, and her counsel having in Court elected to take her dower, a question remains, whether she is entitled to dower out of the moiety conveyed to the trustees of her late husband's will, or out of one half only of that moiety.

The estate in severalty, which is acquired by the partition, if within the description, may pass by the words intended to apply to an undivided share.

I have found no case in which the point now raised has been decided. In the case of Sutton v. Rolfe (3 Lev. 84) it was contended that the widow of a tenant in common was not entitled to sue dower against the other tenant [110] in common before partition, and the contrary was decided. The argument is now that the widow is not entitled to dower out of the whole of her husband's share after partition; but I own that I see no good reason for it. There was clearly no intention in any way to alter any right which the widow had to dower out of the moiety allotted to her husband's estate; and it appears to me, that, for this purpose, the husband must be considered to have had an estate such as to entitle his widow to dower in the divided share, which, on the partition, was allotted to his trustees in substitution for the undivided share to which he was previously entitled.

In the case of Webb v. Temple (1 Freeman, 542), it was adjudged that a will was not revoked by a partition, because there was no intent to revoke, nor any material alteration of the estate, for before the partition the deviser had a third part in the manor, and after the partition he had a third part of the manor.

[110] SIDEBOTHAM v. BARRINGTON. May 6, 1841.

[For subsequent proceedings, see 5 Beav. 261. See Fraser v. Wood, 1845, 8 Beav. 342.]

Assignees of a bankrupt agreed to sell a part of his estate, and filed a bill for specific performance. It turned out, that the estate was vested in an assignee under a previous insolvency. After the Master had made his report, upon a reference as to title, the assignee in insolvency offered to concur in the sale. Held, that a good title could be made.

This case is reported, 3 Beavan, p. 524.

The cause now came on again for further directions, and on a petition stating that the assignee under the insolvency was willing to concur in a conveyance to the [111] Defendant; and praying that on the Plaintiff's procuring the assignee under the insolvency to join in the conveyance to the Defendant, which the Plaintiff undertook to do, the Defendant might be ordered to perform his agreement, or that it might be referred back to the Master to enquire whether a good title could now be made.

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Teed, for the Plaintiff, cited Paton v. Rogers (6 Mad. 256), where it was held, that "If on a bill for specific performance by the vendor, a good title can be made before or when the cause comes on for further directions, a specific performance will be decreed;" and Esdaile v. Stephenson (6 Mad. 367), where Sir J. Leach observed, "That if the Master should report against the title, and at the hearing upon further directions, the vendor had cured the defect, the Court would then compel the purchaser to take the title, although it would not suspend the contract, with a view to a future proceeding to perfect the title; that if the fact, whether the vendor could at the hearing cure the defect, were in question, it must be then sent back to the Master to review his report, with the additional circumstances." So in Egerton v. Jones (1 Russ. & Myl. 694; and 3 Sim. 392), where an exception to a report in favour of the title having, on argument, been allowed, leave was given to the Plaintiff, some time afterwards, to go again before the Master, for the purpose of bringing evidence to shew, that the objection which the Court had sustained was in the circumstances immaterial; they also cited Portman v. Mill (1 Russ. & Myl. 696; and see Dalby v. Pullen, 1 Russ. & Myl. 296; and Andrews v. Andrews, 3 Sim. 390).

[112] Mr. Kindersley, contra. The Plaintiff is not entitled to any further indulgence, and this bill ought now to be dismissed. The whole controversy between the parties has been, from the beginning, whether the assignees under the bankruptcy could make a good title. That was the question raised by the pleadings, and discussed in the Master's office and on the exceptions; and it is now asked, not that the assignee under the insolvency may execute the contract, but that a further reference may be made to the Master. The general rule is, that a case must stand on the circumstances existing at the time of filing of the bill (Byrne v. Byrne, 1 Drury & W. 71, and Connor & L. 189); the question of specific performance is a deviation from the rule, and if a party can make a good title at the hearing on further directions, the Court has compelled a purchaser to take it: but the Court has frequently regretted this deviation. Cases have certainly occurred where the only question has been whether a party will join in the conveyance, and it being found, on further directions, that he will join, the Court has decreed a specific performance. But in Lechmere v. Brasier (2 J. & W. 287, and see Magennis v. Fallon, 2 Molloy, 561; and Chamberlain v. Lee, 10 Simons, 444), Lord Eldon observes on this practice, "I must say, that I will not extend the rule, which the Court has adopted, of compelling a purchaser to take the estate where a title is not made till after the contract, to any case to which it has not already been applied. The rule has in many instances been productive of great hardship." If then the Court will not extend the rule, has any such a case as the present ever occurred? This is not a case in which, if the insolvent assignee by agreement joins, the title will be perfect, for he can only sell in the form prescribed by the Act; Mather v. Friedman (9 Sim. 352). Nor [113] is it a case in which the points have been overlooked by the Master; but this very point has been the sole subject of discussion. This is not a case similar to that of a dowress who agrees to release her right to dower; here the assignees have duties to perform under the Insolvent Act, over which this Court has no jurisdiction. In any event there must be an application to the Insolvent Court, which may be opposed, and this will be inconsistent with what is said in Esdaile v. Stephenson, that "the Court will not suspend," &c.

After all this litigation on a single point, it is asked that the case may stand over, and not that the assignee may execute, but that the Plaintiff may go before another jurisdiction and see if he can patch up the defect. The petition ought, therefore, to be dismissed with costs, and the cause immediately disposed of on further directions.

Mr. Teed, in reply.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. The only doubt I have in this case is about the form of the order. I certainly think the Plaintiff is entitled to relief here; but as to the costs of the suit, that raises another and quite a distinct consideration.

It appears, under the circumstances stated, that now the Plaintiff can probably make a good title, but I must hesitate before I declare that at present.

The question discussed before me on a former occasion, was whether the want of the concurrence of the assignee under the insolvency was an objection to the title or to the conveyance. I considered it to be, and [114] I think it now, an objection to the title; but the cause coming on for further directions, it is represented to me that the Plaintiff can now make a good title by the concurrence of the assignee. It is however suggested that something more than the concurrence of the assignee in the insolvency is required; and the question is, whether I ought to assume in this case that the assignee in the insolvency can and will do his duty. If the objection was, that there was not proof of his offering to concur, I would direct the matter to stand over for further enquiry upon it. But the parties have admitted before the Master that there are assets, arising from the purchase-money, sufficient to pay all the debts of the insolvency; and if it be clear that the assignee has offered to join in the conveyance, I think I should be justified in assuming that he will do his duty when he concurs in the conveyance; and that if he cannot do it of his own authority, he will procure any further authority which may be required. I ought, however, to have his undertaking not only that it shall be done, but that it shall be done within a limited time. If there be any question whether his joining in the conveyance, if properly made, would, together with the other circumstances, make a good title, then I think the second, and not the first part of the prayer, ought now to be granted; namely, the reference to the Master. If the parties desire to have this matter further investigated, then I will refer it to the Master, to enquire whether the fact of the assignee of the insolvency joining in the conveyance, together with the other facts of the case, will enable the vendor to make a good title.

[115] SAUNDERS v. VAUTIER. May 7, 1841.

When a legacy is directed to accumulate for a certain period, or where the payment is postponed, the legatee, if he has an absolute indefeasible interest, is not bound to wait until the expiration of that period, but may require payment the moment he is competent to give a valid discharge.

The testator Richard Wright, by his will, "gave and bequeathed to his executors and trustees thereafter named all the East India stock which should be standing in his name at the time of his death, upon trust to accumulate the interest and dividends which should accrue due thereon, until Daniel Wright Vautier should attain his age of twenty-five years, and then to pay or transfer the principal of such East India stock, together with such accumulated interest and dividends, unto the said Daniel Wright Vautier, his executors, administrators, and assigns absolutely." And the testator devised and bequeathed his residuary real, and personal estate to the persons in his will named.

The sum of £2000 East India stock was standing in the testator's name at his death in 1832. A suit was afterwards instituted for the administration of the testator's estate; and Daniel Wright Vautier being an infant, a reference in the cause was made to the Master, to approve of a sum to be allowed for his maintenance. The Master reported his fortune to consist of the East India stock in question, and reported that £100 a year ought to be allowed for his maintenance out of the dividends thereof.

Sir C. C. Pepys, who was then Master of the Rolls, by an order dated the 25th of July 1835, confirmed the report, and ordered the payment of £100 a year out of the dividends of the East India stock, for the maintenance of the infant Daniel Wright Vautier.

[116] Daniel Wright Vautier attained twenty-one in March 1841, and presented a petition to have a transfer of the fund to him.

Mr. Pemberton argued that the Petitioner had a vested interest, and that as the accumulation and postponement of payment was for his benefit alone, he might waive it and call for an immediate transfer of the fund; Josselyn v. Josselyn (9 Sim. 63).

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS. I think that principle has been repeatedly acted upon; and where a legacy is directed to accumulate for a certain period, or where the payment is postponed, the legatee, if he has an absolute indefeasible interest in the legacy, is not bound to wait until the expiration of that period, but may require payment the moment he is competent to give a valid discharge.

Mr. Kindersley, for the residuary legatees, most of whom were infants, was proceeding to argue that the Petitioner did not take a vested interest until he attained twenty-five, but

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale] observed that the contrary must have been decided or assumed when the order for maintenance had been made by the present Lord Chancellor. He did not at present see any reason to doubt the propriety of that order, but the argument must assume it to be erroneous, and call upon him to decide in a different manner, and he thought that it would be inconvenient to argue again in this Court a point on which the Judge of the Court of Rehearing had probably already expressed an opinion.

[117] The cause stood over, with liberty to apply to the Lord Chancellor, when the Lord Chancellor held the legacy vested, and ordered the transfer. (See 1 Cr. & Ph. 240.)

[117] CURRIE v. GOULD. May 7, 1841.

Bequest of £500 to A., and in case of her death, either before or after the testator, to devolve to her child or children, or in the event of their being also dead at her decease, to B. There were three children, one of whom only survived. Held, that he was entitled to the whole fund.

The testator bequeathed in the following terms:—"To my sister Ann, the wife of Thomas Currie, near Edinburgh (his exact place of residence may be learned from my brother Henry of that place), the sum of £500 sterling, which sum, in case of her death, either before or after me, is to devolve to her child or children, or in the event of their being also dead at her decease, the balance, after paying her husband £50, to become the property of my daughter Ann," meaning the Defendant Ann Burrell.

The testator died in 1791.

Ann Currie had three children, Jane, William, and James.

Jane died in 1830, William in 1836, and their mother Ann Currie died in 1837. James was, therefore, the only child who survived her; he afterwards died in 1840.

The legacy being in Court, the legal personal representative of James presented a petition praying payment [118] of the whole sum, on the ground that James was the only child who survived Ann Currie.

The petition came on upon a former day, when the Master of the Rolls directed it to stand over, in order that the personal representatives of the other children might appear.

Mr. Moore, for the Petitioner, now contended, that James Currie, as the surviving child, was, by the terms of the bequest, entitled to the whole interest; or if not, then that the gift was to the children of Ann Currie as joint-tenants, and that James Currie had become entitled thereto by survivorship. He cited Campbell v. Campbell (4 Bro. C. C. 15).

Mr. Turner, for the representatives of William Currie, contra. To constitute a joint tenancy, the shares must all vest at the same time; here they vested in the children from time to time as they were born, and they must, therefore, have taken as tenants in common; Woodgate v. Unwin (4 Sim. 129, Co. Litt. 188 a.). He argued also that this was the common case of a gift to A. for life, with remainder to her children, which would let in all her children to take vested interests at their births; and that the gift over, being in case of all the children being dead at the decease of Ann Currie, had never taken effect; that consequently the previous vested gifts to the several children remained unaffected, and the representatives of each child were severally entitled to a third of the fund. He cited Sturgess v. Pearson (4 Mad. 411), and Harrison v. Foreman (5 Ves. 207).

Mr. Moore, in reply.

[119] THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS considered that the child living at the death of Ann Currie was alone entitled, and he directed payment to the Petitioner accordingly.

[119] BALLS v. MARGRAVE. May 8, 1841.

A bill of discovery was filed by the assignee of the lessor against the assignee of the lessee in aid of an action at law on the covenants in the lease. The latter had the lease and assignment in his possession, but stated that he held the property by way of security, and he objected to produce them in the absence of the party entitled to the equity of redemption. Held, that he was bound to produce them for the Plaintiff's inspection.

This case is reported ante, 3 Beavan, 284, 448. The Defendant put in his answer to the amended bill, and thereby admitted he had in his possession the lease from Cheek to Rowland, signed by Cheek alone, and an assignment by way of mortgage from Lady Daniel to the Plaintiff's father, in trust to secure certain monies, and, in default of payment, in trust to sell. The Defendant, however, refused to produce them, on the ground that the property was vested in him, upon trust and by way of security, and that William Chinn, as executor of Lady Daniel, had a material interest in the lease, which he said might, and in all probability would, be greatly injured or prejudiced by the productions of the documents in question.

It was now moved, on the part of the Plaintiff, that the Defendant might produce these documents.

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. J. H. Taylor, in support of the motion.

Mr. Kindersley and Mr. Evans, contra, contended that the production could not be had in the absence of Chinn. They cited Lambert v. Rogers (2 Mer. 489).

[120] THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. The Plaintiff is, no doubt, entitled to the production of both these documents. (See Hercy v. Ferrers, 10 B. & C. p. 96.)

[120] STRICKLAND v. STRICKLAND. March 8, 1841.

[Affirmed, Cr. & Ph. 151; 41 E. R. 447.]

Default of six days in obtaining and serving an order for commission, Held, not a want of due diligence as to entitle a Defendant to an order to dismiss under the 17th Order, and a motion for that object was refused without costs.

This was a motion to dismiss a bill for want of prosecution, under the amended 17th General Order of April 1828 (Ordines Can. 12), by which it is ordered: "That where the Plaintiff files a replication without having been served with a notice of motion to dismiss the bill for want of prosecution, he shall serve the subpoena to rejoin, and in case he requires a commission to examine witnesses, shall obtain and serve an order for such commission within three weeks from the filing of the replication; and such commission shall, at the latest, be returnable on the first return of the second term then next following; and the Plaintiff shall give his rules to produce witnesses and pass publication at the latest in the same term, and shall set down the cause for hearing, and duly serve the subpoena to hear judgment, returnable in the succeeding term; and if the Plaintiff shall make default herein, then, upon application by the Defendant upon notice of motion, the Plaintiff's bill shall stand dismissed of Court, with costs, unless the Court shall make special order to the contrary."

On the 27th of January the Plaintiff filed a replication, without having been served with a notice of motion to dismiss.

[121] On the 17th of February the three weeks mentioned in the order expired. On the 20th of February the Plaintiff served a subpoena to rejoin and obtain, ex parte, a commission to examine witnesses; and

On the 23d of February he served the order for the commission.

The Defendant thereupon on the 1st of March gave notice to dismiss for want of prosecution.

Mr. L. Shadwell, in support of the motion. The Plaintiff requires a commission, and therefore the case falls within the 17th Order. He cannot now abandon the order for a commission; Rayson v. Lees (1 Keen, 14). The Plaintiff has failed in serving his subpoena to rejoin, and obtain and serve the order for a commission within the three weeks after the replication, according to the exigency of the 17th Order, and the Defendant is therefore entitled to have the bill dismissed, with costs. The case is like White v. Smith (1 Keen, 381); there the replication was filed on the 4th of November, the three weeks expired on the 25th, and nothing was done pursuant to the order; the Court considered, that as the case did not fall within the exception of Williams v. Janaway (6 Sim. 77), the Defendant was entitled, under the 17th Order, to move to dismiss. There has been no delay on the part of the Defendant to deprive him of the benefit of the order, as in Fernes v. Hutchinson (1 Russ. & M. 22); and the Court will not relieve the Plaintiff from the consequences of his neglect to comply with the exigency of its order; Walmsley v. Froude (1 Russ. & M. 303); Whalley v. Pepper (8 Sim. 203).

[122] Mr. Bethell, contra. The Plaintiff has not been guilty of any culpable negligence; the only ground of complaint is, that he took a step three days too late.

The meaning of the words "if the Plaintiff shall make default herein," used in the 17th Order, is not if he make default in taking one of the steps, but if he make default in all. The subpoena to rejoin having been served before notice of the motion was given, and the cause being at issue, it is now competent for the Defendant to take all the subsequent steps: he therefore cannot move to dismiss, but must prosecute the suit himself; Anon. (5 Sim. 497). If the commission be not duly prosecuted, the Defendant may obtain one, and proceed under the 17th Order.

Mr. Shadwell, in reply, referred to Carden v. Manning (1 Keen, 380); Earl Ferrers v. Shirley (7 Sim. 484); Smith v. Oliver (3 Myl. & Cr. 165); Crooke v. Trery (3 Myl. & Cr. 168); Padmore v. Bodfield (1 Beavan, 367).

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. The object of the 17th Order is to secure due diligence on the part of the Plaintiff, in the prosecution of his suit. The replication was, in this case, filed on the 27th of January; and it seems the Plaintiff required a commission; but of its necessity he did not for some time after give any intimation to the other parties. He did not comply with the terms of the 17th Order, because he did not serve the order for a commission within the three weeks; the Defendant could not, immediately upon the expiration of the three weeks, move to dismiss under the 17th Order; for though we may infer from the result [123] that the Plaintiff required a commission, yet that did not then appear; and consequently it did not appear that the case came within the 17th Order. The commission was obtained on the 20th, and not served until the 23d. A subpoena to rejoin has been served, and the cause is at issue; and this act of diligence is supposed to have the effect of giving the Defendant the right to dismiss the bill out of Court, as if there had been a total want of diligence. Unless the words of the order are so strong that it is not possible to escape them, I would not make such an order.

It may be made a question, whether, after the expiration of the three weeks, the Plaintiff could sue out a commission. He has, however, done it, and I am asked to consider it such a neglect of duty that I ought to order the bill to be dismissed.

The Defendant it is true is in no default in not giving notice sooner; because, until the order for the commission was served, he was not in a position to move to dismiss, either under the 17th Order or the old practice; but it does not appear to me that this motion can be sustained. As the Defendant came in consequence of the Plaintiff's failing to obtain the commission within the time, I must refuse the motion without costs. (Affirmed, Cr. & Ph. 151.)

On the 24th of March an application was made by the Plaintiff to discharge the ex parte order for commission, and for a new commission, which, after some opposition, was granted.

[124] WALLER v. PEDLINGTON. May 8, 1841.

Where a Defendant's title to dismiss is intercepted by a step taken by the Plaintiff between the notice of the motion and its being heard, the Plaintiff must pay the costs of the application.

A bill was filed against several Defendants, and amongst them against the Attorney-General; and it was now moved, on behalf of some of the Defendants, that the bill might be dismissed with costs for want of prosecution.

The dates of the several proceedings in the cause were as follows. The subpoenas were served in June 1840, and in December 1840 the Defendants, who now moved, filed their answers; but the Attorney-General's answer was not filed until the 26th of February 1841, and there were still some Defendants who had not answered the bill.

The Defendants gave notice of this motion on the 26th of April 1841; and on the 28th of the same month the Plaintiff obtained an order to amend his bill.

Mr. Pemberton, in support of the motion, after adverting to the great delay in getting in the other answers, asked, that if the order to amend prevented the dismissal of the bill, then that the Plaintiff might pay the costs of this application.

Mr. Stone, contrâ.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. Where a party, entitled to have a bill dismissed as against him for want of prosecution, makes an application to this Court for that purpose, and is prevented [125] from obtaining the order, by some step taken by the Plaintiff after service of the notice of motion, the usual course is, to order the Plaintiff to pay the costs of the application. Here the Plaintiff can only excuse the great delay in the prosecution of the suit by shewing that he has used due diligence in getting in the answers of the other Defendants.(1) There has been considerable delay in getting in the answer of the Attorney-General; but even now, the cause cannot go on, in consequence of the answers of the other Defendants not having been put in. If, however, the Plaintiff could shew, that using due diligence he could not have got in the answers of the other Defendants, that would be an answer to this application.

The Court made no order on the motion, but ordered the Plaintiff to pay the costs of the application.

Reg. Lib. 1840, B. 621.

[126] NICKLIN v. PATTEN. May 8, 1841.

Where a Defendant, in contempt for want of answer, files it without paying or tendering the costs of the contempt, but which are afterwards accepted by the Plaintiff, the time to accept under the 4th Order.(1828) runs from the filing of the answer, and not from the acceptance of the costs.

The Defendant, who was in contempt for want of an answer, filed his answer on the 20th of February, without paying or tendering the costs of the contempt. The Plaintiff being about to move to take the answer off the file, the Defendant, on the 27th of February, paid the costs of the contempt, which were accepted by the Plaintiff.

On the 21st of April the Plaintiff took exceptions to the Defendant's answer for insufficiency, and referred them on the 4th of May.

Under the 4th General Order of April 1828 (Ordines Can. 6), the Plaintiff is to be allowed two months to file exceptions, and which, in this case, if reckoned from the filing of the answer, expired on the 18th of April; but, if reckoned from the time of the acceptance of the costs, had not expired at the time when the Plaintiff delivered the exceptions.

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Heathfield now moved to discharge the order referring the exceptions, on the ground that time ran from filing the answer, and not from the time of clearing the contempt; that by force of the above order the answer became sufficient on the 18th of April. They cited Sidgier v. Tyte (11 Ves. 202).

Mr. Girdlestone and Mr. Elmsley, contra, contended that as the Defendant had no right to file his answer [127] until he had cleared his contempt, time was to be computed from the acceptance of costs, for before that time it was competent to the Plaintiff to move to have the answer taken off the file for irregularity.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. I must be governed by the 4th Order. I cannot introduce a new term into it, and say that time is to be reckoned not from the filing of the answer, but from the acceptance of costs. The Plaintiff might have moved to take the answer off the file, but instead of this he accepted the costs and waived the irregularity: seven days were thereby lost. If the Plaintiff found that he had not time to file his exceptions, he ought to have applied to the Court to be at liberty to file them, but he has thought proper to file them without regard to the terms of the General Order. The motion must be granted with costs.

(1) NOTE.—See the following General Orders: 13th and 16th of April 1828, and the 26th of December 1833, Ordines Can. pages 8, 10, and 52.

[127] PEARCE v. GRAY. May 28, 31, 1841.

Though a Defendant may put in a further answer before the certificate of the Master as to the insufficiency of his former answer has been filed, yet the Plaintiff cannot refer the second answer until after the filing of the certificate.

A party who has served and proceeded on an irregular order of course is not at liberty to abandon it, upon tender to his adversary of the costs. The order must be considered as a valid and subsisting order, until it is disposed of in some regular course, and when costs are due to a party, the amount must be ascertained in a regular course.

Where an irregular order has been obtained, no subsequent order to the same effect can be had until the former has been discharged.

The Plaintiff took exceptions to the Defendant's answer, some of which the Master on the 23d of April allowed: on the following day the Defendant filed a further answer.

[128] On the 28th of April, and before the Master's certificate had been filed, the Plaintiff obtained an order of course to refer the bill, answer, exceptions, and further answer. This order was served on the Defendant on the following day, and a warrant to proceed before the Master was taken out and served. On the 4th of May the parties attended before the Master, when an objection was raised that the certificate had not been filed, and which was admitted to be good. On the 5th of April the Defendant gave notice of motion to discharge the order of the 28th of April for irregularity, and the Plaintiff on the same day filed the certificate, and gave notice to the Defendant that he abandoned the order of the 28th of April, and he tendered at first 6s. 8d. and afterwards £1, 6s. 8d. for costs.

On the 5th of May the Plaintiff took out another order of reference similar to that of the 28th of April, and he served a warrant to proceed thereon before the Master on the 8th; and he also gave notice to the Defendant, that if he persevered in his notice of the 5th of May he would ask for costs. On the 8th of May there was an attendance ex parte before the Master, and exceptions were allowed on the order of reference of the 5th of May.

On the 10th of May an order was obtained by the Plaintiff for leave to amend his bill, and that the Defendant might answer the amendments and exceptions together.

Two motions were now made on behalf of the Defendant: the first to discharge the order of the 28th of April and the second to discharge the orders of the 5th and 10th of May.

[129] Mr. Bethell, for the Plaintiff.

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Dunn, for the Defendant.

See Beames's Orders, 292, Wynne v. Jackson (2 S. & S. 226), Rushton v. Troughton (3 Sim. 33), Frisby v. Stafford (7 Sim. 365), Ingham v. Ingham (9 Sim. 363; 2 Dan. Pr. 317).

May 31. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. It is not denied that the order of the 28th of April was inadvertently and irregularly obtained, before the Master's certificate was filed; but it was contended that the Plaintiff had a right to abandon the order, and that upon payment of costs properly incurred by the Defendant the order thus abandoned might be considered as not having been made; and that in this case a proper sum was tendered to the Defendant for his costs. The argument appears to me to be unfounded on both points. A party who has obtained an order of course, and served and proceeded upon it, is not at liberty to abandon it upon his own terms. The order must be considered as a valid and subsisting order, until it is disposed of in some regular course; and when costs are due to a party, the amount must be ascertained in a regular course.

The Plaintiff, I have no doubt, made the mistake through mere inadvertence; but the mistake could, I think, be corrected only by discharging the order of the 28th of April: and I am, therefore, of opinion, that the first of the motions now before me must be granted. And as it further appears to me, that until the order [130] of the 28th of April was discharged, no second order to the same effect could regularly be obtained, I am of opinion, that the order of the 5th of May, the proceedings under it, and the order of the 10th of May, are all irregular; and the Defendant never having acquiesced in it, was not bound to attend before the Master on the 8th of May.

Motions granted with costs.

Where a Plaintiff, upon an application for an ex parte injunction, suppresses material facts, the injunction will be dissolved on that ground alone; and the Plaintiff will not be allowed, on a motion to dissolve, to maintain it on the merits then disclosed. Where the rights of the Plaintiff and the Defendant are legal, the Plaintiff, in asking for an injunction to protect him from a violation of his alleged legal rights, ought to shew that the right has been established, or that, having had no means of establishing it but the right being prima facie well founded, the interference of this Court is necessary, to prevent that species and extent of mischief which this Court calls irremediable, before the right can be established by legal proceeding.

Whether a custom for a lord to prosecute mining operations under the soil, so as to destroy the buildings of the copyholders, without making any compensation is a valid custom. Quære.

The Plaintiff was a copyholder, holding two houses in the manor of Newcastle-under-Lyne. The Defendant was the lessee under the Crown of the mines of coal and ironstone in that manor. Considerable damage having been done to the neighbouring houses, by means of the mining operations carried on in the vicinity, and great apprehension being entertained for the safety of those belonging to the Plaintiff, he filed a bill for an injunction to restrain the Defendant from so working his mines as to injure or endanger his house. The Plaintiff had, in January 1841, applied ex parte to the Master of the Rolls for a special injunction, which he obtained, and a motion was now made to dissolve it. The facts of the case are fully stated in 1 Craig & Phillips, 283, and the judgment of the Master of the Rolls, post, p. 136.

[131] Mr. Pemberton, Mr. George Turner, and Mr. Purvis, without going into the merits, insisted that the injunction ought to be dissolved; on the ground that the Plaintiff, in applying ex parte, had omitted material facts, and that he had not come with promptness, and immediately upon his apprehending an injunction was necessary to prevent an alleged irremediable injury.

Mr. Kindersley, Mr. Bethell, and Mr. Hardy, contra, contended that there was no suppression; secondly, that under the peculiar circumstances, the Plaintiff had come with due diligence; and, thirdly, that inasmuch as if the technical objection raised by the Defendant prevailed, it would become necessary again to discuss the merits on another motion for an injunction, the more convenient course would be to enter at once into the merits, and then for the Court to deal with the objection as to suppression upon the consideration of costs.

Mr. Pemberton, in reply, insisted on his right to have the case decided on the technical points raised.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. I have some regret in deciding this case on such narrow grounds. Whatever may be the value of the property, the Plaintiff is entitled to the utmost protection of the law; but he must bring forward his case consistently with the rules of the Court, one of which is, that an ex parte injunction cannot be maintained, if on the ex parte application any material facts have been suppressed. Granting ex parte injunctions is always a very arbitrary proceeding; it is making an order against a party in his absence; but it is most important that this jurisdiction of the Court should be maintained, in order to prevent the commission of irremediable mischief.

[132] When the application was made for this injunction, it appeared from the Plaintiff's own statement, that he was acquainted with the damage in March; and the application for the injunction not having been made until May, I should, according to a practice which I have constantly acted on, have refused to grant the injunction ex parte; and I should have appointed an early day to hear the case in the presence of both parties. This objection was, however, met by a statement, that it was only within seven days that the Plaintiff had been made acquainted with the damage which threatened his house, and that he had, in the meantime, trusted that the mining operations would have been so carried on as not to injure it.

The only question is, whether, under the circumstances, and having regard to the facts now newly stated, the Plaintiff and his advisers were justified in trusting in that way: and on hearing the affidavits it is impossible to say they ought, or to doubt that Lord Granville and his agent intended proceeding towards the Plaintiff's house. My opinion on this motion is, that if I had known the facts, now brought forward for the first time, I should not have granted the injunction ex parte. The consequence is, that this, as an ex parte injunction, cannot be maintained, and it must be dissolved with costs. I give no opinion on the merits; it is open for the Plaintiff to move on notice for an injunction, and then the merits will have to be considered.

June 8. The Plaintiff now moved for a special injunction.

Mr. Kindersley, Mr. Bethell, and Mr. Hardy, for the Plaintiff. [133] The right insisted on by the Defendant cannot be maintained; it shocks common sense; for not only does the Defendant claim the right of destroying the Plaintiff's houses by his mining operations, but he insists that he has a right to undermine and engulf all the buildings on the manor, including the parish church, the infirmary, and the extensive potteries, without even making the slightest compensation for the damage. It appears from the affidavits, that to such an extent has the injury been carried, that 77 out of 150 houses have already been damaged. This claim on the part of the Defendant is very different from a reasonable custom to sink a shaft on the copyhold land to enable the lord to obtain the material.

The way in which the Defendant puts his case does not, however, amount to a custom; he says, that for a series of years he, and the former lessees, have been accustomed to damage houses and buildings on the manor, without making any compensation. The times, the places, and the names of the parties injured, are not stated. This does not amount to a custom. It is true occasional and accidental damage may have accrued, but here the lessee boldly claims the right to effect a premeditated intention of wholly destroying the Plaintiff's copyhold estate.

To establish a valid custom there must be, first, an immemorial usage; and secondly, it must be good in point of law. That is, it must be defined, certain, and reasonable. If such be the requisites, the right claimed is bad, and void in law, and no usage could make it good. Such a custom might utterly annihilate the property of the tenant, and would be inconsistent with the estate granted by the lord. In Bradburn v. Wilks (Willes's Rep. 360) a [134] custom was claimed by the lord, when he had sunk pits on the freshhold lands, part of the manor, to cast the rubbish, &c., on the customary land, near such pits, there to remain. The custom was held void as unreasonable, the Court observing, "The true objections to the custom are, that it would be uncertain and likewise unreasonable, as it may deprive the tenant of the whole benefit of the land; and it cannot be presumed, that the tenant, at first, would come into such an agreement." This decision was affirmed in the Exchequer Chamber (2 Strange, 1224). In Badger v. Ford (3 Barn. & Ald. 153) it was held that a custom for the lord to grant leases of the waste of the manor, without restriction, was bad in point of law. The observation of Lord Tenterden strongly applies to the present case, "I think it is too much to suppose a reservation of a power by the lord, at the time of the original grant, the effect of which would be to enable him to annihilate the right of common altogether. Such a custom cannot exist." The same point was held in Arlett v. Ellis (7 B. & C. 346), where a similar sort of alleged custom was held bad, "because it would go to the destruction of the rights of the common altogether." The rights are wholly inconsistent; and although one custom may qualify another, it cannot entirely subvert it. Supposing the Defendant, by custom, to have a right to the minerals, he is bound to work the mines in a reasonable manner, as seems to have been formerly done, and leave proper support for the surface. In Harris v. Ryding (5 M. & W. 60) there was a grant of the surface in fee, with a reservation of the mines, with liberty of ingress, and to dig and sink shafts.

It was held that the grantor was not entitled to take all the mines ; but only so much as he could get, leaving a reasonable support for the surface.

[135] There is this further ground for equitable relief : the Defendant and his father have stood by and allowed the houses to be built by the copyholders ; so that if the lessee had the right contended for, the Plaintiff would be still entitled to the injunction. If a party build a house near the boundary, the Court would not permit his neighbour, after a lapse of years, so to deal with his own land, as to destroy the house of his neighbour.

The plea in Paddock's action (Cr. & Ph. 2881) admitted the liability to make a reasonable compensation to the tenant. If, then, the Defendant be liable to make compensation, he ought to be prevented committing an injury which is incapable of compensation. The right of the Defendant has never been established, and ought to be put in a train of investigation ; in the meantime, the Plaintiff ought to have his property protected from being thrown down by the Defendant's mining operations. They also cited Gilbert's Tenures, 327, 425.

Mr. Pemberton, Mr. George Turner, and Mr. Purvis, contra. The copyholder's rights are limited by the grant from the lord, in whom the freehold is vested. Where, by custom, the mines and the rights to work them are reserved, the buildings erected by the copyholders are subject to all the incidents to which the land itself is subject ; for the copyholders cannot, by erecting buildings on the land, infringe on the lord's right to get the minerals under it, or compel him to deviate from the line of his mining operations. By the general custom of copyhold tenures, if a tenant build on the copyhold land, it is waste ; unless it be sanctioned by the custom, or be authorised by the permission of the lord ; Comyn's Digest (Copyhold, 181, M. 3, Forfeiture), 1 Coke's Inst. 53 a. The [136] custom in this manor to grant leases of coal and iron is carried back so far as 10 Rich. 2. There is sufficient usage to support this right. There is nothing so unreasonable in the custom as to invalidate it in point of law. In Bateson v. Green (5 Term Rep. 411) a custom for the lord to dig clay pits, to an unlimited extent, where the herbage was insufficient for the tenants, and where four out of ten acres of the herbage had been destroyed, was supported ; and see Clarkson v. Woodhouse (5 Term Rep. 412, n.), Folkard v. Hemmett (5 Term Rep. 417, n.). If, as the Plaintiff contends, the Defendant is liable to make compensation, then such is the custom, and there his claim is at law, and not in equity, and there is no ground for an injunction.

The Court will consider the inconveniences on both sides in granting an injunction ; Grey v. The Duke of Northumberland (13 Ves. 236 ; and 17 Ves. 281). Here the lessee has expended more than £100,000 to enable him to work these mines. If they were stopped, it would be productive of the greatest injury to the Defendant, and 300 men would be put out of employ. On the other hand, the whole value of the Plaintiff's property is less than £200. If the Court were to restrain the works, and the lessee's rights were afterwards established, it would be impossible to set him right and afford him compensation for the damage he had sustained by the act of the Court. The Plaintiff is a person of humble circumstances, put forward by a combination of the other copyholders ; who, if they had been Plaintiffs, would, from their conduct, have been held by the Court disentitled to the injunction. The Plaintiff ought, therefore, to be in no better situation.

[137] Mr. Kindersley, in reply.

June 14. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. The Plaintiff, being entitled to two copyhold houses in the manor of Newcastle-under-Lyne, prays for an injunction to restrain the Defendant, who is lessee of the mines of coal and ironstone within the same manor, from so working his mines as to injure or endanger the Plaintiff's houses.

The rights asserted on the part of the Plaintiff and of the Defendant are legal rights ; and the Plaintiff, asking for the assistance of a Court of Equity to protect him from a violation of his alleged legal right, ought to shew that the right has been established, or that, having had no means of establishing it, but the right being prima facie well founded, the interference of this Court is necessary, to prevent that species and extent of mischief, which this Court calls irremediable, before the right can be established by legal proceedings. In this case, it appears that the Plaintiff, personally, has not had any opportunity of establishing his right at law ; and, therefore, the question is, what is the result of the evidence now adduced, as to the right which he claims, and as to the nature and extent of damage, with which he is threatened, if his claim of right appears to be well founded.

The Queen, in right of the Duchy of Lancaster, is lady of the manor; Crown leases of the mines of coal and ironstone within the manor, have been granted, distinctly from the manor itself, from an early period; and the lessees have, from time to time, obtained coal in considerable quantities, and some ironstone.

[138] The houses now belonging to the Plaintiff, together with many other houses, were built about the year 1797, in the immediate neighbourhood of several shafts and pits, which were then open; and two of the witnesses state their belief, that before the houses were built, the Cannell Row coal had been obtained from under that part of the field on which the houses now are.

At that time, the Defendant's father, the late Marquis of Stafford, was lessee of the mines. The Defendant became entitled to the lease in 1803; and renewed or additional leases have since been granted to him. The mines have been constantly worked, and there being houses on some parts of the surface, it is stated by William Jervis, that in working for coal under houses, certain supports were left to prevent injury to the houses; and that in working for coal under the open ground, as no damage to houses was apprehended, instructions were given to clear all out. In the progress of the works, however, damage was occasionally done, or was expected to be done, to buildings on the surface; and so early as 1801, some of the copyholders endeavoured to obtain enfranchisements, so that their estates might be discharged from the mines, the working of which, was, or was likely to be, injurious to buildings. The endeavour was not successful, and the mines continued to be worked. It appears from the evidence, that the coal and ironstone lie to some extent in alternate strata, the vein of ironstone being sometimes above and sometimes below a bed of coal; and sometimes between two veins, or beds of coal. And although the mines were principally worked for coal, ironstone in some though not in large quantities has, so far as the evidence goes, always been obtained. Mr. Forrester, the resident mining agent for the Defendant, had proposed to obtain ironstone for smelting about the [139] year 1813; an increased demand for coal prevented the proposal being carried into effect, at that time. Afterwards, in the year 1826, the working of the mines having, as it would seem, occasioned considerable damage to buildings, a memorial to the Defendant was presented by several copyholders who complained of the injury, and claimed a right to compensation; it does not appear that, at that time, any question was raised as to the Defendant's right to work the mines under houses; what was claimed was, that if in working the mines, damage was done to the houses, the Defendant should make compensation for such damage. He denied his liability, refused to make any compensation, and no attempt was then made to enforce the claim. About the year 1832 the ironstone began to be obtained for smelting; and it has ever since been obtained, on an extensive scale, and in much larger quantities than before. An attempt has been made to distinguish the Defendant's right to work the ironstone, from his right to work the coal; but, upon the evidence before me, there does not appear to be any difference. The Defendant being lessee of the mines of both minerals, appears to have as much right to get one as the other; and to be subject to no greater liability as to one, than he is as to the other.

In the progress of his extended operations as to the ironstone, and in the year 1839, the Defendant caused to be made a new level, which runs under and across three streets of the houses built about the year 1797. This level is about sixty-five yards below the surface; and the workings have been continued from it, under the houses. The Plaintiff's houses are at the distance of sixty-seven yards from the level; the Defendant's works have advanced from the level towards the Plaintiff's houses; and many houses, situated between the level and the Plaintiff's houses, have been damaged. [140] According to the evidence adduced by the Plaintiff, the damage has arisen from the Defendant's working for ironstone. Some of the witnesses for the Defendant raise a doubt, whether the injury would have arisen from working for ironstone, if the Cannell Row coal, obtained, as is supposed, before the houses were built, had not been improperly worked. It does not appear, that all the houses under which the mining has been carried on, have been injured; but it is not denied, that many houses have been considerably damaged; and although the Plaintiff's houses are yet sound, it seems, at least, very probable, that they will be damaged in the progress of the works, if continued.

The Defendant insists that he has a right to work the mines in the manner most advantageous to himself; that his lease and the custom of the manor enable him to do so, and that the building of houses, even if authorised by the custom, and by the grant of houses to be held according to the custom of the manor, cannot interfere with his right; and he, therefore, claims to be entitled to work the minerals, even at the risk of damaging the houses, without being liable to make any compensation, if damage should be actually done; and the Defendant has been at all times desirous to facilitate the trial at law of the question, which, in this respect, has arisen between him and the copyholders.

The Plaintiff has, by his bill, in somewhat ambiguous terms, stated a claim more extensive than the relief he prays; and in the argument, it has not been denied, that the Defendant is entitled to work the mines, and it is not alleged, that the Defendant is working the mines in an improper manner for the purpose of winning the minerals; but it is sought to enjoin him from winning them in such a way as to damage the Plaintiff's houses.

[141] Upon the evidence now produced, I find no reason to conclude that the Defendant is not entitled to work the mines in a proper manner, for the purpose of obtaining the minerals which may lie under houses. It must be, and indeed is, admitted, that in prosecuting such works the houses may be damaged. Whether the Defendant is answerable for such damage and liable to make compensation, is not a question which can be determined here or by anticipation. The facts proved shew, that the copyholders have, for a long time, sought for compensation, without adopting any effective measures for enforcing their claim. Upon the merits of the question, it is not my intention to give any opinion; but it appears to me, that the view most favourable to the Plaintiff, which, upon the evidence before me, I can take, is, that the Defendant, though entitled to work the mines, is liable to make compensation for any damage which he may do to houses on the surface; and in this view of the case, I think, that I ought not to grant the injunction, but to leave the Plaintiff to his legal remedy, if the Defendant, in continuing his work, does the damage which is expected to the Plaintiff's houses.

The opinion which I have thus formed, has made it unnecessary for me to consider the effect of the mode in which the suit is prosecuted, at the instance and at the request of persons, who, having had rights similar to those of the Plaintiff, have, by their own conduct and laches, deprived themselves of the right to an injunction. I incline to think that in the consideration of the Plaintiff's right, I could not have noticed those circumstances.

[142] PULLAN v. RAWLINS. June 1, 14, 1841.

A will, proved abroad and retained there, established on production of a copy certified under the hand and seal of the proper officer, &c., which had been admitted to probate in the Ecclesiastical Court here.

This was a creditor's suit, and it sought (amongst other things) to have the will of the testator established. It appeared that he died in America in 1795, possessing a plantation in the Island of St. Christopher, out of which the bill sought to obtain payment. The original will was not produced in Court, it having been proved in America, and deposited there, but a copy was produced from the Prerogative Court in England, where it had been admitted to probate. To this was affixed a certificate, under the hand and seal of the registrar of wills in Baltimore, in America, that such copy was a true copy of the original, which had been proved by the oaths of the three subscribing witnesses.

The clerk of the council of the State of Maryland, under the Great Seal of the State, certified, that the party signing the certificate was the duly appointed registrar.

Mr. Temple and Mr. Heathfield, for the Plaintiff, submitted, that as the original will could not be produced, the present secondary evidence was sufficient to enable the Court to establish the will.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS hesitated in establishing the will in the absence of the original, but took time to consider the point, and requested the registrars to search for authorities in the meantime.

June 14. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale] said he found, on enquiry, that such orders had been made by Sir Joseph Jekyl and [143] Lord Eldon, and that, therefore, he should make the order on the production of the proper legalized transcript.

The Court declared the will well proved, and that the same ought to be established and the trust thereof performed and carried into effect.

The following notes of authorities were produced by the registrars :—

Gardner v. Myra. M. R. June 13, 1738.

Will established on secondary evidence, the original being in the colonies.

The bill was to have an execution of the trusts in the will of John Gardner. An order for the clerk in Court to attend with the record of the depositions read. The will of John Gardner, as set forth in the record of the Plaintiff's interrogatories . . . read. Cur. It appearing to the Court that the original will of John Gardner, the Plaintiff's grandfather, is in Jamaica, and that other persons than those before the Court claim real estates under the said will, so that it is not in the power of the Plaintiff to procure the will to be brought hither, and the Plaintiff, and the Defendant the heir at law, and the surviving trustee named in the said will, residing in England, Declare, &c.

Bayley v. Bayley. L. C. 1802.

Will proved in the West Indies, established on production of attested copy and prerogative probate.

Declare this will to be well proved, and declare the will proved in the West Indies, decreed to be established, &c., upon the production of the attested copy and probate in the Prerogative Court.

Reg. Lib. A. 1801, A. fol. 994.

[144] Ellis v. Medlicott. M. R. Feb. 20, 1810.

A lost will of real estate established by means of a copy.

Bill by executors and trustees of W. Medlicott, deceased, against William Medlicott the heir at law, to establish the will of their testator. One of the executors, W. Goode, attended at Doctors' Commons with the original will to prove the same, and a commission was issued to take the oath of Ellis the other executor; the commission was executed, and with the original will, inclosed in a parcel sent up to London by a coach which was robbed on the way and the parcel abstracted, and has never since been found. The executors then exhibited for proof in the Prerogative Court, a parchment copy of the will, which had been previously made and examined with the original will; on which the Court granted probate. The trustees subsequently contracted to sell the testator's real estates, but the purchaser refused to complete unless the copy of the will was established by the decree of this Court. A bill was filed by executors and trustees against heir to establish will. Whereupon, and upon debate of the matter and hearing, an exhibit marked A., purporting to be a copy of the will of W. Medlicott, dated the 3d day of February 1807, and the proofs taken in this cause read, and what was alleged by the counsel on both sides. His Honor doth declare that the copy of the will of W. Medlicott, the testator in the pleadings named, proved by the Plaintiffs in the Prerogative Court in the Archbishop of Canterbury, and in this cause, is a true copy of the will of the said testator, and ought to be established as his will, and doth order and decree the same accordingly by the Plaintiffs, the trustees, to pay costs of suit to Defendant the heir.

Reg. Lib. 1809, A. fol. 252.

Harrison v. Weale. August 8, Nov. 7, 1840.

Will established on production of official transcript, and of prerogative probate thereof.

The will was not produced in Court; but a transcript of the will produced in Court on the 7th day of November 1840, and entered in the decree as follows:—
“An official transcript of the will of William George Harrison, the testator in the pleadings named, proved in the Prerogative Court of Canterbury by the executor in England, probate of the will read.”

[145] RAMSBOTTOM v. FREEMAN. June 23, 1841.

An injunction may be obtained before appearance upon personal service of the notice of motion; but a receiver cannot, except leave be given to serve the notice personally.

Such leave will not be granted, unless it appear that the Plaintiff has used due diligence to compel an appearance.

This was a bill by an equitable mortgagee against the mortgagor. A subpoena had been served, but no appearance had been entered by the Defendant to the bill.

A notice of motion for an injunction and receiver having been served on the Defendant personally,

Mr. Lovat now moved for an injunction and receiver. He stated that the Defendant not having appeared, it was impossible to serve his clerk in Court with the notice of motion in the usual way.

The Defendant did not appear on the motion.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale] said that the motion for a receiver could not, except by special leave of the Court, proceed, on a notice of motion served personally. (1)

Mr. Lovat then moved, ex parte, for the injunction, and asked for liberty to serve a notice of motion for a receiver on the Defendant personally, for the next motion day.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale] granted the injunction, but said he could not give the leave asked, until he had been satisfied that due diligence had been used by the Plaintiff to compel an appearance.

[146] STRICKLAND v. STRICKLAND. June 3, 1841.

A simple application to enlarge publication, involving no specialty, should be made to the Master in the first instance, and not to the Court.

Cases stated, which though they come within the letter of the 3d & 4th W. 4, c. 94, s. 13, yet the applications ought to be made to the Court in the first instance, and not to the Master.

Mr. Girdlestone and Mr. L. Shadwell moved, in this case, to enlarge publication. They argued, that the application had properly been made to the Court in the first instance, and not to the Master. In Carr v. Appleyard (1 Keen, 725, and 2 Myl. & Cr. 476), the Defendant moved that he might be at liberty to examine his witnesses in the cause notwithstanding publication had passed, and that publication might pass accordingly, and it was held by the Master of the Rolls and the Lord Chancellor that the case did not come within the statute 3 & 4 W. 4, c. 94, s. 13. By the 18th

(1) The practice has been, to some extent, altered by the 3d General Order of April 1842; see Ordines Can. 198; and see also the 17th, 19th, 20th and 21st Orders of October 1842, Ordines Can. 213, 214, 215.

General Order of 1828 (Ordines Can. 14), publication is not to be enlarged except upon special application to the Court made upon notice, &c.

Mr. Bethell, contra. This application ought to have been made to the Master, for by the statute referred to, the Masters are to hear and determine all applications for enlarging publication. There is a difference where the time for passing publication has passed; but here it will not pass until the last day of the present term.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. It is not in consequence of any doubt that I entertained, but because of the peculiar construction which the Court has put on this Act of Parliament in particular instances, that I have required this case to be [147] argued. This Act has received what is called a liberal construction; and has been construed with reference to the established rules and practice of the Court, and with a view to carry into effect, and not defeat, the intention of the Legislature. Though the Act says, that certain things are to be done by the Master, and by the Court upon appeal only, yet it has been held, that in some cases, convenience and the interests of the suitors require, that the order should be made by the Court in the first instance. Thus where the order is of course, and requires neither hearing or argument, as in the case of an order of course to amend, the Court holds it unnecessary to make an application to the Master. (1) So where the practice is regulated by the General Orders of the Court, and it becomes necessary in particular cases to relax or dispense with them, it is held that the Act does not apply, for the Master has no power to relax or dispense with the General Orders of the Court. Thus where the General Orders direct, that no order to amend the bill shall be made, except within a stated time, the Master has no power to grant leave to amend after that time has expired, but the party must come to the Court. (2) It would be highly absurd to go to the Master, for that which he has not authority to give, and then come to the Court by way of appeal from the Master's decision.

Another instance is where a party requires something which he may obtain on an application to the Master, but which is essentially connected with something else [148] which the Master has not power to grant. In such a case the application is properly made to the Court. It would be a grievous hardship, and an unnecessary expense to make a party separate the two things, and be required to make two applications, one to the Master and the other to the Court. (Rees v. Edwards, 1 Keen, 465.)

And, again, where the cause is before the Court at the hearing or on any occasion, and the whole facts having been necessarily brought before the attention of the Court, it is suggested that an amendment, or something else, is necessary (Waterton v. Croft, 6 Sim. 438; Milligan v. Mitchell, 1 Myl. & Cr. 433; Biedermann v. Seymour, 2 Myl. & Cr. 117): in such a case the Court will itself make the order; for nothing would be more useless than to send the matter for adjudication to an inferior jurisdiction, when the Appellate Court has, already, cognizance of all the facts necessary for a decision.

I have stated the grounds on which the Court acts in such cases. These are, to be sure, somewhat strong constructions of the Act; but they have been made for the sake of the parties, and in order to carry into effect the real intention of the Legislature.

The present case, however, falls within neither of the exceptions. It is a simple case of an application to enlarge publication without any specialty. I think that the application ought in the first instance to have been made to the Master, and not to the Court: I must therefore refuse it with costs.

[149] TARBUCK v. TARBUCK. June 10, 29, 1841.

In October 1839 a client obtained an order to tax his solicitor's bill. He commenced the taxation in January 1840, and proceeded therein to a very considerable extent. A year and a half after, and before the report, the client applied to vary the order. Held, that, after his acquiescence, he came too late to alter the order, and too early to correct any erroneous principle acted on by the Master.

Whether, where after the taxation of a particular bill of costs as between solicitor and client, a general taxation is directed, a solicitor can include items included in the former taxation, but not allowed, or ought, for the purpose of explanation, to introduce items taxed and paid on the former taxation, Quære.

This cause came on upon a petition presented by Hannah Tarbuck, Henry Tarbuck, and Francis Tarbuck, the executrix and executors of John Tarbuck, deceased.

This suit, it appeared, had been instituted for the administration of the estate of James Tarbuck, deceased, in which John Tarbuck was a Defendant, and the Petitioner Henry Tarbuck a Plaintiff.

John Tarbuck in his lifetime, and the Petitioners after his death, having employed Mr. Croudson as their solicitor, the Petitioners, on the 30th October 1839, obtained two orders for taxing his bills of costs. The first was obtained on the petition of the Petitioners describing themselves to be executrix and executors of John Tarbuck, deceased; and it was thereby ordered that Mr. Croudson should, within fourteen days, deliver to the Petitioners all such bills as he claimed to be due to him from the estate of John Tarbuck, deceased, in that and all other causes, suits, and matters in which he had been employed by the said John Tarbuck. The second order was obtained by the Petitioners, not therein describing themselves as representatives of John Tarbuck; and it was thereby ordered, that Croudson should, within fourteen days after notice, deliver to the Petitioners all such bills as he claimed to be due to him from the [150] Petitioners, in that and all other causes, suits, and matters, wherein he had been employed by them. The orders contained the usual submission to pay what should appear to be due, and the usual orders to tax the bills.

June 29. The orders having been served, Mr. Croudson delivered to the Petitioners not less than eighteen bills of costs, some of them of great length, and containing charges to a large amount.

The Petitioners carried the bills into the Master's office, and proceeded in the taxation to a very considerable extent. But before the same had been concluded, or the Master had made his certificate, they presented this petition, praying that Mr. Croudson might be ordered to strike certain items out of his bill of costs, and to bring in certain bills already taxed and paid, and that the Master might be directed, not to retax the bills which had been taxed; that the undertakings entered into by the Petitioners in the orders for taxing the bills might be discharged, and new undertakings substituted; and that the two orders, dated the 30th October 1839, might be discharged or varied, so far as might be necessary for the purposes of the petition.

It seemed that, in a cause and in a lunacy, several bills of costs, charges, and expenses due from John Tarbuck to Mr. Croudson had been taxed as between solicitor and client, and paid or ordered to be paid. And the principal complaint now was, that under the orders of 30th October 1839, Mr. Croudson delivered to the Petitioners bills of costs, in which many items were the same identical items in words and amounts and in effect as were comprised in the bills of costs, charges, [151] and expenses before taxed and paid, or ordered to be paid.

The fact was not denied; but it was said, that in a taxation of the nature directed by the orders of 30th of October 1839, some charges might be allowed, which were not allowed as costs, charges, and expenses between solicitor and client, to be paid out of a general fund; and that when such items of charges which might be allowed against the party, though not against a general fund, were submitted for taxation, it was the practice not to deliver a bill of those items only, which would not be intelligible, but a bill of all the business done, including those particular items which became intelligible by being seen in connection with the rest.

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Rogers, in support of the petition.

Mr. G. Turner, contra, for Mr. Croudson.

Mr. Rogers, in reply.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS, after observing on the facts, said, that the Petitioners might be held bound by acquiescence, in acting so long under the order; but that the point so raised was of so much importance to the practice of the Court, that he should make inquiries before he decided it.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale] stated the above circumstances, and proceeded.

The Petitioners now say, that these bills were not delivered pursuant to the order, or pursuant to the [152] understanding subsisting between the Petitioners and Mr. Croudson before the orders were obtained; but, instead of making any complaint at the time, instead of applying to the Court to set the orders right if they contained more than the Petitioners intended to apply for or were bound to abide by, they carried the bills of costs in the Master's office for taxation; and the proceedings upon such taxation, which commenced in January 1840, have been carried on to a very considerable extent; and it is, whilst the proceedings are in progress, and before any finding of the Master, that this petition is presented.

The fact is not denied; but it is said, that in a taxation of the nature directed by the orders of 30th October 1839, some charges may be allowed, which are not allowed as costs, charges and expenses between solicitor and client, to be paid out of a general fund; and that when such items of charges which may be allowed against the party, though not against a general fund, are submitted for taxation, it is the practice not to deliver a bill of those items only, which would not be intelligible, but a bill of all the business done, including those particular items which became intelligible by being seen in connection with all the rest. Upon inquiry, I find that many experienced practitioners consider this to be the practice. There is, however, some difference of opinion; and if this point were now to be decided, it would have to be considered what reasons and under what limitations the supposed rule of practice could be sustained. It probably may appear, that under some circumstances, and under certain limitations, the alleged practice may be perfectly right; whilst, in other circumstances, it would not. It may be true, that the extra items would be unintelligible, if the only items in [153] the bill; and yet it may not be necessary to retax the whole of the bills previously taxed and paid, in order to see the connection of the extra items meant to be taxed with the rest of the business; but I think that this point is not to be decided on the present occasion, as the Petitioners come too late or too early. If they had reason for the complaint they now make, I think that they ought not to have carried in the bills for taxation, and proceeded with the taxation, but to have made a proper application for relief; and having carried in the bills, and proceeded, so far as they have done, with the taxation, and restrained the solicitor so long from bringing his action, I think that they ought now to await the Master's certificate, and apply for relief, if they are advised that they are entitled to it, in a proper manner, if upon the certificate it should appear that the Master has acted upon an erroneous principle. The acquiescence of the Petitioners, for so long a period, is without sufficient excuse, and appears to me to deprive them of all title to the relief which they pray at this time and in this manner.

[154] GARLICK v. JACKSON. June 12, 23, 1841.

[Cf. National Permanent, &c., Society v. Raper [1892], 1 Ch. 54.]

A mortgagee received rents between the Master's report and the day fixed for payment. Default being made: Held, that the mortgagee was not then entitled to an order absolute.

In this case, a decree for foreclosure had been made, and the Master had fixed a day for payment of the amount due on the mortgage, in default of which a foreclosure was ordered.

Between the date of the report and the day fixed for payment, the mortgagee received some rents of the mortgaged property. Default having been made in payment by the mortgagor,

R. II.—10*

Mr. Elderton applied to make the order for foreclosure absolute.

Mr. Wilbraham, on the part of the mortgagor, resisted the order, on the ground, that by receiving rents between the report and the day fixed for payment, the mortgagee had altered the amount as found due by the Master.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale] thought that the case must have frequently occurred before, and after taking time to consider the point, he refused the order absolute for foreclosure, observing that as the amount due had been varied by the intermediate receipt of the rent, another day must be fixed for payment.

[155] HOLMES v. THE MAYOR, &C., OF THE CORPORATION OF ARUNDEL and GEORGE BALCHIN. April 23, June 21, 1841.

An order of course, obtained by the Plaintiff to examine a Defendant against whom a replication has been filed, is irregular.

An order of course, obtained by the Plaintiff to examine a town councillor of a corporation, Defendants to the suit, and to whose answer a replication has been filed, is irregular, for if he be considered a party, the order is improper when there is a replication; and if he be not a party, the order is unnecessary.

This was a bill filed against the above corporation and against Balchin, the town clerk, and their answers having been put in, the Plaintiff filed a replication to them. John Halliday happened to be one of the town council, and the cause being at issue, the Plaintiff obtained an order of course for the examination of Balchin and Halliday as witnesses.

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Rogers now moved to discharge that order for irregularity. As to Balchin, they argued that it was a settled rule that a Defendant could not be examined as a witness, after his answer had been replied to, for the Plaintiff might thereby attempt to make the Defendant falsify his own answer; Winter v. Kent (2 Dick. 595; 1 Smith's Pr. 345; and see 2 Daniel's Pr. 454).

That as to Halliday, he was a member of the corporation, whose answer had been replied to; and if the Plaintiff waived all relief against Halliday, he could have none against the corporation of which he was a member, and must pay their costs; Harvey v. Tebbutt (1 Jac. & W. 197). On the other hand, if he were to be treated as no party to the cause, the order to examine him was unnecessary and irregular.

Mr. Wray, contra. Balchin is not strictly a party against whom any relief is prayed: he has been made a Defendant according to [156] the usual practice, as clerk of the corporation, merely for the sake of discovery. He may be examined as to matters in which he is not interested, as was the case of a Defendant in Nightingale v. Dodd (Ambler, 583). In Crookhall v. Smith (2 Fowler's Pr. 101), an executor was ordered to be examined as a witness to prove the execution of deeds, &c., his answer having been replied to.

Halliday is no party to the suit; the Plaintiff could not have withdrawn the replication as against him, and by the 6 & 7 W. 4, c. 104, burgesses are not to be deemed incompetent witnesses by reason of their being members of the body corporate.

The witnesses ought to demur to the interrogatories; the objection to the evidence ought to be taken by the Defendants at the hearing of the cause; Murray v. Shadwell (2 V. & B. 401).

Mr. Pemberton, in reply. If no relief be sought against Balchin, and if discovery only be sought, he should have been dismissed upon his answer coming in, and his costs should then have been paid. Crookhall v. Smith was an order made upon special application, and not an order of course as in the present case; and as to the statute referred to it removes the disqualification of interest which would otherwise exist, as in the case of parishioners; but it does not enable you to examine a party to a suit, the objection to which course of proceeding is founded on very different grounds from that of interest.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS said he would take an opportunity of further considering the case.

[157] June 21. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. In this case, the Plaintiff having filed a replication to the Defendant's answer, he afterwards, without withdrawing the replication, obtained an order of course, enabling him to examine the Defendant George Balchin and one John Halliday as witnesses, saving just exceptions; and a motion is made to discharge the order for irregularity.

If an answer be not replied to, the whole of it is taken to be true, and the Defendant, having credit for its being true, may be examined as a witness upon matters in which he is not interested, although he may be interested in other matters, in respect of which there may be a decree against him, upon his own statement, in his answer not replied to.

But the replication denies the truth of the whole answer, and shews that the Plaintiff considers the Defendant to be concerned in interest; and whilst the replication remains on the file, and the answer is thus denied to be true, the Plaintiff is not at liberty to allege, that the Defendant is not interested in any of the matters in question, or to examine him in a way which might tend to falsify any part of the answer.

It is not necessary now to consider what might be done between Co-defendants, or between the Plaintiff and Defendant, upon a special application for leave to examine a Defendant for the Plaintiff. This is the case of an order of course, and as regards Balchin, I think that it is irregular.

As to Halliday a question is made whether he is to be considered as a Defendant or not. If no Defendant, [158] the order as to him was unnecessary and improper. If a Defendant, the observations as to Balchin are applicable as to him.

I am of opinion that the order must be discharged with costs.

[158] LANCASTER v. EVORS. June 21, 22, 1841.

[S. C. 5 Jur. 525. For subsequent proceedings, see 1 Ph. 349; 41 E. R. 664; 10 Beav. 154. Distinguished, Yeatman v. Yeatman, 1877, 7 Ch. D. 214.]

It is a general rule, that a person having a claim on the assets of a testator, cannot in suing the executor make a debtor to the estate a party to the suit; but the rule admits of exceptions.

Case in which a creditor of a testatrix was allowed to sue the executors and persons claiming a fund standing in Court, on which the estate of the testatrix had an equitable demand, for the purpose of obtaining payment thereof, the executors having refused to take proceedings for establishing the demand.

A husband and wife joined in a mortgage of their respective estates, which were already incumbered, for the payment of debts of the husband. The estates were realised in two different suits; and the incumbrances paid. The husband's debt was, however, paid out of the wife's estate, which it exhausted; but there was a surplus of the husband's estate in Court. The husband and wife were both dead, and the only claims upon her estate were those of a mortgagee and a judgment creditor; and her only assets were such as might be realised from her equity against her husband's estate, for which her executors refused to sue. Held, that the judgment creditor might maintain a suit, against the wife's executors, the mortgagee, and a party claiming the fund in Court under the husband, for payment of the wife's two debts out of that fund.

This case came before the Court upon demurrer to the whole bill for want of equity and for multifariousness.

The statements in the bill were very complicated; but omitting those which did not affect the question now before the Court, the facts were as follows:—

In the year 1772 Sir John Pryce was seised of an estate, subject to a mortgage to Earl Temple for £24,000. Lady Pryce, his wife, was entitled to another estate, subject to a mortgage for £5500. The latter estate had been conveyed in trust for sale, and a contract had been entered into for the sale thereof.

[159] By deed, dated in January 1772, both estates and the surplus of the money to arise from the sale of Lady Pryce's estate, were conveyed by Sir John and Lady Pryce to trustees, upon trust to sell and pay the mortgages of £24,000 and £5500; then to secure certain monies due from Sir John Pryce to Jaques; then to pay £5000 to Lady Pryce, for her separate use, and the residue to Sir John Pryce.

Notwithstanding this deed, the Earl Temple filed a bill to obtain payment of his mortgage debt; and in a suit, entitled The Earl of Buckingham v. Pryce, Sir J. Pryce's estate was sold. The mortgage thereon was discharged, and £2821, the residue of the purchase-money, was paid into Court, in the cause of The Earl of Buckingham v. Pryce. This sum was allowed to accumulate, and now amounted to £20,972 consols.

Sir John Pryce died in 1776; his wife survived him, and died about the year 1805.

In 1832 the mortgage on Lady Pryce's estate was discharged in a suit entitled Burney v. Scott, instituted by Burney, a judgment creditor, Morgan, a mortgage creditor of Lady Pryce, and Lady Pryce. Out of the surplus of the produce of this estate the debt due from Sir John Pryce to Jaques, amounting to £5323, was paid, under the provisions of the deed of 1772. What remained was insufficient to satisfy the debts due to Morgan and Burney. The amount of these debts had, however, been ascertained by the Master in the suit of Burney v. Scott.

This bill was filed by Lancaster, the representative of Burney the judgment creditor, against Evors (who, as heir or personal representative of Sir John Pryce, [160] claimed the £20,972), and against the executors of Lady Pryce, and the representatives of Morgan. The Plaintiff, by his bill, insisted that as Sir John Pryce's debt to Jaques had been paid out of the estate of Lady Pryce, her estate was entitled to be recouped out of the fund in Court in the cause of Buckingham v. Pryce, arising from the estate of Sir John Pryce.

The bill stated that the Plaintiff had applied to the executors of Lady Pryce, to take proceedings to obtain payment of the £5323 out of the sum of £20,972, but that they had refused to do so.

The bill also stated, that there were no debts due from the estate of Lady Pryce, except those due to Morgan and the Plaintiff, and that there were no assets wherewith they could be paid. It prayed for payment out of the £20,972, standing to the credit of the cause of Buckingham v. Pryce of the sum of £5323, and interest; and that that sum might be applied, in the first place, in payment of the mortgage to Morgan, and then in payment of the Plaintiff's judgment debt.

To this bill the Defendant Evors demurred for want of equity and for multifariousness, and the demurrer now came on for argument.

Mr. Kindersley and Mr. Keene, in support of the demurrer. This bill cannot be sustained as against the Defendant Evors. It is, in effect, a bill by a creditor of Lady Pryce against her executors and a debtor to her estate, to recover a debt due to her from the representatives of her husband. If any such debt existed, it is the duty of her executors alone to recover it; and the party from whom it is to be recovered is liable only to the legal personal representative of Lady Pryce. The [161] law of the Court on this point is laid down by Lord Eldon in Alsager v. Rowley (6 Ves. 749): he there says, "The established rule of the Court is certainly as it has been argued upon Utterson v. Mair and the other cases, that in ordinary cases, a debtor to the estate cannot be made a party to a bill against the executor: but there must be, as the cases express it, collusion or insolvency." In the present neither collusion nor insolvency is charged by the bill; and the case therefore does not come within the exception. In Utterson v. Mair (2 Ves. jun. 95), which was a bill by a creditor against the executor of a debtor and the assignees in bankruptcy of the debtor to recover an alleged surplus, a demurrer was allowed; and Lord Loughborough there points out the great inconvenience of permitting a bill of such a nature. He says (p. 97), "If this suit was to stand, the consequence would be that every creditor would be entitled to such a bill against every individual debtor, and the accounts would be inextricable." On this point they also cited Benfield v. Solomons (9 Ves. 77).

The bill charges that the executors refuse to take proceedings; if that be so, the proper course for the Plaintiff to take is pointed out in Utterson v. Mair. "If it is necessary to bring actions at law to recover part of the effects, it must be in the name of the executor, and the Court will compel him to allow his name to be used." The Plaintiff ought to have offered to indemnify the executors, and on their refusal to proceed he might have filed a bill to be permitted to use their names for the purpose of recovering the fund.

It is supposed that Bowsher v. Watkins (1 Russ. & M. 277) is an authority for the proposition that a bill may be sustained [162] against the executor and the surviving partner of a testator (who is in the nature of a debtor) without charging or proving fraud or collusion; but it appears "that there were special circumstances in the case which took it out of the rule" (page 280); Davies v. Davies (2 Keen, 539).

Another objection to this bill is, that Morgan, a mortgagee, is made a party, and his equities must be determined in this suit. If the other objections do not prevail, it is clear that this suit ought to be confined to the recovery of the debt; Pearse v. Hewitt (7 Sim. 471). The Defendant Evors has no concern in the claims on the fund, or the administration of Lady Pryce's estate. The bill is, therefore, on that ground, multifarious.

They contended also that Jaques's debt was one due from Lady Pryce, and that, as a provision of £5000 was made for her by the deed, her husband became a purchaser of the produce of her estate.

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Purves, in support of the bill. This case does not come within the rule, even as stated by the other side. The bill alleges that there are only two debts due from the estate of Lady Pryce, the amounts of which have been ascertained by the Master; and it further alleges that the only assets out of which they can be paid are those in Court in the suit of The Earl of Buckingham v. Pryce, which the executors refuse to get in. What other remedy has the Plaintiff but to file his bill against the executors and all other necessary parties to realize these assets? This is not the case referred to in the authorities cited on the [163] part of the Defendant, namely, of a legal demand recoverable at law, in respect of which the executors might be charged with a devastavit, in the event of their not taking proper steps to recover it, and in which therefore a charge of insolvency would support the bill; but this is the case of a doubtful equity, the validity of which can only be ascertained by a suit, and for which the executors could not be charged with a devastavit. If collusion be necessary to support this bill, then the refusal of the executors to sue amounts to collusion; and that seems implied in Benfield v. Solomons (9 Ves. 82), in a case where a suit is the only remedy.

But this, in reality, is not, as it has been assumed, a suit against executors and a debtor to the estate. Evors is not a debtor; but there are certain funds in Court, the right to which is a matter of dispute between the several persons, and can only be determined by a suit in which they are all parties.

As to the second point, it is clear that no bill could be sustained, having for its object the determination of the rights to the fund, in the absence of Morgan, whose claim has been ascertained to be the first charge thereon. If there had been a greater number of creditors of Lady Pryce, the bill might have been filed on behalf, &c.; and if the executors themselves had sued, Morgan would have been a necessary party.

The debt is alleged to be, and must, on demurrer, be taken to be the debt of the wife, and the equity of the wife to be recouped cannot now be doubted; 1 Roper Husb. and Wife, 143.

[164] Mr. Kindersley, in reply.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. In this case it is not necessary to consider what defence the Defendant may have to this suit, on the ground that Sir John Pryce ought, under the deed of 1772, to be considered a purchaser of the interest of Lady Pryce, his wife; or on the ground that the debt of Jaques, in respect of which the Plaintiff claims relief, was the debt of Lady Pryce. The Defendant may have a valid defence on both of these grounds; but such a defence cannot be supported on this demurrer, having regard to the facts stated in the bill, all of which the Court must, for the purpose of its decision on the present occasion, assume to be true. The only question now is, whether, looking at all the circumstances of the case, the bill is properly framed, so as to entitle the Plaintiff to relief as against the Defendant Evors.

The general rule admits of no doubt that a person having a claim on the assets of a testator, has no right in suing the executor to make a debtor to the estate a party to that suit. The question in such cases arises on the exceptions to that rule.

The Plaintiff and Morgan have been found to be creditors of Lady Pryce, and are entitled to be paid out of her estate; but it appears that her assets have been exhausted by the payment of her husband's debts, for which her estate was in the nature of a surety. It cannot but be admitted on this simple statement, that her estate was or is entitled to be recouped out of the estate of Sir John Pryce. It is stated that her estate has been exhausted except so far as anything may be recovered by the assertion of this right; and there are assets of [165] Sir John Pryce in Court, which, subject to any claim to be established by the representatives of Lady Pryce, belong to the Defendant Evors. The Plaintiff claims to be paid out of those assets of Lady Pryce, which, as between the two estates, have been improperly applied in payment of her husband's debt.

This suit is not for a general account of the assets of Lady Pryce, nor, as it has been argued, a suit against Evors, as a debtor to her estate; but there being a specific fund in Court, it is sought to establish, as against that fund, a claim for the benefit of Lady Pryce's estate. Evors, who claims the fund, is properly made a party to protect it.

It is not sufficient to say that the executors of Lady Pryce are the only persons to sue in order to realize this claim. If they were, they have expressly refused to do so. I think that if this case did in other respects come within the general rule, the circumstance of the refusal of the executors to recover these, the only assets, would make the case an exception to the general rule.

It is then said that this bill is multifarious, as bringing Morgan before the Court and seeking to establish his claim. If Morgan had not been before the Court, Evors would have said, "there is the report of the Master, by which it appears that Morgan has a prior claim to the Plaintiff; and therefore he is a necessary party." I think the bill is not multifarious, and I must overrule the demurrer.

[166] LINCOLN AND OTHERS v. WRIGHT AND OTHERS. LINCOLN AND OTHERS v. DRURY AND OTHERS. March 25, June 25, 1841.

[S. C. on appeal, 10 L. J. Ch. 331; on other points, 4 Beav. 427; 49 E.R. 404.]

It is not irregular to intitle an order for a commission to examine witnesses, or the commission or the return thereof, in a short form, as a suit in which "A. and others are Plaintiffs," and "B. and others Defendants."

A supplemental bill was filed in which a deceased person was named as Co-plaintiff and as next friend of infant Plaintiffs, and in the title of the Plaintiff's interrogatories for the examination of witnesses, his name was mentioned as being still a party. Held, that a Defendant who had acquiesced and intituled his interrogatories in a similar manner, could not, after publication, move to suppress the depositions. Pending the examination of witnesses, a new next friend of the infant Plaintiffs was appointed. Held, that it was not necessary to notice the alteration in the proceedings under the commission.

An interrogatory which asks a witness, whether it was agreed to the effect suggested in the interrogatory, is not leading.

This was a motion, made on behalf of two Defendants Rust and Boughen, that the depositions taken in these causes might be suppressed with costs.

Susanna King, the wife of James King, and their infant children, were interested in the residuary property of the testator in the cause, and in January 1839 James King and Sarah his wife and their children, by James King their father and next friend, together with certain other parties interested, filed these bills to recover the same.

On the 13th of December 1839 James King died; and a supplemental bill, which had become necessary on other grounds, was filed on the 19th of the same month; and therein James King (then deceased) was erroneously named both as Plaintiff and as next friend of his children.

The two Defendants, Rust and Boughen, filed their answer to the supplemental bill; and therein they adopted the same title, and stated their belief that James King was dead.

[167] The cause being at issue, the Plaintiffs, on the 4th September 1840, obtained an order for a commission to examine witnesses, and both Plaintiffs and the Defendants Rust and Boughen commenced examining witnesses thereunder on the 23d of October 1840, and proceeded therein on the 24th, 27th, 28th, and 30th of the same month.

Previous thereto, and on the 5th of October 1840, the Plaintiffs obtained an order to dismiss the bill as against a Defendant, John Andrews Lincoln; and on the 26th of October, and pending the examination, they also obtained an order substituting the Plaintiff, Susan King, as next friend of her infant children.

The questions on the present occasion depended principally on the mode in which the several proceedings had been instituted; it is therefore necessary to state, that the order for the commission, the commission itself, and the return thereto of the depositions, taken thereunder, were all intituled in the following short form:—

Between
William Lincoln and Others	.	Plaintiffs;
	And
Smith Wright and Others	.	Defendants.
	And
William Lincoln and Others	.	Plaintiffs;
	And
John Henry Druery and Others	.	Defendants.
By original and supplemental bill.

The titles to the interrogatories exhibited by the Plaintiff and returned by the Commissioners, annexed to the commission and the depositions, stated the names of all the Plaintiffs and Defendants except John Andrews Lin-[168]-coln, but included James King (who was then dead) as a Co-plaintiff, and as next friend to his children, and stated that the several parties "were and are" respectively Plaintiffs and Defendants.

The Defendant's interrogatories only differed from those of the Plaintiff in this, that they included John Andrews Lincoln as a Defendant, and omitted the words "were."

Rules to produce witnesses, and to pass publication, were given, and expired in Michaelmas term; the cause was set down and publication passed on the 21st of December 1840.

The fourth of the Plaintiff's interrogatories, which it was alleged was leading, was as follows:—

"Was it at any, and what, time after the decease of the said testator, arranged or agreed by or between any and what persons, as executors and trustees under the said will and codicil of the said testator, and whether or not for their mutual convenience or how otherwise, that any and which of them should be the chief acting executors and trustees, or the chief acting executor and trustee under and by virtue of the said will and codicil of the said testator; or that they or he should undertake the chief burthen of the execution thereof, and should be chiefly active in collecting and receiving the personal estate of the said testator, and the produce thereof, and in making the necessary and proper payments thereout, and in executing the trusts of the said will; and did any and which of them, severally and respectively, authorise any and which of the others of them to act generally for them or him, or on their or his behalf, in the administration of the estate of the said testator, or confide to [169] them or him the exercise of the duties, and the execution of the trusts reposed in them by the said will and codicil; and did any and which of them, under any and what circumstances, become and were, or was they or he, under any and what circumstances the chief acting executors and trustees, or the chief acting executor and trustee, in regard to the administration of the personal estate of the said testator, or chiefly acted therein, declare," &c.

Mr. Girdlestone and Mr. Steer, for the Defendants, contended that the proceedings were irregular, first, because King, who was dead at the filing of the supplemental bill, was mentioned in the title of the interrogatories to be a Plaintiff, and the next friend of his children.

Secondly, that the name John Andrews Lincoln had been improperly omitted in the title to the interrogatories.

Thirdly, that the order for the commission, the commission itself, and the return thereto, had been improperly intituled in a short form, and did not sufficiently identify the cause.

Fourthly, that the name of the new next friend ought to have been inserted in the title to the different proceedings after such appointment, and

Lastly, that the interrogatories themselves were leading.

They argued that the way to try the regularity of the intituling of the several proceedings, was to see whether an indictment for perjury could be sustained against a [170] witness examined under the commission. They contended that it could not, as the different proceedings, when proved, would not be found in accordance with the record and order, or with the facts themselves. (On this point the following authorities were cited on the appeal:—23 G. 2, c. 11; Rea v. Roper, 6 M. & S. 327; and Rea v. Benson, 2 Camp. 509.) That if the proceedings were irregular, then the depositions ought to be suppressed. Pritchard v. Foulkes (2 Beavan, 133).

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Jeremy, contra, on the first objection, contended, that even if the name of James King had been improperly included in the supplemental bill, still, that until the error had been rectified, it was proper to include it in the title to the interrogatories, so as to make them correspond with the record; and, at all events, that the Defendant, who had acquiesced and adopted that form themselves could not now take advantage of a common error after publication.

Secondly, that John Andrews Lincoln, having been dismissed from the suit, his name had not improperly been omitted, and that advantage of that objection, if any, ought to have been taken earlier.

Thirdly, that intituling the order for a commission, and the commission and return in a short form, was according to the usual course of practice.

Fourthly, that it was not necessary to notice the appointment of a new next friend, which took place pending the proceedings under the commission: a next friend not being a party to the cause, and the change not affecting the issues between the parties.

[171] Fifthly, that the interrogatories were not leading, as they did not suggest to the witness the answer to be given. [THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS. All interrogatories must, to some extent, make a suggestion to the witness. It would be perfectly nugatory to ask a witness if he knew anything about something.]

They argued also, that an indictment would lie in such a case, as the Defendant could not go out of the record, with which the proceedings corresponded; and that the case of Pritchard v. Foulkes did not apply, for there the interrogatories and depositions did not correspond with the order for the commission.

Mr. Girdlestone, in reply.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS observed, that there was a considerable difference of opinion amongst the officers of the Court as to the correct mode of intituling these matters; and that in the case of Pritchard v. Foulkes he had himself been under the necessity of deciding between conflicting opinions as to the practice. That he would not decide this case without further inquiry to see if an order could not be made consistent with the practice of the Court, and the rights of all the parties, which in the present stage of the cause might be seriously affected by any order which might be made.

June 25. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. This was a motion to suppress depositions for irregularity.

The first ground stated was, that the depositions were taken in a cause in which it was alleged, that James King was a Plaintiff and next friend to infants.

[172] It appears that the suit was irregularly constituted at its first institution, by naming James King (then dead) as Plaintiff, and as next friend to other Plaintiffs who were infants. This irregularity was, however, known to, and acquiesced in, by the Defendants, who joined in commission, and made no complaint till after publication; and it does not appear to me, that parties who have so proceeded, ought, after publication, to be allowed to suppress the depositions on this ground.

The other irregularities which are insisted on, relate partly to the title of the interrogatories, and partly to the proceedings in the cause, during the execution of the commission.

The order for the commission, the commission itself, and the return to the commission, are all in the usual form, and correspond with one another. The title of the interrogatories is not inconsistent with the titles of the order of commission and return; but expressing the names of the parties at full length, it continues the original error in the constitution of the suit, and names James King as a Plaintiff, and as next friend of other Plaintiffs who are infants. This was wrong, but not only had the error been acquiesced in by the Defendants in all the preceding stages of the cause, but was actually committed by the Defendants themselves, in the title of their own interrogatories.

If the Plaintiffs have been irregular in this respect, so also have the Defendants; and under these circumstances, I think that one party ought not to be allowed to take advantage of the irregularity to the prejudice of the other.

As to the proceedings in the cause, it appears that after the commission was issued, and whilst it was in [173] course of execution, an order was obtained to substitute a next friend in the place of the James King who was dead before the institution of the suit; and it is alleged, that this order, and the amendment consequential upon it, made all the subsequent proceedings under the commission irregular and void. Upon this part of the subject, I thought it necessary to make some inquiries, and in the result, it appears to me, that a proceeding of this sort, the object and effect of which is in no way to alter the matters in issue between the parties, but only to render valid the proceeding in the names of infants, does not interrupt, or make it necessary to obtain any further order to give validity to, the proceedings under the commission.

The last objection to the depositions was, that they were taken under interrogatories which were leading, and they are said to be leading, on the ground that they ask the witnesses whether it was agreed to the effect suggested in the interrogatories. In the argument it was contended, that the interrogatories ought to have asked, not simply whether it was so agreed, but whether it was or was not so agreed. Now it has been held, that the interrogatories ought not to be in the form, "was it not so agreed:" that is considered to be leading: but the form, "was it so agreed," does not appear to me to be suggestive of the answer. It is impossible to examine a witness without referring to, or suggesting the subject upon, which he is to answer. If the question suggests a particular answer, it is leading and improper. Questions have also been held to be improper, if suggesting the subject, they are capable of being answered by a simple affirmative or negative without any circumstances; but a question whether such an event happened? does not suggest the answer that it did happen; and having read the interrogatories in this [174] case, I think that they are not capable of being answered in the affirmative or negative without circumstances.

This motion must therefore be refused with costs.

The Defendants appealed from this decision; but Lord Cottenham on the 23d of July 1841 dismissed the appeal with costs, without prejudice however to any application, the Defendants might be advised to make, for referring the interrogatories to the Master as leading.

[174] WOOD v. RICHARDSON. June 25, 1840.

A testator devised his real and personal estate to his wife "absolutely, and at her own disposal, for the maintenance of herself and bringing up of his children."

Held, that she could sell the real estate.

The Court will not enforce a contract involving a breach of trust.

The testator, by his will, devised and bequeathed as follows:—"I give, devise, and bequeath all my estate real and personal, whatsoever and wheresoever, and of what nature, kind, or sort soever the same may be, or consist at the time of my decease, unto my dear wife Jane Richardson; to hold unto her my said dear wife and to her heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns absolutely and at her own disposal for the maintenance of herself and bringing up of my children; subject nevertheless to the payment of all my just debts, funeral and testamentary expenses; and I appoint my said dear wife sole executrix of this my last will and testament."

The testator died, leaving his widow and several children surviving him. Jane Richardson, the widow, contracted to sell a part of the real estate to the Plaintiff [175]-tiff; and after the title had been accepted and the conveyances approved of, she refused to complete the contract.

The Plaintiff then filed his bill for a specific performance, which was resisted, on the ground, first, that the contract was unduly obtained, the Defendant not having the benefit of professional assistance; and secondly, that the Defendant was not justified, by the terms of the will, in selling the estate in which the infant children were interested.

Mr. Kindersley and Mr. Purvis, for the Plaintiff. There is no trust in favour of the children; the widow has a right of "disposal" of this property or a power of sale; the purchaser is satisfied with the title, and the Defendant cannot therefore set up the objection of want of title; besides which, the purchaser will take subject to the rights of the children, if they have any; they cited Pratt v. Church, post, p. 177, note.

Mr. Loftus Wigram, contra, contended that the Defendant was a trustee for her children, the gift being for the maintenance of herself and bringing up of his children; and that she could not sell the property without their concurrence. In Wetherell v. Wilson there was a gift to a parent, "in order the better to enable him to support, maintain, and educate" his child; and it was held to be a trust for the benefit of such child. In Woods v. Woods (1 Myl. & Cr. 401) the gift was to a wife, "towards her support and her family," and the construction was similar; and so in the cases of Hamley v. Gilbert (Jacob, 354; and see Raikes v. Ward, 1 Hare, 445; Crockett v. Crockett, ib. 451; and Wetherell v. Wilson, 1 Keen, 80), and Broad v. Bevan (1 Rm. 511, n.).

[176] That if the Defendant were to complete the contract, she would commit a breach of trust; and that this Court would not decree a party to perform an act which amounted to a breach of trust; 1 Sug. Vendors, 9th ed. 206, Ord v. Noel (5 Mad. 438).

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. I think that the Plaintiff is entitled to a decree. A contract was entered into in 1836 for the sale of this property; the title has been investigated, the conveyances have been prepared and approved of, and the engrossments have been tendered for execution; but the Defendant having refused to complete, the Plaintiff has been compelled to file this bill against the vendor for a specific performance.

There are two defences, first, that this contract was obtained from the Defendant by surprise, in other words, by fraud; as to this it is alleged, that the Defendant has been unable to obtain any evidence. This ground of defence, therefore, rests merely upon the allegation of the Defendant, who has abstained from filing a cross-bill to examine the Plaintiff upon that subject, and by those means obtain relief against that alleged fraud, if there were any. It is impossible, therefore, for me to take notice of that allegation.

The next ground of defence is more important: it is this, that the Defendant has entered into this contract and obligation, which, she says, the Court cannot compel her to perform, without sanctioning a breach of trust; and that this Court will not order or permit a person to commit a breach of trust. Nothing can be more true than that principle. This Court will [177] not require or order any person to commit a breach of trust, it being the special duty of this Court to compel the due execution of a trust, and by all means to avoid, and, if necessary, prevent, the commission of a breach of trust, and of a fraud, which it would amount to.

It is argued that this would be a breach of trust, because the property was given to the Defendant "for the maintenance of herself and her children;" that is true; but then the property was to be held by her "absolutely and at her own disposal" for that purpose; and how is it in any manner made to appear in this cause, that the disposition of the property and the receipt by the Defendant of the purchase-money are not the best things she could do for the maintenance of herself and her children? Nothing appears one way or the other. It is sufficient for the purpose of this case to say that it does not appear that this sale is any breach of trust. I must, therefore, decree a specific performance of this agreement.

[177] PRATT v. CHURCH. M. R. July 2, 1830.

Testator devised his real estate to his wife, "for her own sole and separate use, to dispose of as she should think proper," and out of his real and personal estate to provide for his children in such manner as to her should seem meet." Held, that the widow had power to sell the real estate.

The testator in this case devised as follows:—"This is the last will and testament of me John Pratt of Bells Hill, in the county of Northumberland, Esq. I order and direct that all my just debts, funeral and testamentary expenses be paid and discharged out of my personal estate and effects. I give, devise, and bequeath all my estates and effects whatsoever and wheresoever, whether real or personal, unto my dear wife Elizabeth Pratt, to and for her own sole and separate use, to dispose of as she shall think proper, and out of my said real and personal estate and effects to provide for my children in such manner as to her shall seem meet, or as she by her last will and testament may order and direct; and I [178] appoint my said wife Elizabeth sole executrix of this my will."

Elizabeth Pratt, the Plaintiff, agreed to sell to the Defendant a freehold property, part of the testator's estate; but some doubt having arisen as to her title, under the terms of the above will, a bill for specific performance was filed by her against the purchaser, in order that the point might be determined.

The Defendant said, he was advised by his counsel that a reasonable doubt might be entertained, whether, according to the true construction of such will, the children of the testator John Pratt, or some of them, had not some estate, right, title, or interest, in or to the estate and premises, or some part or parts thereof; and that by reason of such doubt, the Plaintiff was not able to make such a clear and marketable title to the estate and premises, as, according to the terms of the agreement contained in the aforesaid letters, he, the Defendant, was entitled to require. And he said, that in case it could be made to appear, that the true construction of the testator's will was such as the Plaintiff insisted upon, and the doubts which had been suggested and expressed could not be reasonably entertained, he, the Defendant, in such case, was ready and willing to perform his part of the said agreement.

Mr. Bickersteth and Mr. Purvis, for the Plaintiff.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Sir John Leach] decreed a specific performance.

[179] PERRY v. KNOTT. June 25, 1841.

[See S. C. 5 Beav. 293.]

A testator bequeathed to A. a legacy in trust for B. for life, with remainder for her children. A. and the three other executors transferred the legacy into the names of A. and B.; and B., having survived A., sold it, and applied it to her own use. After B.'s death, her child filed a bill against the representatives of A. alone, to make them responsible for the breach of trust. Held, that the other executors and the representatives of B. were necessary parties.

A testator gave and bequeathed unto his son Joseph Aldridge, his executors and administrators, the sum of £1000 in trust, for the separate use of Elizabeth, the wife of William Howell, for life, and after her decease amongst her children living at her decease. He appointed Deborah Aldridge, John Pricklow, Joseph Aldridge, and Edward Aldridge, his executors.

The testator died soon after, and his will was proved by his executrix and executors, who (according to the statement in the Defendants' answer), shortly after the testator's death transferred, out of the stock standing in the Bank in the names of the executors and executrix, a sum of 3 per cent. consolidated Bank annuities, which at the current price of such stock at the date of such transfer was worth £1000 sterling, into the joint names of Joseph Aldridge and Elizabeth Howell.

Joseph Aldridge died in 1823, and Elizabeth Howell having survived him, transferred the fund into her own name, and afterwards sold it out and applied it to her own use. Elizabeth Howell died in 1839, leaving two children, viz., the Plaintiff, Mrs. Perry, and William Howell.

The bill was filed by Mr. and Mrs. Perry against Mr. and Mrs. Knott (the latter being the legal personal representative of Joseph Aldridge), seeking to charge his estate with a breach of trust, for the loss of the £1000, [180] in consequence of the fund having been improperly placed under the control of Mrs. Howell.

The Defendants, by their answer, insisted, "that if any breach of trust was committed touching the said stock, the same was committed by Edward Aldridge, Deborah Aldridge, and John Pricklow; and that they or their personal representatives, as well as the said William Howell, and the personal representatives of Elizabeth Howell, were necessary parties to the suit."

The cause now came on for hearing.

Mr. Kindersley and Mr. Wood, for the Plaintiffs.

Mr. Stuart, for the Defendants, objected that the suit was defective for want of parties, and could not proceed in their absence. First, because the other executors or their representatives ought to be parties; Munch v. Cockerell (8 Sim. 219). Secondly, because the representative of Mrs. Howell, who had sold out the fund, was not a party; and, thirdly, because William Howell, who was entitled to half the fund, was not before the Court.

Mr. Kindersley and Mr. Wood contended that a bill might be filed against any or either of the parties to a breach of trust; Walker v. Symonds (3 Swan. 75). That if the other executors were made parties there could be no contribution in this suit. [THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS. No, but if they were all present, the amount due would be settled in the presence of all, and in a subsequent suit for contribution the amount would already have been conclusively decided.] They also argued that the Plaintiffs, claiming a given proportion of an ascertained [181] appropriated fund, might proceed for the recovery thereof, in the absence of the parties entitled to the other portion; Smith v. Snow (3 Mad. 10), Hutchinson v. Townsend (2 Keen, 675).

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. I think this case is deficient for want of parties. I must, on this occasion act upon what I conceive to be the established rules and principles of the Court in this kind of cases; but I may, without hesitation, say this, that the difficulties under which parties labour who seek to have relief in such cases, in respect of necessary parties, must be before a very long time considerably alleviated. The matter has been and is now under very serious consideration. (See Ordines Can. 174.)

In this case, by a codicil dated so long ago as March 1781, the executors of the testator in this cause were directed to pay a sum of £1000 to Joseph Aldridge; which was to be in trust for Elizabeth Howell, the testator's daughter, during her life, and after her death the principal was given to her children. This, no doubt, was a very plain and simple direction. According to the statement of the facts now made to me, the four executors, instead of making the payment or transferring the stock to Joseph Aldridge, who was the person appointed trustee by the testator's will, all concurred in making a transfer of the stock into the joint names of Joseph Aldridge and Elizabeth Howell. In that respect they all of them acted contrary to the trust reposed in them by the testator. The result was exceedingly unfortunate; for being in the joint names of Joseph Aldridge and Elizabeth Howell, and Joseph Aldridge having died first, Elizabeth Howell, by survivorship, obtained the [182] complete dominion over the fund, sold it, and applied it to her own use; in consequence of which, the children's rights have been hitherto defeated, and by this bill they claim to have redress, as undoubtedly, according to the facts stated, they are entitled to. The question is, who ought to be made parties to the suit? Now the first breach of trust, in this case, was in the transfer into the joint names of two persons, instead of into one single name. I am asked to conclude, that it was done under circumstances, which would afford no right of contribution to the estate of Joseph Aldridge. There are no circumstances, in the case, to enable me to come to that conclusion; and for anything that appears to the contrary, all the executors may be liable. That being so, then, according to the established rules of this Court, upon which I must now act, all those who are liable must be made parties to the cause.

A great deal of discussion has arisen upon the case of Walker v. Symonds, which was before Lord Eldon. It certainly has for some time been considered that the words which are there attributed to him do not afford a ground for that general proposition, which, at one period, they were thought to do; namely, that you might sue one person for a breach of trust in the absence of other parties liable. Yet I may observe, that I well recollect one case, which is not, however, reported, in which I attempted before Sir John Leach to enforce the contrary of what appears to be the effect of the case of Walker v. Symonds; but Sir John Leach, after a long controversy, acted upon it. (See C. P. Cooper, 78, note, and 509, 674.) Still upon a complete investigation of that case, without going into the minutiae of it, it does not appear to establish the proposition that a cestui que trust may proceed, separately, against [183] one trustee implicated in a breach of trust; and the ordinary rule of the Court is known to be otherwise.

I think, therefore, that this cause is deficient for want of parties, in respect of the absence of those other persons who were parties of the original breach of trust.

The other objection made is, that Elizabeth Howell's representatives ought to have been made parties to this suit. She is, in point of fact, the person who committed the second breach of trust, which consisted of the sale and misapplication of the fund.

I quite agree in the argument which has been addressed to me, that where trust money is sold, and paid away to a person who has no notice of the trust, and who has nothing more to do with it than the mere receiving it from a trustee, it would be very improper to make such a person party to the suit; but how is it here? Is it possible to conceive that Mrs. Howell was ignorant of the trust? Is it possible to conceive that she did not undertake, jointly with Aldridge, to perform that trust? I have no doubt, indeed it is almost admitted, that the Plaintiffs would be entitled to proceed against her if they thought fit. Are not the other parties, according to the rules of this Court, entitled to have her representatives here, in order that they may have established, as against her estate, that liability to which they themselves are subjected, in consequence of her wrongful act? It does appear to me, that, according to the rules of this Court, her personal representative is a necessary party to the suit.

One cannot help seeing that in this case the child of Mrs. Howell, who most probably had the benefit of the ultimate breach of trust, is by this suit seeking to call [184] upon the co-trustees of Mrs. Howell alone, for payment of the money, without giving them the opportunity of recovering the amount from her estate which received it. This does not appear to me to be just or equitable, and certainly is not in conformity with the decisions of the Court. I therefore think that this suit must stand over, with liberty to amend. I give no opinion as to the necessity of making the other child a party to the suit, for I have heard no reply on that part of the case.

The cause was afterwards heard and disposed of; the objection for want of parties having been removed by the 32d General Order of August 1841. (Ordines Can. 174.)

[184] HOBSON v. SHERWOOD. June 25, 29, 1841.

[For subsequent proceedings, see 6 Beav. 63; 8 Beav. 486. Cf. Richardson v. Feary, 1888, 39 Ch. D. 45.]

A party having a life-estate determinable on his marriage, in one-fifth of an estate, is entitled to a decree for partition.

Where, in a suit for partition, the Defendants are desirous that there shall be no partition of their several shares, the partition may be confined to the aliquot share of the Plaintiff.

This was a partition suit. It appeared that the property belonged to five sisters as tenants in common in tail; and the Plaintiff having married one of them, a disentailing deed was executed, and her share was settled. The Plaintiff's wife died without issue; and her share then stood limited to the Plaintiff for life in case he should continue a widower, and not marry again, with remainder to the other sisters.

The Plaintiff, being so entitled, filed his bill for a partition of the estate; and the Defendants, who were [185] each entitled to one-fifth of the estate, as tenants in common in tail, and were together entitled to the remaining one-fifth, subject to the Plaintiff's interest therein, resisted the partition.

Mr. Kindersley and Mr. Parker, for the Plaintiff, contended that the Plaintiff had an estate of freehold, and that he was entitled to hold his share in severalty, and to have a partition. They cited Gaskell v. Gaskell (6 Sim. 643) and Baring v. Nash (1 Ves. & B. 551).

Mr. Stuart, Mr. Bethell, Mr. Elderton, Mr. Smythe, and Mr. Daniel, for the Defendants, contended that the Plaintiff had not such an estate as entitled him to have a partition; for it might determine the day afterwards. That it was discretionary with the Court to direct a partition; and that it would be more beneficial to all to appoint a receiver.

They argued also, that if a partition were decreed, it ought to be of the Plaintiff's share only; and that the four-fifth proportions, severally belonging to the Defendants, ought not, contrary to their wishes, to be divided.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. I cannot help regretting that this suit should ever have been instituted. The Plaintiff alone, who is tenant for life determinable on his second marriage, desires a partition; all the other parties desire to keep the estate together. If, however, the Plaintiff is entitled to the relief he asks, he must have it, however inconvenient it may be to the other owners.

[186] As tenant for life, I apprehend there can be no question but that he is entitled to a partition. The question is, whether the circumstance of his life-estate being determinable on his second marriage makes any difference. As at present advised, I think it does not; but I will further consider it.

The next question is, whether all the shares are to be divided, when all the other parties desire their shares to be kept together. At present I do not see any serious objection to allotting one-fifth to the Plaintiff only; but I am not aware that it has ever been done before, and I must therefore inquire.

June 29. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS said that the one-fifth alone might be partitioned off; and that if no special directions as to costs were required, the ordinary decree for partition of that portion must be made.

[186] HATTON v. FINCH. June 28, 1841.

Bequest "to A. and B. of the sum of £25 per annum, each, for and during the term of their natural lives, or the life of the longest liver of them, for their or her own absolute use and benefit." Held, that on the death of A., her annuity survived to B. for her life.

The question in this cause arose on the following clause in the will of the testator: "And I also further give and bequeath unto the said Jane Franks and Susanna Gifford the sum of £25 per annum each, for and during the term of their natural lives or the life of the longest liver of them, for their or her own absolute use and benefit."

[187] Jane Franks died in December 1839, but Susanna Gifford was still living; and the questions were, first, whether the annuity of £25, given to Jane Franks, ceased on her death, or continued during the life of Susanna Gifford.

Secondly, supposing the same annuity to be still subsisting, then, whether it belonged to Susanna Gifford, or to the representatives of Jane Franks.

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Prendergast, for the Plaintiffs.

Mr. Kindersley and Mr. Rudall, for Mrs. Gifford, contended that there was a joint-tenancy, and that she was now entitled to two annuities of £25. That the words must be taken reddendo singula singulis, and then the gift would be of £25 each, during their natural lives "for their own absolute use," and of the same annuities "during the life of the longest liver of them" "for her own absolute use."

Mr. Tarrell, for the representatives of Mrs. Franks, contended that the word "or" should be read "and;" and that there was a gift of an annuity of £25 each to the annuitants, and its duration was to be "during the term of their natural lives and the life of the longest liver." That, consequently, the representatives of Mrs. Franks were entitled to an annuity of £25 for the life of Mrs. Gifford. He cited Eales v. The Earl of Cardigan (9 Sim. 384), in which the testatrix gave E. and C. his wife, "an annuity of £200 each, for their lives and the life of the survivor;" and it was held, on the death of E., that his representatives were entitled to an annuity of [188] £200 during the life of C. He also cited Jones v. Randall (1 Jac. & W. 100), and contended that there could not be a joint-tenancy, as the annuities were given to "each."

Mr. G. Turner and Mr. Rogers, for the residuary legatees. The gift is of several annuities to each, to continue during the life of each annuitant. The first part of the gift of "£25 per annum each for and during the term of their natural lives," would have given only an annuity to each during their joint lives: the testator makes this addition, "or" the life of the survivor, and not "and" the life of the survivor; for the latter would give several legacies during their joint lives and for the life of the survivor, which was not the testator's intention. The word "or" is never read "and" except to carry out the intention apparent on the will: here it would defeat it. In Townley v. Bolton (1 Myl. & K. 148) there was a gift over after the death of both annuitants.

Mr. Kindersley, in reply.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. I am very far from considering this to be a clear case. However, I think the proper construction is that which gives both these annuities to the surviving annuitant. I cannot at all agree with the argument that there is any joint-tenancy here. I think the gift to "Jane Franks and Susanna Gifford, of the sum of £25 per annum each," is the same as if he had said, "I give £25 per annum to Jane Franks, and £25 per annum to Susanna Gifford." Then when we come to apply the following words, which shew the duration, and to whom the benefit is to belong, I think that I cannot [189] construe them in any other way, so as to make them consistent, than in the way I am about to mention. There is, in substance, a gift of £25 per annum to Jane, and a gift of £25 per annum to Susanna, "for and during the term of their natural lives, or the life of the longest liver of them;" that is, these two annuities (and he is speaking with reference to both) are to continue "for and during the term of their natural lives, or the life of the longest liver of them," and then for whose benefit? These two annuities (for the will applies to both all along) are "for her or their own absolute use and benefit."

Now it is quite clear as a rule of construction that you must proceed reddendo singulis singulis; but here these two annuities (he is speaking of both in the same sentence) are to be for their benefit, during their joint lives, and to continue during the life of the survivor of them; but then they are to be "for her own absolute use and benefit." I confess there are strong reasons for another construction, but the preponderance in favour of this construction appears to me so great, that I am obliged to adopt it, and hold that these two annuities belong to the survivor for her life.

[190] WOODCOCK v. RENNECK. April 30, May 6, June 21, 28, 1841.

Bequest to trustees, to pay the dividends to A. and B. his wife during their lives, and the life of the survivor; and after their decease, in trust to transfer and pay over unto their children, in such shares and proportions as the survivor of A. and B. should by will appoint. At the death of the testator there were three children. A., who survived B., appointed the whole fund to an only surviving child. Held, that there was a gift to children, subject to the power; but that the objects of the power and of the gift were the children living at the death of the surviving parent; and therefore that the representative of a child who died in the life of A. had no interest in the fund.

On the 30th September 1817 William Linton died, having made a will, whereby, amongst other things, he bequeathed his real and personal estate to trustees, on trust to pay the income to his wife for life, and after her decease, upon several trusts, one of which was expressed as follows:—"And as to the sum of £1700 4 per cent. consolidated Bank annuities, part of the said trust monies, in trust to pay the yearly dividends thereof to Joseph Christie and Sarah his wife during their lives, and the life of the survivor; and after their decease, then in trust to transfer and pay over the said stock unto their children, in such shares and proportions as the survivor of them, the said Joseph Christie and Sarah his wife, by his or her last will shall direct or appoint."

At the time of the testator's death, Mr. and Mrs. Christie were living, and had three children, viz., the Defendant Eleanor Renneck, the wife of the Defendant John S. Renneck, Joyce Linton Woodcock, the late wife of the Plaintiff, and William Linton Christie.

William Linton Christie the son died in the year 1818, leaving both his parents surviving him.

Mrs. Christie died in the year 1820; and Joyce Linton Woodcock, the Plaintiff's wife, died in the year 1832, and the Plaintiff afterwards obtained letters of administration of her estate.

[191] In these circumstances, Mr. Christie having survived his wife, and Mrs. Renneck being the only surviving child of Mr. and Mrs. Christie, Mr. Christie made his will, dated the 16th of October 1833; and thereby, after reciting the power given to him by the will of William Linton, he expressed himself as follows:—"I do, by this my will, direct and appoint that the trustees and executors of the said W. Linton, &c., &c., do and shall stand possessed and interested in the said stock or sum of £1700 late 4 per cent., but now reduced to 3½ per cent. annuities, after my decease, in trust to sell, assign, transfer, dispose, and pay the same, and the interest and dividends thereof, after my decease, in such manner as my daughter and only child by my said deceased wife, viz., Eleanor Renneck, &c., &c., shall from time to time, and notwithstanding her present or any future coverture, direct or require; and for which her receipts, for the time being, shall be effectual discharges; and in all respects for her absolute use and benefit, as her own absolute property, as if she was sole and unmarried."

Mr. Christie died in February 1839; and in the following month of December Mr. Renneck became insolvent.

The Plaintiff by his bill prayed a declaration, that, as administrator for his late wife Joyce Linton Woodcock, he was entitled to a share of the fund, and that the trustees might be directed to transfer the same to the Plaintiff accordingly.

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Roupell, for the Plaintiff. The power was to appoint amongst all the children, and did not warrant the exclusion of any child. The [192] appointment of the whole to one child would therefore be void; Vanderzee v. Aden (4 Ves. 770), Gibson v. Kinnon (1 Vern. 66).

Again, the power was to appoint by will amongst children in proportion. This required a plurality of objects; and, as the representatives of a deceased child could not be appointees, Boyle v. The Bishop of Peterborough (1 Ves. jun. 299), and as only one child was living at the death of the surviving parent, the capacity to appoint was consequently destroyed; Vane v. Lord Dungannon (2 Sch. & Lef. 118), Campbell v. Sandys (1 Sch. & Lef. 293).

There is a gift to all the children in default of appointment; Bellasis v. Ulthall (1 Atk. 426), Grievson v. Kirsopp (2 Keen, 653). They therefore took vested interests to some extent in the fund, which could not be wholly defeated by the execution of the power, though the amounts might be thereby regulated. In default of appointment the children take equally; Casterton v. Sutherland (9 Ves. 445); and the Plaintiff is therefore entitled to one third. They also referred to Folkes v. Western (9 Ves. 456).

Mr. Parry, for the administrator of W. Linton Christie, contended that if the appointment were void, the property would go in equal thirds amongst the three children.

Mr. Kindersley and Mr. Dixon, for Mrs. Renneck, contended that the death of two of the children in the life-[193]-time of the surviving parent, did not prevent the power being executed in favour of the surviving child. Boyle v. The Bishop of Peterborough (1 Ves. jun. 299, and 3 B. C. C. 243), Butcher v. Butcher (9 Ves. 382, and

1 Ves. & B. 79), Reade v. Reade (5 Ves. 749). That the execution of the power in favour of Mrs. Renneck was valid; and if not, then that there was an implied gift to those children only who might be living at the death of the surviving parent, and that the children who died in the lifetime of Mr. Christie could therefore take nothing. That if all the children took in default of appointment, they took as joint-tenants, and that Mrs. Renneck would then be entitled by survivorship. They also cited Alexander v. Alexander (2 Ves. sen. 640), Bray v. Hammersley (3 Sim. 513, and 2 Cl. & F. 453), Houstoun v. Houstoun (4 Sim. 611), Phipson v. Turner (9 Sim. 227, 246), Needham v. Smith (4 Russ. 318), Walsh v. Wallinger (2 Russ. & Myl. 78), Kennedy v. Kingston (2 Jac. & W. 431).

Mr. George Turner and Mr. Busk, for the assignees of Renneck, followed the same line of argument. They contended that the Plaintiff had no interest, and that Mrs. Renneck took the property subject to the rights of her husband's assignees. They cited Brown v. Pocock (6 Sim. 257), Crook v. Brooking (2 Vern. 50, 106), Campbell v. Campbell (4 B. C. C. 15), The Duke of Marlborough v. Lord Godolphin (2 Ves. sen. 61), Doc dem. Stewart v. Sheffield (13 East, 526).

[194] Mr. Roupell, in reply.

JUNE 28. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale). The Plaintiff, who is the legal personal representative of his late wife, contends, that the power created by the will of William Linton was a mere power to divide and distribute, and that the objects of the power (the children of Mr. and Mrs. Christie) being reduced to one, the power to distribute became incapable of being exercised. And the power being incapable of execution, he contends, that the will of Linton contains a direct gift to all the children of Mr. and Mrs. Christie; and, therefore, he, as representing his late wife, one of those children, claims an equal third part of the £1700 stock.

The Defendant, Mrs. Renneck, contends, that the power was well exercised in her favour; but even if the power could not be exercised, it is contended, both by Mrs. Renneck and by the Defendants, the assignees of her insolvent husband, that the Plaintiff can have no right to any part of the fund; because they say, that, according to the true construction of Linton's will, if the power was not well exercised, there is an implied gift, not to all the children of Mr. and Mrs. Christie, but only to such one or more of them as might be living at the death of the survivor of the parents.

It is evident, that the Plaintiff's title depends entirely upon his being able to maintain the point for which he contends, that, in default of appointment, all the children of Mr. and Mrs. Christie took vested interests in the fund, under the gift. If he cannot maintain that point, he has no interest in the question, whether the power was capable of being exercised or not.

[195] There is no gift in default of appointment, in special terms; but the Plaintiff contends, that the words of the will amount to a direct gift to all the children of Mr. and Mrs. Christie; that, under that gift, each child took a vested interest in some share; and that the power authorised no modification of that interest, but only enabled the surviving parent to determine the amount of the share which each child was to take, and, in default of appointment, left the shares equal.

The Defendants, except Sampson, who is the representative of the deceased son, contend, that the words do not amount to a direct gift to all the children, but amount to a gift, either direct or implied, only to such children as might have been objects of the power; that as the power was to be exercised only by the will of the survivor of Mr. and Mrs. Christie, and could only operate in favour of children living at the death of the survivor, the objects of the power were surviving children only, and they only were the children who could take under the gift in default of execution; and, further, it is argued, that the gift only appears by the direction to the trustees to transfer and pay; which direction was to be acted upon only after the decease of the survivor of Mr. and Mrs. Christie, and, consequently, only in favour of children then living; and, besides, that, if the children took under the will of Linton, they could only take as joint-tenants, and the whole, therefore, would belong to the survivor, Mrs. Renneck.

I have read the cases which were cited in the argument. It is not easy, and perhaps not possible, to reconcile them all; and there is none in which the power and the gift are expressed in the same terms as they are here. I think that there is a gift to children of Mr. and Mrs. Christie, subject to a power to be exercised by [196] the surviving parent. But in considering what children of Mr. and Mrs. Christie were objects of the gift, it is necessary to consider the whole sentence in which the gift is expressed, and that sentence comprises the words creating the power; and although a portion of the sentence, if taken by itself, imports a gift to all the children, the generality of the expression may be limited by the other words of the same sentence; and as the power was to be exercised only by the will of the surviving parent, and therefore could only be exercised in favour of those who were living at the death of the surviving parent:—as this is not, in express terms, a gift to all the children in default of appointment, but a gift or trust for children, with words annexed, shewing that the distribution was to be among the children living at the death of the surviving parent:—and, moreover, as the gift is expressed only in the form of a direction to trustees to transfer and pay to children, after the death of the surviving parent; I think that the objects of the power and the objects of the gift are the children living at the death of the surviving parent, and, consequently, that the Plaintiff has no interest in the fund.

The Plaintiff contends that the words expressing the power ought to have no effect in determining the objects of the gift, but ought to have effect in shewing an intention to sever the shares of the children so as to prevent a joint-tenancy, but the words cannot be thus alternately rejected and employed.

His bill must therefore be dismissed, and with costs.

Affirmed by Lord Lyndhurst, C., 31st of January 1842 [1 Ph. 72].

An agreement, made upon an advance of money, to convey property, and containing a power of redemption within a given time, and in default the sale to be absolute. Held, under the circumstances, to be a conditional sale and not a mortgage.

A. having agreed to purchase a property for £1435, borrowed £185 (the amount of auction duty and deposit) from B. B. afterwards advanced A. £600 on account of the purchase, but which was not so applied, and £1291 of the purchase-money remained unpaid. A. and B. afterwards entered into an agreement, by which it was agreed, in consideration of the £185 and the £600, and of a further sum of £400 to be paid by B. to A., that the property should be conveyed to B., provided that if A. paid B. on a day specified the £1435, and the sum of £1000 advanced, the agreement should be void; and A. was to have permission to make sales in the meantime, subject to the approval of B., so as to reimburse the purchase-money and advances made; "but if not then made, the sale was absolutely confirmed to B." The agreement contained no engagement to pay. B. afterwards completed the purchase. Held, that this was a conditional purchase, and not a mortgage, and A. having made default in payment, that the estate belonged absolutely to B.

It is the duty of executors to get in property specifically bequeathed, at the expense of the general estate.

The facts, as appearing by the reports of the Master after mentioned were these:—On the 15th of August 1820 John Davies (the husband of the niece of the testator Meddowcroft) contracted to purchase an estate called Wallasey Hills for £1435; but, being unable to pay the purchase-money, he applied to the testator to assist him. Meddowcroft in the first place paid for Davies the deposit money, amounting to £143, 10s. 1d., and a further sum for auction duty, making together £185, 7s. 1d. In October 1820 Meddowcroft advanced to Davies £600 on account of the purchase. It appeared that although the £600 was advanced on account of the purchase, it was not applied towards payment of the money remaining due to the vendor, which was wholly paid by the testator, very soon after the date of the agreement. In November 1820 Davies having occasion for a further sum of £400, the parties came to the agreement upon the construction of which the questions now before the Court depended.

The agreement itself was in the following words:—"An agreement made the 7th of November 1820, between John Davies of Liverpool, gentleman, of the one part, and James Meddowcroft, of Grays Inn, gentleman. [198] "Whereas, on the 15th of August last, an estate called Wallasey Leasowe, or Wallasey Hills, was advertised for sale by public auction, at the Seacombe Hotel, in divers lots, agreeable to a plan then and there produced, but was sold to the Rev. Augustus Campbell in one lot, comprising 259a. 3r. 7p., together with all the benefit and advantage of the sea and lands, and shore bounding the same, which the Commissioner under the Wallasey Inclosure Act was empowered and authorised to allot and convey, at or for the price or sum of £1435. And whereas the said Augustus Campbell did not purchase on his own account, but was agent for the said John Davies. And whereas the said John Davies hath been in treaty for the sale of Lot 1, part thereof. And whereas the said James Meddowcroft, at the request of the said John Davies, paid the sum of £185, 7s. 1d. for the deposit and auction duty, and hath since advanced to the said John Davies the further sum of £600 on account of the said purchase. Now it is agreed that the said James Meddowcroft shall have conveyed to him, or as he shall direct, the whole of the said purchase, in consideration of the said sums of £185, 7s. 1d. and the said £600 so advanced as aforesaid, and the further sum of £400 in two months from the date hereof. Provided always, that in case the said Davies shall pay the said James Meddowcroft the whole of the said purchase-money of £1435, together with the said sum of £1000 now advanced, with interest for the same at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum, on the 15th of July next, this agreement to be void; and that the said John Davies have permission of making sales in the meantime, subject to the approval of the said James Meddowcroft, commencing with Lot 1, in rotation, so as to reimburse the purchase-money and advances made, and the lawful interest; but if not then paid, the sale is absolutely confirmed to the said James Meddowcroft."

[199] After the date of the agreement, the testator paid to Davies the £400 mentioned in the agreement, and paid to the vendor the residue of his purchase-money, amounting to £1291, 10s., and then he was let into possession of the estate.

In this state of things he made his codicil, dated 6th of April 1821, whereby he gave all his right and interest in the estate called Wallasey Hills to certain parties to be suit. The testator died on the 7th of July in the same year, before the day on which Davies, by paying the sums mentioned in the agreement, might have made the agreement void. Davies became insolvent, and neither he nor his assignees repaid the money to James Meddowcroft or his representatives.

By the decree made in this cause on the 10th of February 1826, it was referred to the Master to enquire, whether James Meddowcroft had, at the respective times of making his codicil and of his death, any and what estate or interest in the estate and hereditaments called Wallasey Hills, in the pleadings mentioned.

The Master, by his report dated the 5th of June 1832, found, that at the times mentioned, the testator was an equitable mortgagee of the estate in question, for the several sums of money paid by him as therein mentioned to the amount of £2476, 7s. 1d.

This finding was excepted to, and on hearing of the exception, in November 1832, it was referred to the Master, to enquire, whether, after the date of the agreement in the pleadings mentioned to bear date the 7th of November 1820, any steps were taken by John Davies, with a view to a redemption of the estate; and this was to be without prejudice to the question, [200] whether or not the testator was to be considered a conditional purchaser of the estate. The Master made his report on this enquiry, dated the 10th of March 1840; the cause came on, and upon the facts stated in the report the question was, whether James Meddowcroft, the testator, at the respective times of making his codicil and of his death, was, in equity, the conditional purchaser a fee-simple, or only mortgagee of the estate.

Mr. Tinney and Mr. Parker, for the Plaintiffs, the executors.

Mr. Kindersley and Mr. Younge, for parties claiming under the testator's will, contended, that the transaction between the testator and Davies was a sale with a privilege of repurchase, and not a mortgage; and default having been made in repurchasing upon the day specified, the estate belonged absolutely to the testator, and passed by his will. In Tasburgh v. Echlin (2 Bro. P. C. 265), a reversionary estate in a leasehold was conveyed in consideration of £200, with a proviso for redemption on payment of £200 and interest within five years; but on failure of repayment at the time limited, then the estate of the grantee was to be "absolute and indefeasible, as well in equity as at law," and the grantee should "be for ever debarred from all right and relief in equity." The grantee also covenanted to release "all his right in equity to redeem the premises." The deed (as in the present instance) contained no covenant to repay, and in that case, the grantee was considered in the light of a conditional purchaser; and default having been made in payment within the five years, it was held that no decree for redemption could be made against him. The cases of Seale v. Greenway (19 Ves. 412) and Verner v. Win-[201]-stanley (2 Sch. & Lef. 393) turned on the particular circumstances which shewed the transaction to be one of mortgage; but it was admitted that the right to repurchase would not have been sufficient to turn the transaction into a loan. And see Floyer v. Lavington (1 P. Williams, 255) and Mellor v. Lees (2 Atk. 494).

That this transaction could not have been one of mortgage, for the testator had no right to foreclose after the expiration of the term, and consequently Davies had no right to redeem.

That the condition being a privilege granted to Davies, and not a penalty or forfeiture, the Court could not grant equitable relief: Davis v. Thomas (1 Russ. & Myl. 506).

As to the testator's interest passing under the will, they cited Silberschildt v. Schindler (3 Ves. & B. 45), and Woodhouse v. Meredith (1 Mer. 450).

Mr. Elmsley (in the absence of Mr. Pemberton), for the assignees of Davies, contended, first, that they were not bound by the condition; and, secondly, that the testator was a mere mortgagee. That the transaction appeared from the first a loan and security; and the rule of this Court was, that once a mortgage always a mortgage. That the proviso in this case was nothing more than the ordinary proviso for redemption, on payment on a certain day, against which the Court would always relieve. That the established principle in this Court was, that a mortgagor could not, by the most solemn engagements entered into at the time of the loan, debar himself of his right to redeem. (Coote on Mortgages, 21.)

[202] Mr. James Russell, for the assignees of the heir at law.

June 29. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. The agreement is not expressed with the fulness and perspicuity with which it ought to have been; but having regard to the circumstances in which the parties were placed, I am of opinion, that the testator became the conditional purchaser of the interest to which Davies was entitled under the contract.

The contract was plainly a very beneficial one; but Davies, though entitled to the benefit of the contract, was unable to pay the purchase-money.

In November 1820 the testator, on the credit of the contract, had paid the deposit money to the vendor; and had advanced £600 to Davies, who was in want of £400 more; and the remainder of the purchase-money, £1291, 10s., was still due; and under these circumstances, it was agreed, that, in consideration of the deposit money and auction duty paid, and of the £600 paid, and £400 agreed to be paid to Davies, Meddowcroft should have conveyed to him the whole of the purchase; by which, I think, was meant the beneficial interest in the contract, together with the liability to pay the remainder of the purchase-money to the vendor.

[203] This arrangement, if absolute, would have given to Davies an immediate profit of £1000 upon the transaction; but it was not intended that the purchase should be immediately absolute; and the proviso was added, that if Davies paid to Meddowcroft the whole of the purchase-money of £1435, together with £1000 advanced to Davies, with interest on the 15th July then next, the agreement should be void. Davies expected to realise the money by sale of the property in lots, and the agreement contained an arrangement for that purpose, adding that the sales were to be made "so as to reimburse the purchase-money and advances made, and the lawful interest; but if not then paid, the sale is absolutely confirmed to the said James Meddowcroft."

Whatever may have been the conditions on which the £185, 7s. 1d. and the £600 were advanced, I am of the opinion that the agreement was, in its nature, a conditional purchase and not a mortgage. It was an arrangement, by virtue of which

Davies secured a profit of £1000 upon his purchase, and had the means of realising my further profit which the purchase would yield, if he could raise the money to pay Meddowcroft the amount of his advances with interest at the time agreed upon. Meddowcroft was the purchaser of the benefit of the contract, subject to the condition which might have been, but was not performed; and by reason of the non-performance of the condition he became absolute purchaser.

Under these circumstances, I am of opinion that Meddowcroft was entitled to an estate which passed by the devise in his codicil. (See also Williams v. Owen, 10 Sim. 366, and Willis v. Latham, 1 Ll. & Goo. 68.)

NOTE.—Affirmed by the L. C. 12th Dec. 1842 [12 L. J. Ch. 104].

[204] Another point was also decided in this case, which was as follows:—

The executors had incurred costs, charges and expenses in getting in some costs due to the testator, and which had been specifically bequeathed. The executors presented a petition for a reference to enquire whether they had properly incurred my costs, charges, and expenses in respect of these matters; and the question was, whether these expenses ought to be borne by the general estate, or by the specific legatee out of his legacy.

Mr. Stuart argued the former.

Mr. Kindersley the latter.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS. I consider it part of the duty of executors to get in the testator's estate, whether specifically bequeathed or otherwise; and I know of no instance in which the expenses have not been paid out of the general estate, as part of the expenses of the administration.

[205] OVERTON v. BANISTER. June 29, 1841.

[See Overton v. Banister, 1844, 3 Hare, 503.]

A plea for want of parties, to a bill in respect of a legacy given to a class of children to vest at twenty-one or marriage, objected, that the representative of A. B., a deceased child of that class, had not been made a party, but it did not shew that A. B. had attained a vested interest. The plea was overruled as informal. Request of £1200 to A. and B. upon trust, to appropriate and apply, in two equal parts or shares to be divided, to and for the benefit of all their children respectively. Held, on the context to give legacies of £600 to each family severally.

This case came before the Court on a plea for want of parties. The testator bequeathed to John and James Banister £1200 4 per cents., "upon trust to appropriate and apply the said sum of £1200, in two equal parts or shares to be divided, to and for the sole use and benefit of all their children respectively, together with the dividends arising and accruing therefrom, which he directed should, from time to time, be laid out and invested in the said stocks or public funds, there to accumulate for the benefit and advantage of all the children of his said two sons, share and share alike; and upon the further trust, that his trustees should pay, [206] transfer, and set over, the said sum of £1200, and all interest, dividends, and produce thereupon due, unto and among all and every the child and children of his said sons, equally to be divided between and among them, if more than one, and if but one, then the whole to such one, and to belong to and be vested in such child or children, being a son or sons at his or their age or respective ages of twenty-one years, or day or respective days of marriage, which should first happen." The will then proceeded in the following terms:—"Provided always, and it is my will, and I do hereby direct that in case all the said children of either my said sons shall depart this life not attaining the said years, days, or times aforesaid, then the said capital stock, as well original as accruing by virtue of this present clause or proviso, shall go and become vested in my said son or sons respectively, whose children shall have so departed this life."

The bill stated that James Banister had three children only, viz., James Banister, who had released his rights, and the Plaintiffs Sarah Overton and Mary Ann Banister, who had attained twenty-one.

That John and James Banister had sold out the sum of £600 4 per cents., being a moiety of the £1200, like annuities, which John handed over to James, and that it was agreed that the proceeds thereof should be held by James Banister, and considered as and for the share and interest of his children. The bill alleged that he (James Banister) had applied the same to his own use.

The bill was filed by William Adams Overton and Sarah his wife, and Mary Ann Banister against John and James Banister alone, and it sought to make them liable for the breach of trust in respect of the Plaintiffs' share in the bequest and accumulations.

[207] The Defendant John Banister pleaded, that he had ten children who were now living; and that James Banister in addition to the children in the bill mentioned, had another son John who had departed this life; and insisted that all the children of John, and the representatives of the deceased child of James were necessary parties to the suit. The plea did not state that John, the child of James, had attained twenty-one or had married.

Mr. Kindersley and Mr. Shadwell, in support of the plea, cited Andrew v. Partington (3 Bro. C. C. 400), Prescott v. Long (2 Ves. jun. 690), and Boraston's case (3 Co. Rep. 16), to shew that all the children who came into esse before the eldest attained twenty-one would be entitled to participate in the legacy, and were therefore necessary parties; and they argued that all the children of John, and the representatives of John, the deceased child of James, were necessary parties to the suit.

Mr. Tinney and Mr. Metcalfe, contra, contended that the different moieties of the legacies were so distinct and severed that it was quite unnecessary to make the children of John parties to a suit for the recovery of the distinct share of the children of James.

And as to the representatives of John the younger, they objected, that the plea did not shew that he had lived to attain a vested interest in the fund.

They contended also, that the plea was multifarious, because it objected that several distinct persons were necessary parties, and therefore did not raise a single issue.

Mr. Kindersley, in reply.

[208] THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale], after referring to the terms of the will, and adverting to the words "appropriate" and "respectively" used therein, said that, in his opinion, the fund was so divided into two distinct parts, as to make it unnecessary to bring the children of John before the Court in this suit.

As to the representatives of the deceased child of James, that it was not very important, as the class must be ascertained by the Master; but he was of opinion that the plea could not be sustained on the ground that it did not state whether John the younger had attained twenty-one or married.

That on these grounds he must overrule the plea.

[208] WILLIS v. PLASKETT. July 2, 3, 1841.

Stock held, upon the context of a will, not to pass by the word "money."

A testatrix first directed her funeral expenses to be paid, and she gave the remainder of her monies to B., and her wearing apparel, trinkets, and all other property, whatsoever and wheresoever, to C. Held, that money in the funds did not pass to B.

Gift to A. for life, with remainder, in case A. died unmarried (which happened) between B. and C., "or such of them as should be then living," and the lawful children of such of them as should be then dead, "for the share of the father or mother deceased only." B. and C. died in the lifetime of the tenant for life. B. had issue, C. had none. Held, that C.'s interest was not vested, and that his representatives were not entitled.

The testator, Robert Jobling, gave to his trustees certain monies, in trust to invest in the funds; which, with his money in the funds, were to be held in trust for his wife Sarah Jobling for life; and after her death, to pay an equal half part of the dividends to her daughter Elizabeth Jobling, for her separate use for life; and after her death, to transfer a moiety of the funds "unto and among all and every the lawful child or [209] children of her said daughter Elizabeth Jobling, and any lawful grandchild or grandchildren of her said daughter Elizabeth Jobling, for the share of the father or mother deceased only, share and share alike;" and he then proceeded in the following terms: "but in case my said daughter Elizabeth Jobling shall die unmarried" (which event happened), "or being married, shall die without leaving any child or children, grandchild or grandchildren, then, my said trustees and the survivor of them, his executors or administrators, shall sell, assign, or transfer such last-mentioned moiety or half part of the said annuities, and pay and divide the money arising therefrom unto and between my said son John Jobling and my said daughter Sarah Eleanora Terry, or such of them as shall be then living, and the lawful child or children of such of them as shall be then dead, for the share of the father or mother deceased only, share and share alike. And I give and bequeath all the rest and residue of my estate, goods, chattels, and effects unto my said wife Sarah Jobling, for her own use."

Soon after the testator's death the monies were invested in the funds.

The testator's widow survived him, and died in 1797. Elizabeth Jobling died in 1839, without having been married. John Jobling died in 1820, without issue; and Sarah Eleanora Terry died in 1819, leaving children.

The first question was, whether the legal personal representative of John Jobling took anything under the preceding gift; or whether the moiety of a moiety, intended for him and his children, belonged to the representatives of the widow, who was residuary legatee.

[210] Mr. Pemberton and Mr. L. Wigram, for the Plaintiffs, contended that one moiety went to the children of S. E. Terry, and that the other was undisposed of, and went to the widow as residuary legatee.

Mr. George Turner and Mr. Gaselee, contra, contended that there was a vested gift to John Jobling and Sarah E. Terry, with a gift over on a particular event, which had not happened; and that therefore the vested gift to John Jobling remained undefeated; Harrison v. Foreman (5 Ves. 207), Sturges v. Pearson (4 Mad. 411).

Mr. Beavan, for the Defendant Plaskett.

Mr. Pemberton, in reply. There is no vested gift.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS was of opinion, that the share intended for John Jobling and his children had not vested, but passed under the residuary gift to the widow.

His Lordship having decided that the one-fourth passed, under the residuary clause, to the testator's widow, it then appeared, that Elizabeth Jobling became entitled to one-half thereof, or one-eighth of the whole. Elizabeth Jobling, by her will, dated the 2d of December 1832, gave as follows:—"I first direct my funeral expenses to be paid, and the remainder of what monies I die possessed of to be equally divided between my niece Mrs. Sarah Willis and my nephew Mr. Charles Terry. I also give to the said Mrs. Sarah Willis all my wearing apparel, trinkets, and all other property whatsoever and wheresoever that I may die possessed of."

[211] For the Plaintiff it was contended, that the trust property did not pass under the word "monies;" but that it passed under the residuary bequest in the will of Elizabeth Jobling. Ommanney v. Butcher (Turn. & Russ. 260), Legge v. Asgill (1b. p. 265, note), Gooden v. Dotterill (1 Myl. & K. 56).

For the Defendant it was argued, that stock would pass under the expression "money;" as in Rogers v. Thomas (2 Keen, 8), Dowson v. Gaskoin (2 Ib. 14). That the testatrix, having directed her funeral expenses to be paid out of her monies, was clearly referring to her whole property, and that the words "all other property whatsoever," must at least be referred to property ejusdem generis, as wearing apparel and trinkets, and not to the general residue.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. It does not appear to me that, by the word money, the testatrix intended to give the stock. When a testator directs the payment of his funeral expenses, there is an inference that he is referring to his general personal estate; but having regard to the other parts of this will, I think I am prevented from giving to the word "monies" its extended meaning.

[212] ALDRIDGE v. WESTBROOK. July 1, 1841.

The two co-heiresses of a trustee, who lived at a distance from each other, were made parties to a suit for enforcing the performance of marriage articles. They submitted to act as the Court might direct, and defended separately. Held, they were entitled to two sets of costs.

By certain marriage articles under seal, dated in 1802, the husband covenanted with trustees to convey and settle certain real estates on the trusts therein mentioned. The articles not having been performed, a bill was filed for that object, and to bill the co-heiresses of the surviving covenantor of the articles were made parties. The bill prayed a specific performance, the appointment of new trustees, and a conveyance to the co-heiresses or such new trustees.

One of the co-heiresses resided with her husband in Sloane Street, Chelsea, the other at Benson in Oxfordshire.

They appeared, and answered, and were defended, by separate solicitors. On them put in a full answer to all the allegations in the bill, stating that if she was trustee, she submitted to act as the Court might direct, on being indemnified and her costs. The other put in a short answer, stating that she was a stranger to matters; but that if a trustee, she was desirous of relinquishing the trust; and submitted to act under the Court.

The cause coming on for further directions,

Mr. Bethell, Mr. Stinton, and Mr. Randell submitted that the two co-heiresses who had severally in their defences, ought to be allowed one set of costs only; [213] v. Taylor (2 Beavan, 346); and the first mentioned co-heiress was wrong in answering the whole of the bill, as to which she was not interested.

[THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS. That might be so if you had not required her to answer all the interrogatories: you might have limited the extent of discovery as to her. (See the 16th Order of August 1841. Ord. Can. p. 168.)]

Mr. James, for Mrs. Wood, one of the co-heiresses, and for her husband, contended that this was not the ordinary case of trustees, but of parties strangers to the trust, and upon whom the law alone had cast a duty which they were not bound to accept: that they had no estate, and that there existed no privity of contract; under the circumstances, and considering the distance at which the parties lived from each other, they were justified in appointing separate solicitors.

Mr. K. Parker, for Mrs. Hollis, the other co-heiress, and for her husband. The case depends on its own particular circumstances; and in a late case in this Court Slaughter v. Perry, it was held that living at a distance was a sufficient reason for trustees defending separately.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. According to the facts as represented, these two ladies are the co-heiresses of the surviving trustee. They acted in common in the performance of the trusts, nor did they ever undertake to perform the duty which belonged to their ancestor: they appear also to have been living at a distance from each other, and therefore [214] I do not think that it comes within that very salutary rule, which prevents trustees from separating in their defences, and putting money into the pockets of third parties at the expense of persons beneficially entitled. They are both, therefore, entitled to their costs between party and party.

See 27th Order of April 1828. Ord. Can. p. 16.

[214] WILSON v. CLUER. July 3, 1841.

Decree against a mortgagee in possession, with costs; a tender having been made in the suit, and it having been found, upon taking the accounts with annual rests (that was the point in the cause), that nothing was, at that time, due to the mortgagee.

This case is reported in 3 Beavan, 136, where it appears that the Master of the Rolls directed the account to be taken, with annual rests, as against a mortgagee.

possession, on the ground that all the arrears of interest had, by a settlement of accounts, been then converted into principal.

It appears also that, in 1824, the mortgagor tendered the mortgagee £40 in payment of his demand; and that, upon taking the accounts without annual rests, £5 was due to the Defendant.

The cause now came on upon the Master's report, by which, according to the new mode of taking the accounts, he found that £159 was due from the mortgagee to the mortgagor, and he further found, from the accounts, that by this particular mode of taking the accounts, the mortgage had been paid off previous to the tender of the £40. Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Coleridge, for the Plaintiff, asked that the Defendant should pay the costs of suit.

[215] Mr. Stinton, contra, contended that the mortgagee ought not to be subjected to, as the decision in the case was new, and as the mortgagor had been originally in default. Billington v. Harwood (Turn. & Russ. 477) was cited.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS said he had no choice, but must direct the Defendant to pay the balance found due from him, with the costs of the suit; and to assign the costs at the expense of the Plaintiff.

[215] HARVEY v. HARVEY. July 1, 5, 1841.

[For subsequent proceedings, see 5 Beav. 134.]

Where a class of persons entitled is numerous, it is a question of convenience whether the Court will require them all to be made parties.

Where a numerous class of residuary legatees permitted to sue on behalf, &c., in the absence of the greater portion of them.

The testator, by his will dated in 1816, devised and bequeathed unto his wife "full and entire enjoyment" of "his real and personal estate, subject to the payment by his said wife of the sum of £150 of lawful money of Great Britain annually, to such of his relations as she should deem requiring and most meriting;" and he devised his real estates to trustees, after the death of his wife, "to the eldest son that might then be living of James Harvey, his nephew, and the son that should then be living of Edward Harvey his nephew, in equal portions, share and share alike, during the terms of their natural lives; then, if said eldest sons of the said James Harvey and Edward Harvey should become entitled by virtue of his said will to receive the rents and profits of his said freehold estate during their minorities, it was his will that there should be paid to the said James Harvey" [216] and Edward Harvey, respectively, the sum of £30 annually for the education and maintenance of such the said eldest sons respectively until they should respectively attain the age of twenty-one years, out of the rents and profits of his freehold estate, with remainder to the second, third, and other sons of James and Edward Harvey, in tail male; with remainder to their daughters; with remainder to the testator's right heirs. And he directed his trustees, immediately after his wife's death, to sell all his leasehold and chattel property, and invest the proceeds in the funds, "upon trust that they should apply the dividends and interest of said securities, so as aforesaid to be purchased, unto, and equally amongst, all his children and children, grandchild and grandchildren, of the said James Harvey and Edward Harvey, who should not, from time to time, be in the receipt of the rents and profits of his said freehold estates, devised as aforesaid;" and in the event of the issue of the said James Harvey and Edward Harvey, the testator directed that the dividends and interest of the said securities should be equally divided between them amongst his own legal representatives.

In a codicil he declared it to be his will and meaning, that all his freehold leases of different estates which he held under the See of Exeter, or otherwise, should be sold in the same bequest, and be disposed of in like manner and for the same purposes, after the death of his said wife. And the said testator directed that all and sundry the child and children of his sisters Mary Arnold, Maria Odges, and Grace

Hicks, deceased, and of Catherine Pearson, then alive, which should or might be living at the time of the death of his said wife, should take his and their share and shares of his property, directed to be sold by his trustees as aforesaid, in common with the representatives of James and [217] Edward Harvey, provided for by his said will. And, lastly, the testator further declared his desire that his said wife Jane Harvey, alias Jenefer Harvey, should be empowered to retain in her hands all or any parts of the annual sum of £150, given by his said will to his different relatives, and to be paid them as therein mentioned, and by such means to create a fund to be applied for the renewals of a life or lives, in all or any of his freehold leases or leases for lives, determinable on terms of years. And the testator expressed it to be his desire that in so doing his said wife should consult with and take the advice of his said trustees.

After the testator's death his wife proved his will.

The Plaintiff, one of the children of James Harvey, filed this bill "on behalf of herself and all others entitled as residuary legatees in remainder," against the widow, the surviving trustees, the heir at law, and Catherine Pearson.

The bill alleged, that the persons now forming the class in the said will named, as children and grandchildren of James Harvey, and Edward Harvey, and the children of Catherine Pearson, were exceedingly numerous, being upwards of twenty-six, at least, in number. That there were several children of Mary Arnold, Maria Odges, and Grace Hicks in the said will named; and who were alleged by the Defendant, the widow, to have, as next of kin of the said testator, an interest, conflicting with that of the Plaintiff and the other legatees.

The bill prayed the establishment of the will:—the necessary accounts of the estate:—the renewal of the leases out of the surplus of the £150 a year: that the executrix might be made answerable for the lease-[218]-holds which had not been renewed, and that the £150 might be duly administered under the direction of the Court.

The executrix by her answer admitted "that the grandchildren of the said James Harvey and of Edward Harvey, in the said bill named, then living, and the persons representatives of such of them as had died since the death of the said testator, and the children of the said testator's sisters, Mary Arnold, Maria Odges, Grace Hicks, and Catherine Pearson, were exceedingly numerous; but what were the number she did not know, and she submitted, whether they had such a common interest in the subject of this suit as to entitle the Plaintiff to file a bill on behalf of herself and the others of such persons, and whether they or some of them ought not to be made Defendants to the said bill. She also stated that there were thirteen children of Mary Arnold, Maria Odges, and Grace Hicks living; and she submitted, whether the trusts of the fund to be invested out of the produce of the leasehold and chattel property were not wholly void for remoteness.

The cause now came on for hearing.

Mr. Kindersley and Mr. W. M. James, for the Plaintiff.

Mr. Turner and Mr. John Bailly objected that the suit was imperfect for want of parties. They contended that though a creditor could sue on behalf, &c., yet it was not competent for one of several residuary legatees to do so; and here there were some of the parties, on whose behalf the Plaintiff professed to sue, who, as next of kin, might have an interest to contend that the gift was too remote and void, and whose interests therefore were opposed to that of the Plaintiff.

[219] They argued also, that all the next of kin were necessary parties to the suit, to argue the question of remoteness.

Mr. Kindersley and Mr. W. M. James, contra, on the question of want of parties, contended, that the Plaintiff might properly represent those interests which were identical with her own; and as to the next of kin, that the widow and Catherine Pearson the sister of the testator, who would be entitled to share in the undisposed-of residue, were sufficient parties to argue the question as to remoteness. That it would be impossible to bring all these parties before the Court; and convenience and justice required that the questions in the cause should be determined in the suit as now framed, which would bind the rights of all the absent parties.

They cited The Attorney-General v. Heelis (2 Sim. & S. 67), Adair v. The New River Company (11 Ves. 429), Cockburn v. Thompson (16 Ves. 321).

Mr. Turner, in reply.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS. I will hear this cause, to know what is the nature of the decree asked, before I decide the point of parties.

The cause then proceeded, when the question of remoteness between the residuary legatees and the next of kin arose. There were several other questions, for it appeared that the widow had given £344, out of the £150 a year, to a widow of the testator's brother Thomas; she had also surrendered a lease, a part of [220] the testator's property, of which she was the surviving cestui que vie, in consideration of $120. These acts were questioned by the Plaintiff, who insisted that the direction to renew the leases was compulsory.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. The principal point which arose for decision, in this case, was whether a legacy, given by the will of the testator, after the death of the tenant for life, to a class of persons not now ascertained, but who are to be ascertained upon the death of the tenant for life, was void for remoteness. Two objections for want of parties were taken by the Defendant. The first was, that it was not competent for the Plaintiff to sue "on behalf of herself and all others" who were in the like interest; for, as some questions might arise between them, the suit could not be sustained, unless all the persons who had presumptive rights to a share of this legacy were before the Court. Questions of this nature, whether certain persons are circumstanced as or are not indispensable parties to a suit, are very much questions of convenience; and in this case, I am of opinion, that though some inconvenience may arise, in not having all the parties presumptively entitled before the Court, yet that such inconvenience would be considerably less than would necessarily arise, from requiring them to be made parties in this stage of the cause; and which would probably amount to a complete obstruction of the suit, and would render it impossible ever to bring it to a hearing. My opinion is, that the first objection must therefore fail.

The other objection for want of parties is this; it being a question whether the legacy is void for remoteness, it may happen, that the next of kin have an in-[221]-terest in the legacy. That the next of kin will be convenient or proper parties, provided they can be had here without inconvenience to the other side, is a matter of no doubt. The Plaintiff herself has considered that they would be proper parties; because she has made one of the next of kin, and another person who is both heir at law of the testator and legal personal representative of another next of kin, Defendants; and the widow, who would be entitled to a share of the legacy in case of intestacy, is also a Defendant. The Plaintiff alleges, that there are now sufficient persons here to argue the question, or to maintain the interest of the next of kin.

This again is a state of things in which the Court may consider a suit properly constituted, on the ground of convenience; and looking, with that view, at the allegations contained in the bill and the answer, it does not now appear known that there will be a preponderating inconvenience by bringing the next of kin before the Court. I am therefore of opinion that the cause cannot proceed without some further enquiry respecting the next of kin, and, upon this occasion, I must order an enquiry who are the next of kin, and who are the legal personal representatives of each of the next of kin as are dead. I make no other order; because, in the end, it may turn out, when we know who are the next of kin, that it would be necessary, or at least proper, for the Plaintiff to proceed, even in the absence of the other next of kin. The question which I determine, in the present stage of the cause, is this, that there is nothing upon which I can act, to shew that there would be a preponderating inconvenience in bringing before the Court the other next of kin, or their representatives. There must be an enquiry before any further steps can be had.

[222] The question is one of considerable nicety: I have carefully looked into the cases of this kind, but it would be improper for me to give any further opinion upon it now. It requires a good deal of consideration what ought to be done.(1)

(1) It appearing that the next of kin and their representatives were numerous; but that there were no representatives of some of those who had died; and that five-eighths of the interest of the next of kin were represented in this suit; the cause was, on the 8th of June 1842, heard in the absence of those persons who were not already parties. See 5 Beav. 134.

[222] CALVERT v. SEBBON. July 6, 1841.

A testator appointed A. and B. executors, and after giving certain legacies, he gave A. £500 and B. £500. The executors renounced. Held, that they were not entitled to their legacies.

The testator, by his will, dated the 10th of July 1833, nominated and appointed Wm. Collins and R. M. Webster executors of his will, and, after giving certain legacies, proceeded:—"I give and bequeath to J. B. Price of &c., £500; to E. F. Price the like sum of £500; to the said Wm. Collins the sum of £500; and to the said R. M. Webster the sum of £500."

On the death of the testator, Collins and Webster renounced probate. The question was this, whether Collins and Webster, who had renounced, were entitled to the legacies of £500.

Mr. Kindersley, for Collins, and Mr. G. Turner, for Webster.

Mr. Swanston, Mr. Pemberton, and Mr. Willcock, contra.

[223] THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale] was of opinion that the legacies to the executors did not take effect.(1)

[223] WARD v. WARD AND OTHERS. July 7, 1841.

The Plaintiffs, after filing a replication to the answer of A. B., one of the Defendants obtained an order of course to examine him as a witness, saving just exceptions. Held irregular, and the order was discharged.

The Defendant Hearn having filed his answer, the Plaintiffs, on the 29th of January 1839, filed a replication thereto.

On the 16th of June the Plaintiffs obtained an order of course, for liberty to examine the Defendant Hearn as a witness for the Plaintiffs in this cause, saving all just exceptions.

This order had been obtained on the petition of the Plaintiffs alleging, "That the cause being at issue, the Petitioners were advised that the above-named Wm. Hearn was a very material witness for the Petitioners, and inasmuch as he was in no way concerned in point of interest," &c.

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Campbell now moved to discharge this order.

Mr. Kindersley and Mr. Piggott, contra.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale] discharged the order with costs; on the ground that the Plaintiffs, having replied [224] to the answer of the Defendant, could not afterwards obtain an order of course, to examine him as a witness; which proceeded on the allegation that he was not interested.(2)

[224] LOCKHART v. HARDY. July 12, 1841.

Bill of costs incurred by two persons, ordered to be taxed, on the application and upon the undertaking of one.

An application for an order of course, to tax a solicitor's bill of costs incurred by two persons, upon the application and undertaking of one only, was made to the secretary of the Master of the Rolls, who, having some doubt as to the propriety of granting such an order as of course, the petition was served on the solicitor, and was now brought before the Court.

Sandiford* (3 B. C. C. 233), where a bill was ordered to be taxed, although part of the business had been done for other persons jointly with the person applying.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale] said he did not see any objection to the order, and which was made upon affidavit of service.(1) reference, on the petition of the Attorney-General, made under the 2 W. 4, c. 57, to appoint new trustees of a charity, to settle a scheme, and to ascertain the property, and in whom the legal estate was vested.

This was a petition presented by the Attorney-General, intituled, "In the Matter of the Town Lands of the Borough of Fowey, the Free School, John Treffye's Charity, and Nicholas Sawle's Charity; and In the Matter of the 2 W. 4, c. 57." (2) The petition stated the origin of certain charities for the benefit of the inhabitants of Fowey; that the management thereof [226] and of the estate had devolved upon the corporation, no new trustees thereof having been appointed upon the death of the original trustees; and that the Corporation of Fowey had now become dissolved.

The petition also stated that an information and supplemental information had been filed respecting these charity estates, and that other proceedings respecting them had taken place in the Court of Chancery, which, however, had been discontinued. It was stated that great losses had been occasioned to the charities; and prayed that it might be referred to the Master to approve of new trustees of the said charity estates—to approve of a scheme for the said charities—and that it might be ascer-

This Act of 59 G. 3, c. 91, enacted, amongst other things,

"That whenever upon any examination or investigation taken or had by and before the Commissioners appointed or to be appointed under the authority of the fore-mentioned Acts, any case shall arise or happen in which it shall appear to the said Commissioners that the directions or orders of a Court of Equity are requisite for the remedying of any neglect, breach of trust, fraud, abuse, or misconduct, in the management of any trust created for any charitable purposes as aforesaid; or of the estates or funds thereto belonging, or for the regulating the administration of any such trust, or of the estates or funds thereof; it shall and may be lawful for the said Commissioners or any five or more of them, if they shall think fit, to certify the particulars of such case in writing under their hands to His Majesty's Attorney-General, and thereupon it shall be lawful for His Majesty's Attorney-General, if he shall so think fit, either by a summary application in the nature of a petition, or by information, as the case may require, to apply to or commence a suit in His Majesty's High Court of Chancery, or to or in His Majesty's Court of Exchequer sitting as a Court of Equity, stating and setting forth the neglect, breach of trust, fraud, abuse, or misconduct, or other cause of complaint or application, and praying such relief as the nature of the cause may require," &c.

tained of what the said property consisted, and in whom the legal estate in the landed property was now vested. The particulars stated in the petition had been certified to the Attorney-General under the above statute by the Charity Commissioners.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale] made the order as prayed, but the registrar objected to draw up the order, on the ground that such an order could only be obtained upon petition, under the 52 G. 3, c. 101. (Sir Samuel Romilly's Act.)

The petition was, therefore, again mentioned to the Master of the Rolls, and his Lordship held the objection to be unfounded, and directed the order to be drawn up.

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Blunt appeared for the Attorney-General.

[227] SMITH v. LYSTER. July 14, 1841.

A receiver appointed for the benefit of two infant tenants in common, not discharged on one coming of age.

The two infant Plaintiffs and the two adult Defendants were tenants in common in tail of certain estates. A bill was filed by the two infants by their next friends, and by the decree made in 1832, a receiver had been appointed, with directions to pay one-fourth of the net rents of the property to each of the Defendants, and an order was made for the appointment of a guardian of the Plaintiffs, and for allowance for their maintenance. The expense of the receiver was paid out of one moiety of the rents belonging to the infants.

The Plaintiff Mary Wilson attained twenty-one in February 1841, when she adopted the suit. The other Plaintiff was still an infant.

Mary Wilson now presented a petition, stating that she was desirous of being put into possession of the rents of her one-fourth of the hereditaments, and of having the receiver discharged, so far as respected her share. That the object of the said petition, so far as related to her, having been effected, she was desirous of having the petition dismissed, so far as respected her interest therein; or else, of being properly indemnified against any future costs, charges, or expenses, to which she might afterwards be rendered liable, by the same being further prosecuted in her name, as one of the Co-plaintiffs therein; and it accordingly prayed that the receiver might be discharged:—that the Petitioner might be let into possession of her one-fourth of the said suit, so far as related to her interest therein, might be dismissed, or else that she might be properly indemnified on the [228] behalf of the Plaintiff William Sumner Smith, or his next friend, against any costs, charges, and expenses which she might be put unto or incur for or by reason of her name being continued or made use of as a Co-plaintiff with the said William Sumner Smith.

Mr. E. R. Daniel, in support of the petition.

Mr. Leach, for the Co-plaintiff, cited Calvert v. Adams (2 Dick. 478), in which it is stated that a receiver was appointed of two-fifths of an estate; but Mr. Daniel took a note to that case, states, "but in Willoughby v. Willoughby, Lord Northampton refused to appoint a receiver of an undivided moiety, putting this question, 'could a receiver let, set, or distrain, or take any step without the consent of the coparcener?'"

Mr. Lloyd, for the Defendants, stated that the two parties who were concerned had submitted to a receiver merely on account of the infants.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. I do not see why this application should be now made. There is an estate belonging to four tenants in common, of whom being infants, a receiver was, with the consent of the Defendants, appointed for the protection of the infants, with directions to pay over to the adults their share. One of the infants has attained twenty-one; and she, so far from rejecting the suit, or alleging that it is improper, states the contrary, and adopts the proceedings. The object then being to protect the property during the infancy of both, one attains twenty-one, and desires to be dismissed from the [229] suit, be let into possession. The object for which the suit was instituted and the receiver appointed has not yet been fully accomplished, and I cannot therefore make the order asked. If there has been any abuse, it must be brought before the Court in a proper form. At present I can make no order, and the petition must be dismissed with costs.

[229] LOVELL v. YATES. July 15, 1841.

Depositions ordered to be delivered over to a clerk in Court, for the purpose of producing them in a Court of law; he having been already ordered to attend with the bill and answers.

An indictment for perjury had been preferred against one of the parties to this cause, in relation to some of the proceedings therein, and a true bill had been found. By an order of this Court, made in March last, the clerk in Court was ordered to attend the trial at the Stafford Assizes, with the bill, answers, and affidavits.

It was found necessary that the depositions taken in the cause should also be produced. Part of these were in the custody of one of the examiners of the Court, and the remainder in the custody of the other examiner.

Mr. Blunt now moved that, to save the expense and trouble of the attendance of the examiners' clerks, the depositions should be delivered over to the clerk in Court, who should be ordered to attend the trial therewith.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. The documents necessary for the trial are in the hands of three of the officers of this Court; and the [230] clerk in Court having been already ordered to attend with some of them, I think it right that he should have the custody of the depositions also for the purpose of the trial.

[230] LLOYD v. JENKINS. July 8, 1841.

Where an answer is filed after notice of motion for a special injunction, affidavits subsequently filed cannot be used to contradict the answer.

The bill was filed in this cause by a party entitled under the will of the testator, and it claimed, as part of the testator's estate, a fund which, at the death of the testator, was standing in the joint names of himself and the Defendant, his reputed wife, and which therefore, by survivorship, came under the control of the Defendant. Some time after the filing of the bill, and before the answer had been put in, a notice of motion was given for a special injunction to restrain the Defendant from transferring, &c., the fund.

The Defendant put in her answer after the notice of motion had been given, and the Plaintiff subsequently filed affidavits in support of the motion, which contradicted the answer.

Mr. Tinney and Mr. Shebbeare, in support of the motion, were about to read the affidavits.

Mr. Kindersley and Mr. Twells, contrâ, objected that the affidavits could not be read to contradict the answer, they having been subsequently filed.

Mr. Tinney, in reply.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale] said his impression was that these affidavits could not be read for the purpose [231] for which they were tendered; and his Lordship disposed of the motion without reference to them.(1)

Where a gift of a portion of a residue fails, it belongs to the next of kin, and not the other residuary legatees. Thus, where a testatrix gave one-third of the residue to A., and another one-third to B., and as to the other one-third thereof, gave £500 to C., and the remainder thereof to D., and C. died in the lifetime of the testatrix it was held that the £500 belonged to the next of kin, as undisposed of.

The testatrix gave all her residuary personal estate, after payment thereof of her just debts, legacies, and expenses attending thereon, upon trust to divide the residue thereof into three equal parts or shares; and as to one equal third part of such residue, upon trust to pay or transfer the same unto her son John Lloyd, executors, administrators, or assigns, for his and their own use and benefit; and as to one other equal third part thereof, upon trust that they, her said trustees, should, within the space of six calendar months next after her decease, pay unto her son Charles Lloyd the sum of £500, part thereof, to and for his own sole absolute use and benefit; and as to the residue and remainder of such last-mentioned third part, upon trust for Charles Lloyd for life, with remainder to his children; and as to the remaining one-third part of such residue of her estate, she gave the same unto her daughter Charlotte Hodgkinson for life, with remainder to her children.

Charles Lloyd died in the lifetime of the testatrix, leaving children, and the question was to whom the £500 belonged.

[232] Mr. Pemberton and Mr. K. Parker, for the Plaintiffs, the children of Charles Lloyd.

The testatrix's intention was evidently to divide the residue between her children and their issue. The trustees were to divide it into three parts, and Charles Lloyd £500, and "the residue and remainder" was for the benefit of his children; when, therefore, the benefit intended for Charles Lloyd has been provided for, the residue belongs to his children, and this, in the event which happened, comprises the £500. The testatrix may be said to have given the residue, and this lapsed legacy of £500 belongs to that residue out of which it is to be paid.

Mr. Rogers, contra, contended that the £500 was undisposed of, and belonged to the next of kin. That it was not a simple gift of a legacy of £500, but was a portion of the one-third of the residue, and could not be held to have lapsed and have fallen back, a second time, into the residue, so as to belong to the other residuary legatees. He contended that the case of Skrymsher v. Northcote (1 Swan. 566) was precisely in point, and that the rule there applied to revocation, was equally applicable to a case of lapse.

Mr. Tennant, for the children of Charlotte Hodgkinson.

Mr. Pemberton, in reply. Revocation is different from lapse: the former indicates an intention; the latter is a matter of mere chance.

July 22. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. In this case of Lloyd v. Lloyd I have looked over the case of Skrymsher v. Northcote, and I confess that [233] not able to find that there is any substantial difference between that case and the present.

In that case the testator gave to each of his daughters a life interest in his residuary estate, with remainder to their children; making, in the event of their being children, an absolute severance of the fund. And he directed, that if either of the daughters died without children, £500 should be paid, out of the moiety of the residue given to her and her children, to H. N.; and the remainder of that moiety was to go over to the other sister, subject to the same limitations. The testator revoked the gift of the £500, and the event on which it had been given having happened, the question was, whether it was to go to the other residuary legatee, or to the next of kin; and Sir Thomas Plumer considered, that although where a legacy it enured to the benefit of the residuary legatee, yet "that a part of a residue, of which the disposition failed, would not accrue in augmentation of the remaining portion as a residue of a residue, but, instead of resuming the nature of residue, devolved as undisposed of;" and in that case he determined that the £500 must go to the next of kin. He considered that there was a subdivision made of that moiety of the residue, and that the sum given out of it was a portion of the residue, which neither went to the other residuary legatee, nor to any other person, but had lapsed for the benefit of the next of kin.

In this case the testatrix has given her residue, and directed it to be divided into three equal portions. One portion she gave to one person absolutely. As to the second portion, she gave £500 out of it to the father of the children who were intended to have the remainder after his death; and then she gave the remainder of the [234] third part of the residue to the father for his life, with remainder to his children; and the other third she gave to another branch of the family.

The question in this case is, what is to become of the £500, the gift of which has failed by the death of the legatee in the lifetime of the testatrix? I am satisfied that if she had contemplated the event which happened, namely, the death of that person in her lifetime, she would have given the whole of the share of the residue to his children, in the way she had given the remainder. But looking at the decision in the case before Sir Thomas Plumer, that there is a difference between a legacy and a legacy given out of a share of the residue, I must consider the £500 as a portion of the one-third share of the residue, and as a mere subdivision of it, and that it belongs to the next of kin as undisposed of.

[235] TAYLOR v. HEMING. July 22, 1841.

[S. C. 10 L. J. Ch. 369; 5 JUR. 766. See Bate v. Bate, 1844, 7 Beav. 537; Turner v. Burkinshaw, 1863, 4 Giff. 402.]

The Court cannot, at the instance of the Defendant, order a Plaintiff to produce for the Defendant's inspection documents stated in his bill, to be in the Plaintiff's possession.

Where a Plaintiff by his bill states documents to be in his possession, and it is necessary for the Defendant to see them, in order to put in his answer, the Court, though it cannot compel their production, will extend the time for answering, until after the Plaintiff has produced them. The fact of the documents being in the Plaintiff's possession must, however, appear upon the record.

The decision in The Princess of Wales v. The Earl of Liverpool approved of.

The bill alleging some fraudulent transactions between two of the Defendants, Messrs. Heming & Needham, and a Mr. Holmes, the partner of the Plaintiff, set forth some letters which had passed between those parties as proving the allegation. It then contained the following passage, that the Plaintiff "hath in fact discovered various other parts of the written correspondence between the said parties, that is to say, letters from the said Defendant J. S. Needham to the said George Holmes, and Plaintiff is ready and willing to deposit the same, if required for the purposes of this suit, with his clerk in Court, or to permit inspection thereof by the Defendants hereto; but Plaintiff hath, in order to avoid the expense of setting the same out in this his bill of complaint, set forth, in the schedule hereto annexed, a list or schedule of such letters by date, and to which Plaintiff craves if required to refer."

The schedule contained a list of about twenty letters from Needham to Holmes, specifying their dates.

The solicitor of the Defendants Heming & Needham had applied to the Plaintiff's solicitor for copies of the letters referred to in the preceding allegation, and he received copies of the letters which were mentioned in the schedule. Some of the dates of these copies did not agree with the dates as stated in the schedule; but this difference was stated to have accidentally arisen in the copying. It appeared from the correspondence which took place between the solicitors [236] after the filing of the bill, that the Plaintiff had in his possession other letters between Messrs. Heming & Needham, and Holmes, besides those mentioned in his schedule, which he refused to allow the Defendants to have copies of.

Under these circumstances a motion was now made, on behalf of the Defendants Heming & Needham, that the Plaintiff might, within seven days after service of the writ of execution of the order, deposit, upon oath, with his clerk in Court the letters referred to in his bill and the schedule thereto; and also all other letters written by the said Defendants or either of them to Holmes, and Holmes, Taylor & Co., or either of them, and that the Defendants might be at liberty to inspect the same and take copies thereof, and that the Defendants might have a month's time to put in their answer after such letters should have been so deposited.

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. W. S. Daniel, in support of the motion.

Mr. Rogers, contra.

The Princess of Wales v. The Earl of Liverpool (1 Swan. 114, and also reported in 1 Wils. C. C. 113, and 2 Wils. C. C. 29), and Shepherd v. Morris (1 Beav. 175) were cited.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. This is an application of a description which is not very often made. Only one similar case has come before me; and I believe there are very few cases of this description to be found in the books. It is, however, a motion which is quite founded in justice, if the cir[237]-cumstances of the case be such as to render it proper, according to the practice of the Court, to grant the application.

The Plaintiff by his bill states, that he has in his possession certain documents which he does not set forth, not because they are not a material part of his case, but on account of the expense, and he offers to produce or deposit them. The question which is raised on this occasion is, whether he is to exclude the Defendants from that which he offers by his bill, and still avail himself of the process of the Court to compel the Defendants to put in their answer. I am of opinion that there is sufficient authority for saying he is not entitled to do so. If a Plaintiff refers in his bill to documents in his possession as forming part of his case, then, whether he does or does not offer to produce them, he cannot call on the Defendant to answer until he has seen the documents which are necessary for his answer. The Court has acted on that principle from the earliest period (see Wy. Pr. Reg. 161, and Jones v. Lewis, 2 Sim. & St. 242), and the case of The Princess of Wales v. The Earl of Liverpool was by no means the first case on the point. Judges of great experience have said that they could never understand on what principle that case was founded (see 5 Sim. 510), but I believe it is founded on principles, which upon examination would fully support it. What is asked in this case is, that the Plaintiff shall produce the documents. I am of opinion that I have no jurisdiction to make such an order. (See Penfold v. Nunn, 5 Sim. 409; Milligan v. Mitchell, 6 Sim. 186.) But the next part of the application is, that the Defendants may have a certain time to answer after the documents have been produced. This is what the [238] Court has done before, and which it is expedient to do in cases which fall within the rule.

The Plaintiff has set forth some letters, and referred to other letters, and it is contended that by his bill he leaves it to be inferred that there are letters forming part of his case which are not included in his schedule. I cannot arrive at that conclusion. I think that the Defendants should have full inspection of the letters stated in the schedule before they are compelled to answer. As to those of which copies have been given, but which do not correspond as to dates with those in the schedule, I observe it stated in the correspondence that there is a mistake. This may be so. I think the Defendants have a right to have this mistake explained by the affidavit of the Plaintiff, or of the parties employed by him.

There has been a subsequent correspondence between the solicitors, by which it appears that there are other letters which are not stated in the schedule which form part of the correspondence, but not of the Plaintiff's case as made by the bill. This fact appears from the subsequent letters, but not upon the record, and, however inconvenient, I am of opinion, that, according to the rule of the Court, I cannot either order the Plaintiff to produce them, or stay the progress of the suit until they are produced. It may be inconvenient and render a cross-bill necessary, but there is not, on the record, a statement that the Plaintiff has these documents in his possession. If a cross-bill were filed, there might be sufficient ground for a motion to stay the proceedings in the first suit until all the correspondence has been produced. I think, however, as the case stands, that the rule of the Court compels me [239] to abide by the record; and I cannot, therefore, grant that part of the application.

The order must be that the Defendants have one month's time to answer after the production of the documents mentioned in the bill, and of an affidavit to prove their identity.

[239] BRETT v. HORTON. July 22, 1841.

[S. C. 10 L. J. Ch. 371; 5 Jur. 696. Followed, In re Campbell's Trusts, 1886, 31 Ch. D. 685. See In re Stone [1895], 2 Ch. 196.]

A testatrix directed her trustees to divide the rents, &c., of her real estate equally between A., B., C., and D. the widow of E., until E.'s children attained twenty-one; and upon their attaining twenty-one, the trustees were to sell and divide the produce between A., B., C., and the children of E., "in equal shares and proportions as tenants in common;" but if D. married, her part of the income was to be applied to the maintenance of E.'s children; and she gave the residue of her real and personal estate "equally between A., B., C., and the children of E. who attained twenty-one."

There were four children of E. who attained twenty-one. Held, that they did not take the property per capita with A., B. and C., but one-fourth only between them.

The testatrix, by her will, dated the 24th of January 1830, after directing a particular part of her real estate to be sold for payment of her debts, directed her trustees to pay and divide the rents of the remaining part of her estates unsold, "equally between her sister (the wife of Richard Bodington), her niece Sarah (the wife of John Bodington), and Sarah Brett (the widow of her late nephew William Brett), and her niece Ann Jones, until all the children of her said nephew William Brett should attain twenty-one years, or die under that age, which should first happen;" upon which event, she directed her trustees to sell the last-mentioned real estate, and pay and apply the money arising from such last-mentioned sale "unto and equally between her sister (the wife of [240] Richard Bodington), her niece Sarah (the wife of John Bodington), the child and children of her said nephew William Brett who should attain the age of twenty-one years, and her niece Ann Jones, and their respective executors, administrators, and assigns, in equal shares and proportions as tenants in common." Provided, that in case the widow of William Brett should marry again, she directed her trustees, immediately thereupon, to pay her part of the income of the remaining part of the farms, &c., before directed to be paid to her, for the maintenance and education of the child or children of William Brett who should be then living.

And the testatrix devised and bequeathed the residue of her property, both real and personal, "unto and equally between her sister (the wife of Richard Bodington), her niece Sarah (the wife of John Bodington), the child and children of her said late nephew William Brett, who should live to attain twenty-one, and her niece Ann Jones, their respective heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns.

The testatrix died in 1830. The testatrix's nephew, William Brett, had four children; and the question now raised was, whether upon the youngest of such children attaining twenty-one, the four children were together entitled to one-fourth part of the testatrix's estate, or whether, on that event, they each became entitled to one-seventh part thereof.

Mr. Kindersley and Mr. Elderton, for three of the children of William Brett, argued that they were each entitled to one-seventh of the property, and that they took per capita with the other legatees; Blackler v. Webb (2 P. W. 383), [241] Butler v. Strallon (3 Br. C. C. 367), Weld v. Bradbury (2 Vern. 705), Roper on Legacies, 140; and see Douling v. Smith (3 Beavan, 541).

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Lloyd, contra, did not dispute the general rule, but contended, that there was, on the face of the will, a sufficient indication of the testatrix's intention, that the children should take only one-fourth between them.

Mr. Kindersley, in reply.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS. The testatrix seems to have postponed the division of the capital, until the children had attained a capacity to receive; and in the meantime the fund was to be divided into fourths, one of which was to be paid to their mother until all the children attained twenty-one, but to be applied towards their maintenance in case of their mother marrying again during that period. There can be no doubt, that, according to the general rule, a gift "to the wife of Richard, &c., and the children of William Brett equally as tenants in common," taken by itself, would entitle the legatees to take per capita; but these words may be controlled by the context; and I cannot conceive that it could have been the intention of the testatrix, that the other legatees were to take one-fourth each until the children attained twenty-one, but to have their shares reduced to one-seventh on that event. My impression is strongly against a division into sevenths, and, unless compelled, I cannot adopt that construction.

July 22. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. In this case I have read over the whole of this will, and I confess the impression I have now, is [242] stronger than it was when this case was argued before me.

The testatrix had given the purchase-money to arise from the sale of the real estate, and the residue, in such terms, as, if taken by themselves, would, I think most clearly, have entitled every one of the children to an equal share in the fund; that is, according to the construction which the Court has frequently given to words of this kind, it would have to be divided into seven parts. But though this would be the effect of the words taken by themselves, yet, in this case, as in all cases, we must look at the whole will to see if we can discover what really was the intention of the testatrix, and this must control those technical and arbitrary rules which would otherwise prevent the real intention from being carried into execution.

The testatrix, in this case, after providing for the payment of her debts, has directed that the income of the remaining property should be paid in equal fourth shares; one-fourth share to each of three persons distinctly named, and the other fourth to the mother of the children, in a way, which shews it was intended, through her, to be applied for the maintenance and care of the children until the youngest of them attained twenty-one. This was to continue until the youngest of them attained twenty-one, but then the property was to be sold and divided amongst the three persons named and the children, describing them as a class, their respective "executors, and administrators, in equal shares and proportions as tenants in common." I cannot impute to this testatrix the intention of making a division when the youngest of those children attained twenty-one years different from that which she had previously made. I think the intention [243] was to continue its division into four parts; and all the words of the will will then have their full operation by that construction. Those children who attained twenty-one were to have one-fourth part of the estate in common amongst them and their respective heirs, executors, and administrators. I think that gives effect to the words contained in this will, and though it may be attended with some doubt, I think that is the true construction, and I must consequently hold that these children are entitled amongst them to a fourth only.

[243] SALOMON v. STALMAN. July 22, 1841.

An order, obtained on affidavit of service, discharged with costs, on the ground of a misnomer of a party in the affidavit.

A notice of motion was given by the Defendants to dismiss a bill for want of prosecution; and was entitled in a cause in which Joseph Constant Salomon was Plaintiff, and George Thomas Stalman and others (naming them) were Defendants.

The Plaintiff did not appear upon the motion, but it being stated that a replication had been filed, since the notice of motion had been given, the Defendant, on the 12th of June, obtained an order, upon affidavit of service of the notice of motion, that the Plaintiff should pay the costs of the application.

It was now moved, on behalf of the Plaintiff, that the order might be discharged for irregularity; on the ground, that the notice of motion had described the first-named Defendant as George Thomas Stalman, whereas his name as stated on the record was George Stalman only. There were other objections raised, [244] but the one stated was the foundation of the decision.

Mr. Pemberton, for the motion.

Mr. Addis, contrâ.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. This order was not regular, because the name of George Thomas Stalman is substituted in the notice of motion for George Stalman. This is enough in itself to decide this motion. If the Plaintiff had appeared there would have been no difficulty in setting the matter right, but when a party takes an order on affidavit of service, he takes it subject to every objection which can possibly be taken to it.

It has sometimes occurred, that parties, in order to embarrass their adversary, have not appeared, and at the same time have been actually present watching the proceedings, in order to discover some irregularity, of which they might afterwards take advantage.

Discharge the order with costs.

[245] GARROD v. HOLDEN. July 23, 1841.

The Court cannot, under the 1 W. 4, c. 36, assign counsel or solicitors to pauper Defendants on the application of the Plaintiff.

The Defendant, Sophia Holden, having been taken by the sheriff upon an attachment for want of answer, was on the 15th of April 1841 brought up, and having then sworn, pursuant to the provisions of the 1 W. 4, c. 36, that she was unable, by reason of poverty, to employ a solicitor to put in her answer to the Plaintiff's bill, an order was made, by which it was ordered that the Defendant should be turned over to the Fleet, and remain there until she should fully answer the Plaintiff's bill, clear her contempt, and the Court should make other order to the contrary. And it was referred to the Master to certify whether the said Defendant was unable, by reason of her poverty, to employ a solicitor to put in her answer to the Plaintiff's bill.

The Plaintiff prosecuted the reference, and obtained the Master's report, which was in the affirmative. The Defendant, however, refused to take any steps in order to avail herself of the provisions of the before-mentioned statute.

Mr. Tripp, on behalf of the Plaintiff, now moved under the second and sixth rules of the 1 W. 4, c. 36, s. 15, that the Defendant might have counsel and solicitor assigned to her, in order that she might be enabled to put in her answer; and that she might be brought to the Bar of the Court on the 4th of August; and that the Plaintiff's clerk in Court might then attend with the record, that the bill might be taken pro confesso against the Defendant, unless in the meantime she should put [246] in her answer. He cited Welford v. Daniel (9 Sim. 652), but observed that the Lord Chancellor had decided that the seventh rule of the statute in question was meant for the benefit of Defendants only. Watkin v. Parker (1 Myl. & Cr. 370).

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale] having taken time to consider the provisions of the statute, refused to grant the motion in the terms asked, but ordered that a writ of habeas corpus should issue to bring the Defendant to the Bar of the Court on the 4th of August to answer her contempt, and that the clerk in Court for the Plaintiff should then attend with the record of the Plaintiff's bill, in order to take the same pro confesso against the Defendant.(1)

[246] UPJOHN v. UPJOHN. July 27, 1841.

Preliminary enquiries had been directed under the General Order of the 9th of May 1839; the sole Plaintiff died before the report, and before decree. Held, that a Defendant might file a supplemental bill to have the benefit of these enquiries.

The testatrix devised an estate to Catherine M. Upjohn for life, with remainder over to certain other parties.

In 1839 C. M. Upjohn, as sole Plaintiff, filed her bill against different parties interested in the estate, and amongst others against her husband Francis Upjohn, who represented one of the parties entitled in remainder, praying that the trusts of the will might be carried into execution.

In November 1839 certain preliminary enquiries were directed to be taken before the Master, under the 5th [247] General Order of May 1839 (Ord. Can. 136), to ascertain the heir at law and next of kin of the testatrix; and also to ascertain who was the survivor of the trustees, and in whom the legal estate of the property was vested, and whether certain parties had married, and what children they had.

Proceedings were had in the Master's office under this order; but before any report had been obtained, the sole Plaintiff died, and the suit became abated.

No decree had been made in the cause.

A supplemental bill was then filed by Francis Upjohn, one of the Defendants to the original bill, stating the proceedings in the original suit, and praying to have the benefit of all the proceedings therein. It now came on for hearing.

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. S. Prescott White stated the circumstances of the case, and observed that the Defendant in the original suit had a right to the benefit of the enquiry made under the decretal order of November 1839.

Mr. Purvis, for some of the Defendants, submitted whether it was regular for a Defendant to file such a bill as the present, where no decree had been made in the original suit.

Mr. Campbell, for other Defendants.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. The order of November 1839 was for the benefit of all the parties, and I see no objection to the decree now asked. The General Orders in reference to preliminary [248] enquiries have in practice been found very beneficial, and the Court must struggle to get over all difficulties, in order that they may have their full operation. (See Mitford Tr. p. 72, 79, 4th ed., and Lloyd v. Johns, 9 Ves. 37.)

[248] GRIFFITH v. BLUNT. July 27, 28, 1841.

[S. C. 10 L. J. Ch. 372. Distinguished, Picken v. Matthews, 1878, 10 Ch. D. 268.]

Bequest in trust to accumulate for all the children of A. and B. (who were living) equally, the shares of sons to be vested at twenty-five, and of daughters at twenty-five or marriage, and if one child only to be paid at twenty-five or marriage. Held too remote.

The testatrix, by her will, gave her residuary personal estate to her executors, upon trust to pay one-third part thereof to her nephew Thomas Robert Dimsdale, and to pay one-third part to her nephew Charles John Dimsdale, and proceeded thus:—"And as to the remaining one-third part of my said residue, upon trust to pay and make over the same to William Pitts Dimsdale, John Dimsdale, and Joseph Blunt, and the survivors and survivor of them, and the executors and administrators of such survivor, to be held by them upon the trusts hereinafter mentioned and declared of and concerning the same; that is to say, upon trust that they or he do and shall lay out and invest the same, in their or his names or name, in the Parliamentary stocks or public funds of Great Britain, or at interest upon Government or real securities in England or Wales, and do and shall from time to time alter, vary, and transpose the said trust monies so to be laid out and invested as aforesaid, for, into, or upon other stocks, funds, and securities of the like nature at their or his discretion. And I do hereby declare that the said trustees or trustee, for the time being, shall stand and be possessed of and interested in the said trust monies, and the stocks, funds, and securities in or upon which they shall be invested, in trust [249] to accumulate the same, and the interest thereof, and to stand possessed of the same and the accumulations thereof upon and for the ends, intents, and purposes hereinafter expressed and declared of and concerning the same; that is to say, in trust for all and every the child and children of my said two nephews Thomas Robert Dimsdale and Charles John Dimsdale, equally to be divided between or amongst them, if more than one, share and share alike, per capita and not per stirpes, the share or shares of such of them as shall be a son or sons, to be an interest or interests vested in him or them, respectively, at his or their age or respective ages of twenty-five years, and the share or shares of such of them as shall be a daughter or daughters, to be an interest or interests vested in her or them respectively, at her or their age or respective ages of twenty-five years, or day or respective days of marriage, with the previous consent of her or their parents or guardians, which shall first happen. And if there be but one such child, then to such only child, his or her executors, administrators, or assigns, absolutely, to be paid to such child, if a son, on his attaining the age of twenty-five years, or if a daughter, on her attaining that age or on her marriage, with such consent as aforesaid, which shall first happen."

"Provided always, and my will is, that if any of the said children, being a daughter or daughters, shall die under the age of twenty-five years, without being or having been married, or if any of them, being a son or sons, shall depart this life under the age of twenty-five years, then and in such respective cases, the shares of the legatees so dying as aforesaid, shall go and accrue to the survivors or survivor of the children of my said two nephews, who shall be entitled to the remaining part of the said one-third part of the residue, share and share alike, and the share or shares surviving or accruing to the survivors or survivor of the said children shall be [250]—some vested in and be transferable to such survivors or survivor respectively, at such time or respective times as hereinbefore directed concerning his, her, or their original share or shares, and such benefit of survivorship and accruer shall extend, as well to the surviving and accruing as to the original share or shares."

By a codicil the testatrix, after reciting that she had given the two-thirds of her residuary personal estate to her nephews, proceeded in the following terms:—"And the other third part I have given among the children of my said two nephews, to be equally divided between them at the times and in the manner in my said will directed. Now I do hereby revoke the said disposition and direction, and instead thereof I direct that my said residuary personal estate shall be divided into five equal parts. And I give and bequeath two of such five parts unto my said nephew the Honourable Thomas Robert Baron Dimsdale, his executors, administrators, and assigns, to and for his and their own absolute use and benefit. I give and bequeath two other of such five parts unto my said nephew Charles John Dimsdale, his executors, administrators, and assigns, to and for his and their own absolute use and benefit. And as to the remaining one-fifth part thereof I give and bequeath the same to and among the children of my said two nephews, in the same manner and subject to the same limitations and conditions as directed by my said will, with respect to the third part thereby given to and amongst the said children as hereinbefore mentioned."

The testatrix died in 1832. Thomas Robert Dimsdale and Charles John Dimsdale survived her.

The Plaintiffs were the only children of Thomas Robert Dimsdale and Charles John Dimsdale; they were [251] all under the age of twenty-five, and one, who was a daughter, had married with the consent of her father. The residue amounted to more than £200,000.

The question was, whether the gift to the children of Thomas Robert Dimsdale and Charles John Dimsdale was or not too remote.

The usual accounts of the estate having been taken, and certain enquiries made, the cause now came on for further directions.

Mr. Tinney and Mr. Calvert, for the Plaintiffs. The trustees were to accumulate and hold the fund "in trust for all and every the child and children:" here there was a valid vested gift. The testatrix afterwards uses the term "vested;" but it is clear that she referred to the time of payment; for if there was one child, the whole fund was to be "paid to him at twenty-five or marriage."

It appears from the codicil that the testatrix thought she had provided only for the time of distribution; she says: "I have given amongst the children of my said two nephews, to be equally divided between them at the times and in the manner in my said will directed." They cited Blease v. Burgh (2 Beavan, 221).

Mr. Pemberton, Mr. Kindersley, and Mr. Piggott, contra, for the next of kin, contended that the gift was too remote. They cited Leake v. Robinson (2 Mer. 363), Ring v. Hardwick (2 Beavan, 352).

Mr. Girdlestone, for the executors.

[252] Mr. Tinney, in reply.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS. I will read over the will; the only question seems, whether the word "vested" means "paid."

July 28. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale] said that the will was really free from ambiguity; that the vesting was not to take effect till twenty-five or marriage, and that the gift was therefore too remote.

[252] SHEPHERD v. MORRIS. (Ex relatione.) July 28, 1841.

In a bill for an account, the Plaintiff, in general terms, charged errors in the accounts between him and the Defendant; and stated, that they appeared in a certain report of an accountant; but the bill did not state the report, or specifically point out the errors. Held, that the Plaintiff could not, on this record, give evidence of the report, or of such errors; and that, notwithstanding the Defendant had stated the report in his cross-bill, and had explained some of the errors.

The Defendant was the commission agent of the Plaintiff, and sold Roman cement on his account. The Defendant, from time to time, transmitted to the Plaintiff, who lived in the country, periodical accounts of the sales and other pecuniary transactions between them.

The bill alleged, that such accounts were not settled accounts binding upon the Plaintiff and the Defendant; and the bill charged, that in these periodical accounts, and in the other accounts, kept by the Defendant, of the pecuniary transactions between the Plaintiff and the Defendant, there were various errors; it also charged, that in each year, there were errors of sums received, and not credited to the account of the Plaintiff, of [253] sums improperly entered as paid on account of the Plaintiff, and other inaccuracies; and the bill charged, that such errors appeared in a report of an accountant in the Plaintiff's possession, and which he called upon the Defendant to inspect. The bill, however, did not set out the report, or otherwise specifically refer to it. The Plaintiff in fact objected to produce this report; and the Defendant obtained an order, for a month's time to answer, from the time of the deposit of the report with the Plaintiff's Six Clerk. (1 Beavan, 175.)

The Defendant afterwards filed a cross-bill, stating the report, and various explanations of the alleged errors in the account. The Plaintiff, by his answer to the cross-bill, abandoned some of these errors, and subsequently amended his original bill, whereby he gave up many of the errors alleged in the report; but he did not incorporate the report in the amended bill. The suits were ordered to come on together, and the evidence in one suit was ordered to be evidence in the other.

At the hearing, the Plaintiff in the original suit proposed to give the report in evidence in that suit; and also to give evidence of the specific errors mentioned in the report.

Mr. Girdlestone and Mr. Teed, for the Plaintiff Shepherd. The reason of the rule that in opening an account, specific errors must be alleged, is, in order that the Defendant may have notice of the errors, and an opportunity of explaining them. In this case the [254] rule does not apply. Here the Defendant has not only had notice of the errors, but has actually stated the report in his cross-bill, and by way of pretence and charge gone into and endeavoured to explain these errors. He has seen the report, and has, in fact, had the same notice of it, and of the errors mentioned in it, as if the report had been set forth at length in the bill or in a schedule.

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Willcock, for the Defendant Morris, were proceeding to object to the evidence, when

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale] said, I am of opinion, that the Plaintiff must state the specific errors on the record. Here there is an allegation, that there are various errors appearing in a certain report, which the Plaintiff calls on the Defendant to inspect. The Plaintiff however afterwards objected to the inspection, and the Defendant was obliged to apply to the Court for the special order stated, and afterwards filed a cross-bill explaining the errors appearing in the report. The Plaintiff put in his answer to the cross-bill, shewing that he was satisfied with respect to some of these errors, and he amended his original bill, but did not state on which of the errors mentioned in the report he relied, nor did he make the report a part of the record. I am of opinion that neither this report nor evidence of the errors pointed out in it can be received in the original suit.

[255] THE ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. DULWICH COLLEGE. Dec. 21, 1840;
Jan. 16, 29, 30, July 29, 1841.

By letters patent, E. A. was empowered to found a charity, consisting of a master and a specified number of other members, who were thereby created a corporation, with power to take certain lands. E. A. was empowered to make ordinances for the Government thereof, and for the better ordering of the estates. E. A. established the charity, and conveyed the lands to the use of the master and other members, of the numbers specified by the letters patent, and to no other intent and purpose whatsoever. He afterwards made ordinances, whereby, amongst other things, he added to the number of members specified by the letters patent; and appropriated to them a portion of the revenues of the charity property. Held, that E. A. had not the power of creating additional members, or of declaring any trust of the property in their favour.

An information, alleging an abuse in the internal regulations of a charity dismissed, on the ground that they were the proper subject for the interference of the special visitor.

By letters patent, dated the 21st of June 1619, licence was granted by King James the First to Edward Alleyne, for the maintenance of poor men, women, and children, and the education of the same poor children, to found a college in Dulwich, to endure for ever, and consist of one master, one warden, four fellows, six poor brethren, six poor sisters, and twelve poor scholars, to be maintained, educated, and governed, according to such ordinances and statutes as he should make in his lifetime, or as the persons nominated by him should make after his death. And he was empowered to make such ordinances, constitutions, and statutes for the maintenance, education, and government of the said master, warden, fellows, poor brethren, sisters, and scholars as often as need should require. The college was to be called "The College of God's Gift," and the said master, &c., were to be a body corporate, and to have power to take, to them and their successors, for the maintenance of the said college, the lands therein mentioned. And licence was thereby granted to Edward Alleyne, to make statutes and rules for the better ordering as well of the said college, as the master, &c.; and also of the said lands and the rents thereof, to remain for ever inviolable, not being re-[256]-pugnant to the king's prerogative, nor contrary to the laws of the realm, nor ecclesiastical laws or constitutions of the Church of England. And the Archbishop of Canterbury was to be, for ever, visitor of the college, and to have power over the same, and the persons therein, and to visit, order, and punish, according to the ecclesiastical laws of England and such constitutions and ordinances as Edward Alleyne should make.

Pursuant to this licence, and on the 13th of September 1619, Edward Alleyne established the college, and nominated the master, warden, four fellows, six poor brethren, six poor sisters, and twelve poor scholars, to have perpetual succession according to such statutes as should be made.

Afterwards, by a deed dated the 24th of April 1620, Edward Alleyne conveyed the lands in the letters patent mentioned, to the sole and only use of the master, warden, four fellows, six poor brethren, six poor sisters, and twelve poor scholars, and for and to no other intent and purpose whatsoever.

On the 29th of September 1626, or six years after the endowment, the founder established certain statutes and ordinances, for the maintenance, education, and government of the college; and he thereby stated the qualifications and duties which were to be required from, and performed by, the master, warden, fellows, poor brethren, and sisters, and poor scholars; and how the revenues were to be distributed.

In framing these statutes, he seemed to have considered, that, in some respects, he was at liberty to vary the corporation and foundation which he had established; and he appointed, that there should be [257] six chaunters for music and singing in the chapel, who should be called and esteemed junior fellows, every one of them to have his voice, as the four senior fellows had; six assistants touching the ordering of the college, and the rents, revenues, and profits thereof; and thirty members. And desiring that a proportion of the poor brethren and sisters should be chosen out of each of the parishes of St. Botolph without Bishopsgate, St. Saviour's in Southwark, and the parish now called St. Luke's, he directed the two churchwardens from each of those parishes should for ever be the assistants of the master, warden, and fellows for the governing thereof; and further, that the churchwardens and vestry of those parishes, should respectively make choice of ten poor persons, i.e., five poor men and five poor women in each parish, to be the members of the college, and to be admitted by them into the almshouses in London, that from thence they might be admitted into the college, as places should fall void; and he directed the mode of choosing the poor brethren and sisters, out of those members, by lot, and for making a payment to the poor men or poor women drawing a blank lot; and he ordered to be paid to each of the chaunters a certain annual sum, and a share of the surplus annual revenue; to each of the thirty members intended to be so appointed, a weekly payment of 3d., a gown once in two years, and a proportion of the surplus annual revenue.

The same Edward Alleyne by his will, dated the 13th of November 1626, gave certain specific bequests to the college; and directed his executors, within two years after his death, to build ten almshouses in the parish of St. Botolph without Bishopsgate, for ten poor people of that parish, to be members of the college, and likewise ten other houses, in St. Saviour's parish, for other ten [258] poor people, to be likewise members of the college; and having made a further memorandum, dated 20th of November 1626, whereby he confirmed two leases to the college, he died on the 26th of December in the same year.

The founder having, by his statutes and ordinances, and by his will, given directions which, if followed, would have altered the constitution of the foundation, and the estates, with which he had endowed the college, being, as it would appear, insufficient for all the purposes he contemplated, and moreover his assets being insufficient to provide ground, and build the almshouses which he had directed to be built, a bill was filed in this Court by the rectors, churchwardens, overseers, and certain parishioners of St. Botolph, against the college and the surviving executor of the founder, praying discovery and relief. In their answer to this bill, the corporation alleged, that the lands amortised to the corporation were but sufficient to bear the charge of the first foundation, and charges thereto incident, which the founder had omitted to provide for; so that the latter addition of six chaunters and thirty almspeople of the three parishes could not be maintained by the revenues; for which cause, and also for that the new addition to the corporation was not warrantable by law, they thought they were not compellable by law or equity to part with any part of the college revenues for the finding of six chaunters, or the relief or maintenance of the thirty almsfolk. And the surviving executor stated the assets he had received, and the payments he had made, and that he was content to charge himself with the remainder in his hands (which was £120) towards building the almshouses in St. Botolph's. That he thought the sum sufficient, and had offered therewith to build the almshouses, if the parish would provide the [259] land, but the parish rather desired to have the money for the benefit of the poor, by some other charitable employment, than to have the almshouses built, unless the allowances for the maintenance of the poor, according to the ordinances, could be had; and which could not be, for the reasons aforesaid. And he stated himself to be ready to prove, that £120 was the uttermost that the personal estate would produce for the building of the almshouses required by the bill. In this suit, it was ordered, by consent, that the Defendant, the executor, should pay to the Plaintiffs the sum of £120, upon security to be given by the parish that the same should be duly employed. And it was ordered, that if any new addition of estate should come to the college, or there should thereafter be an overplus of value in the college revenue, then the Defendant should be liable to apply such increase to the additional charities of the founder, as the Court should think fit to direct; and upon payment of the £120 to the parish, the executor was to be discharged from the bequest.

At a subsequent period, some disagreement having arisen among the members of the college, the visitor (Gilbert Sheldon), the Archbishop of Canterbury, by his orders, dated the 16th of July 1664, ordered, that the college should consist of one master, one warden, four fellows, six poor brethren, six poor sisters, twelve poor scholars, and certain servants, all which persons were to be in-members dwelling within the college, and certain servants, who were not to be entertained as in-members, but to be servants at large. And moreover, that there should be, as the statutes ordained, six assistants and thirty poor people, pensioners of the college, who were to be out-members. And the orders contained several regulations respecting the master, warden, and fellows, the chapel, the school, the estates, and the disposition of the revenues. The ordinances were en-[260]-forced by injunction of the archbishop, dated the 9th of October 1667.

In the month of December 1724 William Wake, the then Archbishop of Canterbury, made various orders respecting the school and other matters; and the 17th Order, after reciting it to be very clear that the founder never had any power or authority in law to appoint any such assistants (as were mentioned in the statutes) at all, or to enlarge the number of his fellows beyond four, so that what was done by him in that respect was contrary both to the charter of incorporation and deed of uses, nevertheless, out of regard to what was done by him, and for the other reasons in the order mentioned, the visitor, as far as it was competent to him, allowed that three churchwardens might continue to act as assistants, and have the usual allowances, in proportion, out of the revenue belonging to the foundation.

It appeared that the churchwardens were not satisfied with this injunction, and instead of complying with it, threatened legal proceedings to compel the college to admit them to act as they had before done; and this being communicated to the visitor, he made an order, dated the 1st of February 1726, to the effect, that being not willing to engage them in the trouble and charge of law, he left the college at liberty, notwithstanding the injunction, if they should think it more for the benefit of the society, to admit the whole number of assistants to discharge the trusts committed to them by the statutes, and to receive the usual allowances for the same; though the visitor was still of opinion, that the founder did not intend that their number should be so great as to equal, and in some cases to overbalance, the whole foundation, and that he had no power to appoint any allowances to be made to them, any more than to the [261] junior fellows, out of the revenues before settled upon the college, and that therefore what was done in pursuance of any such appointment, was done in manifest diminution of the just rights and interests of the same.

Some time after the date of this order, the Attorney-General, at the relation of Samuel Higgs and others, filed an information against the college and the Archbishop of Canterbury, stating, that the churchwardens of the three parishes had been prevented from acting as assistants to the members of the college, and praying that they might be restored to the office of assistants to the college, and to the exercise and enjoyment of the powers given by the statutes. On the 4th of April 1728 Lord King, by his decree, declared that the founder could not, by his ordinances and statutes of the 29th of September 1626, add any persons to the corporation, or make any new person a member of the body corporate; but that he could appoint assistants to the corporation. And he therefore ordered, that the churchwardens and their successors should be admitted to be assistants to the corporation, according to the ordinances, and be quieted in the possession thereof; but the order was to be without prejudice to the archbishop's right of visitation, or of any application to be made to him, to correct, alter, or amend any of the said ordinances, or to any correction, alteration, or amendment that the archbishop might lawfully make or ordain.

After this decree, and by an order made by the archbishop on the 22d of January 1729, it appears that both the college and the churchwardens were desirous that the alleged obligation of the college to pay the pensions to the churchwardens, for the use of the poor of their respective parishes, should be legally deter-[262]-mined and in order that the college might be at liberty to try the question, as if the order of the Archbishop Sheldon had not been made, the then archbishop (Wake) suspended the same order. But the question was not tried, and the order has not since been acted upon. The non-payment of any pension to the out-members appears to have been acquiesced in up to the time when the Commissioners concerning charities made their report, under the 1 & 2 W. 4, c. 34, in which they suggested, that the present members of the college were receiving a larger share of its surplus annual income than was given by the statutes, or intended by the founder; and submitted to the consideration of the Attorney-General, whether the opinion of a Court of Equity should not be taken, on the propriety of extending the charity to such a degree, and in such a manner, as might be deemed most expedient.

The present information was filed by the Attorney-General, in the month of June 1836, under the 2 W. 4, c. 57, ex officio and without a relator; and it alleged, first, that the thirty members, referred to in the ordinances, were essential to the existence of the corporation; and that their rights were not bound by the decree of Lord King, pronounced in the year 1728; 2dly, That the revenues of the college had greatly increased (NOTE.—The gross revenue was now about £8000), and the share of each member, so greatly exceeded the benefits contemplated by the founder, so as to be inconsistent with the real objects of the founder's bounty; and that some alteration ought to be made, either in the maintenance to be afforded to the poor brethren and sisters, or in the rules, now in force, for their election: 3dly, That not only were the shares of the several members greater than was intended by the founder, but, reason of the [263] shares provided by the founder for the six chaunters and the members, being withheld from them, and divided between the other members of the college, such other members not only received more than they were intended to receive, but something which they were expressly intended not to receive. And was further charged, that the interests of the twelve poor scholars had been greatly neglected: that large balances of the college funds had been occasionally kept in hand by the warden: and that, under such circumstances, it had become necessary and expedient, that proper directions for the regulation of the college should be given by this Court.

This information prayed, that it might be declared who were entitled to participate in the funds and revenues of the college; that the charity ought to be extended to a greater number of objects; that directions might be given for carrying into effect the charitable purposes of the funds, and for securing to the scholars of the school the benefits intended for them, and that the numbers of the scholars might be increased. That it might be referred to the Master, to inquire what alterations would be necessary in the regulations, now in force, as to the residence of the members, or otherwise to the government of the college. That directions might be given for the appropriation of the revenues according to a scheme to be settled, and that in settling such a scheme regard might be had, not only to the statutes and ordinances, but also to the intention of the founder.

It did not appear that any application had been made to the special visitor (the Archbishop of Canterbury) on the subject of the matters complained of by the information.

[264] His grace, by his answer to this information, stated "that finding, that the members of the See of Canterbury, that the practice and usage as to the administration of the said college, and the discharge of their respective duties by the several members thereof had continued during two centuries, with little or no variation, and that he had no complaint or representation brought before him as visitor, relating thereto, he had not deemed it necessary, as such visitor, to originate any proceeding for the purpose of altering the mode in which the said college had been hitherto conducted. That he was desirous, that the said college should be so regulated, that its revenues be appropriated and distributed amongst the several members thereof, in such manner as might be most to the advantage of the said charity, and might be most in conformity with the intention of the founder. And whilst he claimed to himself and succe Archbishops of Canterbury, such powers and authorities over the administration of the said college, as were, by the said letters patent, conferred upon them as visitor thereof, he was willing that any defects which might be found to exist in the administration of the said college, might be remedied and supplied, and that any new regulations for the better government thereof, in conformity with the intentions of the founder, might be introduced, by and under the direction of this honourable Court; and that he was ready to concur in all necessary proceedings to that end."

The Defendants, the master, warden, fellows, brethren, sisters, and scholars of the college, by their answer submitted, that those parts of the statutes whereby Edward Alleyn professed to appoint six chaunters or junior fellows and thirty additional members, and to give to such six chaunters and thirty additional members any portion of the revenues of the college estates, were void: that the revenues of the co-[265]-tates were duly appropriated for the benefit of the members of the college; that if any regulations were necessary, they ought to be made by the visitor; and that the interference of this Court was not required.

The case was argued by Mr. Kindersley and Mr. Blunt, in support of the information.

Mr. Pemberton, Mr. C. P. Cooper, and Mr. Teed, on behalf of the college.

Mr. Cockerell, for the Archbishop of Canterbury.

Mr. Girdlestone, Mr. Turner, Mr. Jemmett, and Mr. K. Parker, for other parties.

The effect of the arguments is stated in the judgment of the Court.

July 29. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale] (after stating the circumstances of the case) said, [266] The principal points contended for, on behalf of the Attorney-General, are, first, That by the foundation, a trust was created for charitable purposes, beyond the maintenance of the college, and the objects stated in the charter; and 2dly, That the interference and authority of the Court is required, for the establishment of such internal regulations of the college, as may best contribute to promote the founder's object.

As to the first, it is argued, that the object of the trust, was not only to establish and maintain the college, but also to promote and carry into effect other charitable purposes, by means of the college: that a portion of the revenues was not intended to be applied for the benefit of the members of the first foundation, but for the benefit of other objects of the testator's bounty; and that such portion of the revenues ought, in execution of the trust, to be applied by the corporation for the benefit of those other objects. It is admitted, in argument, that the founder could not alter the corporation, or engraft new members upon it; but it is insisted upon, that there was a trust to maintain the thirty persons who were intended to be members, or poor men and women who were not, or could not be made members of the corporation; and that this Court ought to execute that trust, and approve of a scheme for that purpose, and for the regulation of the school. If there be any such trust it ought to be executed here; but the letters patent authorised Edward Alleyn, for the maintenance of poor men, women, and children to found a college, to consist of certain specified persons only; and it is manifest, that they were the poor men, women, and children to be maintained, and the poor children to be educated; the generality of the first expression is limited by the description and enumeration which immediately follows.

[267] Pursuant to the licence, the college, consisting of the persons so described and enumerated, was established. The corporate body, thus established, became entitled to acquire property, pursuant to the licence; and the founder conveyed the lands mentioned in the licence, to the sole and only use of the master, warden, four fellows, six poor brethren, six poor sisters, and twelve scholars, and their successors, and to and for no other intent and purpose whatsoever. And I am of opinion that the college, being thus established and endowed, pursuant to the licence, the founder was not entitled, by statutes purporting to be made under the licence, or by will, to make any alteration in the constitution of the college, or to divert the revenues of the estates, with which he had endowed the college, to any other purpose. The lands were conveyed to the use of the college, and it was not competent to the founder, afterwards, to subject the same lands to any trust for other persons or purposes. The object of the foundation was to maintain, educate, and govern the specified and enumerated members of the college, according to such ordinances as should be made. The endowment was for the sole use of the same members, and the ordinances, purporting to direct the application of any part of the revenues to other purposes, were invalid. After the endowment, the founder was no longer owner of the property:—no longer at liberty to change his intention;—having devoted the property to one purpose, the wish which he seems to have entertained (when he made the statutes and his will) could not be accomplished; and the Attorney-General or the churchwardens of the parishes cannot successfully allege, that the college or the members of the college, have something which they were not intended to have, because they are entitled, under the endowment, to something which the founder [268] afterwards, and when it was too late, desired, but had not the power to take from them.

I am of opinion that no trust was created, either for the persons whom the founder desired to make members, or for the purposes of general charity. What was given by the endowment was given for the use of the college, and for no other use; and except for the education of the poor scholars, no specific duties were imposed upon the members of the corporation. If additional property had been given to the college by the testator's will, the question whether such additional property was accepted, or made subject to any particular trust would have arisen; but it does not appear that the college received anything under the will.

The other question is, whether there is any such abuse in the internal regulation of the college, or in the distribution or application of its revenues, as to make it necessary or proper for the Court to interfere; and I am of opinion that there is not. There is a special visitor appointed by the founder, and, looking at the several charges contained in the information, it does not appear to me that there is anything complained of, which may not (even if the complaint be well founded) be regulated by the visitor, who does not refuse to act for himself, although he is willing to concur in all necessary proceedings for introducing such regulations as this Court may direct.

At the hearing of the information, a question was raised, whether, having regard to the nature of the case, the alleged grounds of complaint, and the relief asked, the Attorney-General had authority to sue in the form here adopted. It is unnecessary for me to give any opinion upon that question, because, as it appears to me [269] that there is no trust to be executed in this Court, and no occasion to resort to this Court for internal regulation of the charity, this information, independently of the question of authority, must be dismissed.

[269] PAGE v. ADAM. March 11, 13, July 30, 1841.

A testator gave his real and personal estate to A., subject to the payment of his debts and certain annuities, and appointed him executor. Held, that A. could make a good title to the real estate, without the concurrence of the annuitants, and that a purchaser from A. was not bound to see to the application of the purchase-money. Held, also, that the objection was one of title, and not of conveyance.

Freehold and leasehold estate was devised to A., subject to the payment of debts and annuities. A. sold the real estate. The purchaser insisting that the annuitants ought to concur, filed a bill against the vendor for a specific performance. The vendor's answer admitted the sufficiency of the personal estate to pay the debts:—that they had all been paid since the contract, and that the sale had not been made for the specific purpose of satisfying the debts. Held, that these circumstances did not vary the rule as to the liability of the purchaser to see to the application of the purchase-money, and that he was bound to complete.

By conditions of sale, all objections to the title were to be taken within twenty-eight days from the delivery of the abstract, which, if not removed within fourteen days, the vendor was to be at liberty to annul the contract, on payment of the deposit, but without costs. The purchaser having made an objection which was not removed, the vendor gave notice to annul the contract. The objection being held valid, the Court considered the vendor entitled to avail himself of the condition; but was of opinion that if, in giving the notice to annul, the Defendant had sought improperly to escape from the performance of a duty which, by the nature of the contract, he was bound to perform, it would have been invalid.

This was a bill for specific performance, filed by a purchaser against Sir Charles Adam, the vendor.

Sir C. Adam claimed under the will of his brother William G. Adam, Esq., the late Accountant-General, by which he gave and devised to the Defendant, "but under the burdens and payments thereafter imposed and directed to be made," all his real and personal estate; and he proceeded as follows:—"And it is hereby expressly declared that these presents are granted, with and under the burdens and conditions following, [270] viz.: 1st. That the said Sir C. Adam and his foresaids shall pay all my just and lawful debts and funeral expenses, and all such gifts and legacies as I have hereby made or left, or may make or leave by any deed or other writing expressive of my meaning.

2dly. *That the said Sir Charles Adam shall pay to Mary Eliza Loch, daughter of William Loch of the Bengal Civil Service, deceased, an annuity of £300, to be paid quarterly for the term of her life, and to be secured in manner hereinafter directed, unless, upon being married, she shall prefer (the preference to be declared or written six months after her marriage by writing signed by herself) to give up the annuity, and to take instead the sum of £4000, to be settled upon her marriage, as hereinafter directed, in which case the said annuity shall cease; but so long as the said annuity shall continue, it shall be paid to her for her sole and separate use, and free from the debts and jus mariti of her husband, and shall be secured, in such manner as the said Sir C. Adam and his foresaids, with the advice of James and John Loch, the said Mary Eliza Loch's uncles, or the survivor of them shall think best. And if the said Mary Eliza Loch shall elect to have the sum of £4000, in lieu of the annuity of £300, it is my will and intention that that sum shall be settled upon her marriage as follows: The principal to be vested in trustees, and the interest to be paid to the said Mary Eliza Loch during her life, for her sole and separate use, and free from the debts and jus mariti of her husband; and after her death to her husband during his life; after the death of them and the survivor of them, the principal to be held by the trustees for the benefit of the children of the marriage, in equal shares, who, being sons, shall attain the age of twenty-one, or, being daughters, shall attain that age or be married: unless [271] there be but one child, in which case the said sum of £4000 shall be reduced to £3000, the £1000 becoming part of the residue of my estate: the interest, until payment of the principal, to be paid to the children in equal portions. My object is to provide for the said Mary Eliza Loch, her husband, and her children; but if she should not have any children, or they should all die under the age of twenty-one years, being sons, or under the age of twenty-one and unmarried, being daughters, then I mean the money to revert to my own immediate family. And I direct the settlement, if any, to be made in such manner and form, and the money to be secured, till paid, in such manner as my said brother Charles, after advising with James Loch and John Loch, or the survivor, shall think best; in the belief that it will be more agreeable to my said brother Charles to have their assistance: but I wish his convenience and the state of his affairs to be consulted, knowing that he will do everything to carry my wishes into effect. And I should recommend the settlement to contain the provisions usually in English marriage settlements of this sort; but I leave this to my said brother Charles, as knowing my objects and wishes, and not bestowing any power upon any other person or upon any Court of law or Equity to interfere in any respect.*

3dly. That the said Sir Charles Adam shall pay an annuity of £200 to my said four unmarried nieces, Clementina, Louisa, Mary, and Jane, to be paid to them quarterly, so long as they live and are unmarried, in equal portions; and in the event of any of them being married, or dying, her share to be paid to those remaining unmarried, in equal portions, and the whole to the unmarried survivor. The annuity to be secured in such way as the said Sir C. Adam and his forebears shall think best, knowing that he will take care that it be done effectually.

[272] 4thly. That the said Sir Charles Adam shall pay an annuity of £18, 3s. to Mrs. Jane Burt." The testator appointed Sir C. Adam his sole and universal legatee.

The testator died in 1839; and the Defendant, Sir C. Adam, who was his brother and heir at law, proved his will.

In July 1839 the Defendant advertised certain lands, forming part of the real estate of the testator, to be sold by auction in three lots, subject to several conditions, of which the fifth was as follows:—"The vendor shall, within ten days from the day of sale, at his expense, prepare and deliver to each purchaser, or his or her solicitor, an abstract of title to the lot or lots purchased by him or her; and the purchaser to whom or to whose solicitor such abstract shall be delivered, shall, within twenty-eight days next after the delivery of the abstract, state in writing and transmit to the solicitors of the vendor, all his or her objections (except such as he or she is precluded by these particulars and conditions of sale from taking) to the title shewn by such abstract, and all requisitions in respect thereof; and such title shall be considered as approved of in all other respects. Any purchaser failing or neglecting to state or transmit his or her objections and requisitions, within the time and in the manner aforesaid, shall be deemed to have absolutely accepted the title to the lot or lots sold to him or her, and to be precluded from objecting thereto; and if any such objections are made, and not removed within fourteen days after the expiration of the twenty-eight days herein named, that then, or at any time thereafter, the vendor shall be at full liberty (by notice in writing to be delivered to any purchaser or his or her solicitor) to annul and put an end to his or her contract for sale; and in such case the vendor shall, [273] within one week after the delivery of such notice, repay to any purchaser his or her deposit money, with interest at the rate of 4 per cent. per annum, with the auction duty paid by such purchaser, but without costs."

The sixth condition was as follows:—"The vendor shall make and execute, and procure to be made and executed, by all proper parties, all deeds of conveyance, surrenders, assignments of terms, and other deeds, which may be necessary or usual for vesting the premises in any purchaser at this sale, or as he or she may appoint, on the same being tendered to him for the purpose. At which conveyances, surrenders, assignments, copies of court roll, and other deeds, are to be prepared by, and made at the expense of, each purchaser; and the vendor shall not be called upon to shew any prior title to the leasehold part of the estate than the lease or leases under which the same is held."

The sale took place, according to the advertisement, on the 26th of July 1839. The Plaintiff became the purchaser of Lot 3, at the price of £760, and paid a deposit of £152, and his share of the auction duty.

The abstract of the title was delivered on the 2d of August, and it then appeared, that the estate had belonged to Mr. William George Adam; who by his will had devised it to his brother the Defendant, subject to the payment of his debts and of certain annuities as before stated.

The Defendant, being the brother and heir at law of the testator, was supposed to be also his copyhold heir, and had applied for admission as such.

The abstract was returned in due time, and, amongst other observations and questions, was the following:—[274] "The will gives the property charged with debts, annuities, and legacies. Satisfactory evidence must be given of their discharge."

Answers to the queries were returned; and some observations being made on the answers, Messrs. Wing and Twining, [the solicitors of the vendor, on the 28th of August 1839, after replying to other observations, expressed themselves as follows:—"As to the release of the annuities, &c., being the only other point mentioned in your letter, we cannot have the least objection to your taking the opinion of counsel, as you propose; but we think it only fair to tell you that Sir Charles Adam will put an end to the contract when the proper time arrives, if your client is not previously satisfied with the title; but in order to satisfy you that Sir Charles Adam has no improper wish to do so, we beg to send you, by his desire, an extract from the opinions of Mr. Walters, the conveyancer, on this point, taken by the solicitor of Mr. Sams, and upon which Mr. Sams has long since paid the whole of his purchase-money."

The Plaintiff's solicitor afterwards expressed himself satisfied with the answer and explanations given, except as to the annuities charged by the will. As to this, he insisted upon the Plaintiff's right to have the annuities discharged, or released; and he further insisted, that the Defendant had not, according to the conditions, any right to put an end to the contract. The parties unfortunately differed upon both these points. Drafts of conveyance and of release of the annuities were prepared on the behalf of the Plaintiff, but the Defendant refused to acknowledge the Plaintiff's right to the releases, and in the end gave notice of his intention to annul the contract under the conditions, and tendered the deposit and auction duty to the Plaintiff. On the 3d of [275] February 1840 this bill was filed for a specific performance of the agreement.

The bill prayed for a specific performance by the Defendant, by executing the conveyance, and by procuring the execution of a deed by all necessary parties, for releasing the lands from the annuities.

The answer admitted that the personal estate of the testator was more than sufficient to pay his debts, which had then been all paid, though they had not been paid at the time of the sale. It also stated that the sale had not been made for the specific purpose of satisfying any debts, but generally for the purpose of enabling him to carry out the intentions of the testator.

One of the annuitants was under age.

The defence was, first, that the contract had been annulled; secondly, that the Plaintiff had no right to require the concurrence of the annuitants; and, thirdly, that the Defendant had no power to compel them to concur.

Mr. Pemberton, Mr. George Turner, and Mr. Miller, for the Plaintiff. The first defence made by the vendor amounts to this: that if the purchaser makes any acquisition, however reasonable, and the vendor neglects to comply, the latter acquires a right, in consequence of his own neglect, to annul the contract, without payment of any of the costs incurred by the purchaser in the investigation of the title; in other words, it is to be a contract binding on a purchaser, but from which the vendor may at any moment he pleases relieve himself. Courts of Justice [276] will, however, deal with the language of such conditions of sale, and do violence to it in order to make them consistent with common sense and justice. In Roberts v. Watt (2 Taunton, 268), an action of trover was brought by a purchaser against the solicitor of the vendor for an abstract; this had been sent to the purchaser, who having taken an opinion thereon, had returned it with the objections to the vendors' solicitor; the latter stated that he was unable to clear up the objections of the purchaser's counsel, and refused to deliver the abstract, though the purchaser offered to take such title as the Defendant could make. One of the objections to the action was, that the contract was at an end under a proviso, "that in case the vendors could not deduce a good and marketable title, such as the purchaser or his counsel should approve, or if the purchaser should not pay the purchase-money on the appointed day, the agreement should be utterly void." Sir James Mansfield there observed, "The Defendant still says, I cannot answer this objection of Mr. Humphreys, and the whole transaction is at an end; but that is not so: if the Plaintiff had said the thing is over, the matter might be rescinded. But what says the Defendant? I cannot answer the objections. In equity, such an answer will not suffice; otherwise a seller who had altered his mind, might very easily get rid of a contract; but the Courts of equity say he shall answer on oath first in his answer to a bill filed against him, then on examination before a Master whether a title cannot be made; the Courts often make a way to obviate apparent difficulties, and compel the seller to procure conveyances in order to complete his title: and the Defendant's declaration that he rescinds the contract, will not at all defeat the purchaser's right:" and Lawrence J. concurred, saying, "I am of the opinion upon the [277] construction of the proviso: it would be a monstrous construction, if either party could vitiate the agreement by refusing to perform his part of it." Southby v. Hutt (2 Myl. & Cr. 207), Tanner v. Smith (10 Simons, 410), Rippingall v. Lloyd (2 Nev. & M. 410).

The Defendant cannot be allowed to take advantage of his own wrong to defeat his contract. Rede v. Farr (6 M. & Sel. 121). The real meaning of the expression in the fifth condition, if any objection be not removed, is, if it cannot be removed. The Defendant cannot annul the contract under the fifth condition, for the objection is not one of title, but of conveyance: Maddock Ch. Pr. (2d ed. p. 140), Lewis v. Lazen (1 Mer. 179); and, therefore, falls within the sixth condition. A further objection is that this advantage should be taken of the condition at the earliest moment. The objection ought to have been insisted on in August, and not in the following month of January. Sir John Leach decided in Minchin v. Nance (reported 4 Beav. 332, on another point) that you cannot put an end to a contract under such a condition, except at the first moment, and that after permitting the other party to proceed, you cannot turn round and say, "now I will put an end to the contract."

The second objection is the one of the greatest importance, namely, whether, where there is a general charge of debts and annuities on the real estate, the trustee, by a sale of the estate, when quite unnecessary for the payment of the debts, can altogether defeat the annuitants. If such be held to be the law, the consequence will be (now that by the 3 & 4 W. 4, c. 104, the real estate is in all cases liable to debts), that in no case can an annuity be secured on real estate by a testator.

[278] We admit that in respect to general legacies the rule is so; but there is a great distinction between the case of legacies and that of annuities. A legatee may at once file his bill to have his legacy raised, and his bill being on the file he is safe; but an annuitant has no such power so long as there are no arrears of his annuity. The distinction is pointed out in Elliot v. Merryman (Barnardiston, 82). There the Court said, "The only objection, that seemed to be of weight with regard to this matter, is, that where lands are appointed to be sold for the payments of debts generally, the trust may be said to be performed as soon as those lands are sold; but where they are only charged with the payment of debts, it may be said that the trust is not performed till those debts are discharged. And so far indeed is true, that where lands are charged with the payment of annuities, those lands will be charged in the hands of the purchaser, because it was the very purpose of making the lands a fund for that payment, that it should be a constant and subsisting fund; but where lands are not burdened with such a subsisting charge, the purchaser ought not to be bound to look to the application of the money: and that seems to be the true distinction." In Wynn v. Williams (5 Ves. 130) real estate was charged with debts, and legacies, and an annuity to the widow, and the Court directed an account of the annuity against a purchaser for valuable consideration of the estate, and declared it a charge thereon. A passage in Sugden's Vendors (vol. 2, p. 39, 9th ed.) is relied on by both parties, a quære having been added in the last edition. In Omerod v. Hartman (5 Ves. 722), there was a trust for payment of debts, legacies, and annuities; no distinction was taken between legacies and annuities; but a bill for specific performance was dismissed on the ground [279] that it was not possible for one of the cestui que trusts being a lunatic to see the purchase-money applied. It must, however, be admitted that Lord Eldon did not altogether approve of that decision.

It is not, however, necessary to enter into that question, for here it is admitted that the estate was not sold for payment of the debts, and the purchaser has express notice of that fact, and, therefore, the trust for payment of debts confers no protection to him; Bonney v. Ridgard (1 Cox, 145), Watkins v. Cheek (2 Sim. & St. 199). In Johnson v. Kennett (6 Sim. 390), overruled on other grounds (3 Myl. & K. 624), the Defendant sold in his character of heir and not as trustee.

Thirdly. The Defendant can compel the annuitants to join, upon his securing their annuities. If there be any doubt on the point an inquiry must be directed, as in Graham v. Oliver (3 Beavan, 124), and by Sir John Leach in Minchin v. Nance (post, p. 331). As to the infant the Plaintiff will be contented to take the Defendant's indemnity.

Mr. Loftus Wigram and Mr. Loch, contra. The purchaser is bound by the conditions of sale, which are explicit, and were framed for the express purpose of preventing litigation. He cannot reject the terms of the agreement, and yet adopt the contract, of which the conditions are a part. No complaint is made of them by the bill, and no question as to their validity can now be raised. The objection, however, is one of title, and not of conveyance, the Defendant having no controul over the annuitants to compel them to concur. (See Sidebotham v. Barrington, 3 Beavan, 524, and ante, p. 110, and the cases there cited.) The [280] Plaintiff insisting on the objection, the Defendant acted rightly in annulling the contract, to avoid an expensive and useless litigation; the delay in doing so is accounted for by the correspondence, &c., which took place between the parties in the hope of adjusting their differences.

As to the second point there is no distinction between legacies and annuities: the reasoning applicable to the one, applies with equal force to the other. It is the priority of the debts, and the utter impossibility for a purchaser to see to their payment, which renders it unnecessary for him to see the subsequent charge of legacies or annuities satisfied, or to see to the application of his purchase-money. Suppose a legacy were payable at the end of a year, it is admitted that the legatee would not be a necessary party to a conveyance to a purchaser. If the legatee were to have an additional legacy at the end of two years, the same rule would prevail; and so if he had a succession of annual legacies, or what is equivalent, a legacy.

The expression in Elliot v. Merryman is obscure. It may apply to a case where there is no charge of debts. But it is clear that the question as to annuities never arose in that case, and the point was never decided. Lord Eldon in Jenkins v. Hiles (6 Ves. 646), expressly disapproves of the decision in Omerod v. Hardman, which was plainly wrong, and in a note to that case (6 Ves. 654), it is said, "The Lord Chancellor during the argument observed upon that case, that the Court were mistaken in supposing the purchaser had anything to do with the annuity to the lunatic, the legacy of £400, &c. If that was so, his Lordship said he should agree with the judgment: but it was long settled, that where a man by [281] deed or will charges or orders an estate to be sold for payment of debts generally, and then makes specific dispositions, the purchaser is not bound to see to the application: it is just the same as if the specific bequests were out of the will. The case under consideration would shake that rule: the trustees had the legal estate under the deed; and the trust was to sell for payment of debts generally. They were therefore enabled to make a title to the purchaser, who was not bound to see to the payment of the legacy the annuity," &c.

Lord Eldon's opinion, therefore, clearly was, that there was no distinction between annuities and legacies in this respect. If it were otherwise, a suit in equity would, in every case where annuities were also charged, be necessary to obtain payment of debts charged on lands. Both in Johnson v. Kennett and Eland v. Eland (1 Beavan, 235, and 4 Myl. & Cr. 421) there were annuities, yet the distinction was never thought of.

The debts were not paid at the time of the sale, and the circumstances and situation of the personal estate might have been such as to justify the sale of the real estate. The validity of the contract depends on the circumstances existing at the time of the sale.

[THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS. The Plaintiff has now notice that the debts have been paid, and he has not yet paid his purchase-money; would he not be liable to the annuitants if he were now to pay it to the Defendant?]

It is the Plaintiff's own fault, he might have had a good title, but by his delay, and by raising untenable points, he has himself created the difficulty which he cannot now be permitted to take advantage of.

[282] It might be argued that there is no charge of the annuities, but merely a personal liability on the part of the Defendant to pay them. Messenger v. Andrews (4 Russ. 478), Spackman v. Timbrell (8 Simons, 253).

The Defendant cannot compel the annuitants to join; any enquiry on the point would be useless, for one is an infant; and the Plaintiff is not, in the absence of a contract to that effect, entitled to an indemnity. Aylett v. Ashton (1 Myl. & Cr. 105).

Shaw v. Borrer (1 Keen, 559), Braithwaite v. Britain (1 Keen, 206); Horn v. Horn (2 Sim. & St. 449), Costigan v. Hastler (2 Sch. & Lef. 160), were also cited during the argument.

Mr. Pemberton, in reply.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS reserved his judgment.

July 30. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. The only question before the Defendant's notice of annulling the contract, was, whether the concurrence of the annuitants, or a release from them, was necessary to give a safe title to the purchaser.

The will of Mr. Adam charged the whole of his estate with the payment of his debts, and also with the payment of the annuities given by his will.

It is admitted that if the will had charged the real estate with the payment of his debts and pecuniary [283] legacies only, the purchaser would, in the absence of special circumstances, have been exonerated from any liability in respect of the application of the purchase-money; but it is said, first, that there are special circumstances, tending to shew that a sale of the estate was not required for the payment of debts; and, secondly, that annuity legacies are different from others, and being intended to continue a charge on the estate, the lands must be liable in the hands of a purchaser. I do not think that there are in this case any special circumstances to take the case out of the common rule. The rule, as to the exoneration of the purchaser from liability to look to the application of the purchase-money, was stated by Lord Lyndhurst (3 M. & K. 631) to be applicable to the state of things at the time of the testator's death; and the particular arrangements which may be made by the executor for the payment of the debts, the time when they may be paid, or the fund out of which they may, in the first instance, be paid, do not appear to me to vary the effect of the rule. The question therefore is, whether annuity legacies are subject to different considerations from mere pecuniary legacies. When an annuity is charged on land, and there is no devise for the payment of debts, and no general charge of debts, it must be deemed that the land was intended to be a constant and subsisting security for the payment of the annuity. But in the case of Elliot v. Merryman (Barnardiston, 82), where an expression to that effect is used, it was not considered, and the case did not require it to be considered, whether, in a case in which both debts and annuities were charged, the lands would be charged with the annuities, in the hands of a purchaser from the person whose duty it was to sell for payment of debts; and the opinion of Lord Eldon, as stated in the note to [284] Jenkins v. Hiles (6 Vesey, 654, n.), is, "that where a man by deed or will charges or orders an estate to be sold for payment of debts generally, and then makes specific dispositions, the purchaser is not bound to see to the application of the purchase-money. It is just the same as if the specific bequests were out of the will." Seeing no reason to differ from this opinion, and conceiving that an annuity legacy charged on the estate is, in the sense here used, a specific disposition, subject to the payment of debts, I do not think that the rule ought to be departed from, by reason of the nature of the legacy. The reason on which the rule is founded operates precisely in the same manner, whether the legacies are of annuities or of sums of money; and it would occasion very great inconvenience, if no sale of estates, for payment of debts charged thereon, could take place without the authority of a Court of Equity, if the author of the charge for payment of debts, had also charged the estate with payment of legacies in the form of annuities. There are one or two cases, Johnson v. Kennett (3 Myl. & K. 627), Eland v. Eland (1 Beavan, 241), in which legacies of annuities have not been distinguished from other legacies; but as the point was not raised in those cases, I think they are not to be relied on as authorities on the present occasion. But it appears to me, that, on principle, and for this purpose, there is no substantial difference between the two kinds of legacy. The charge of debts is general, the amount is indefinite, and may exceed the whole value of the estate; it is the first duty of the executor, and of the devisee of the estate which is subject to the charge, to pay the debts; and for that purpose he is entitled to sell; if he sells, something or nothing may be left to secure payment of the annuities. The purchaser [285] seems to have nothing to do with this; he cannot know or ascertain the amount of debts, and cannot, if he would, protect the annuitant;—his title is derived under an authority or right to sell for payment of debts;—a purpose which is paramount to the payment of annuities, and in respect of debts he is not bound to enquire. There may be cases, in which the land being charged with debts, and legacies by way of annuity, the annuitants may refuse to accept any substitute, as a security in lieu of the land charged; but the annuitant being a mere volunteer under the will, can only take subject to the charge for debts: he cannot prevent the loss or diminution of his security upon the land charged, when a sale is required for the payment of debts; and I think, that the purchaser is not called upon to inquire, whether the executors and devisees act properly, when they sell the estate; and that it is not incumbent on him to look to the application of the purchase-money. On the whole, therefore, it appears to me, that in order to shew a good title or to procure a valid conveyance, the Defendant was under no obligation to procure the concurrence of, or to obtain releases from, the annuitants under the will of the testator, whose estate was the subject of sale.

And it appearing that the Defendant had done all which was incumbent on him to do, for the purpose of shewing a good title, and that the Plaintiff persevered in requiring something more, which the Defendant was not bound to do, I think that the Defendant did not, unreasonably, avail himself of the means which the conditions afforded him of putting an end to the contract.

I think that the question was, as it was treated by the parties, a question of title, and not a question of [286] conveyance; and I should have thought the notice to annul the contract invalid, if, in giving it, the Defendant had sought improperly to escape from the performance of a duty which, by the nature of the contract, he was bound to perform; but the case is very different, being in fact, as it appears, an attempt on the part of the purchaser to compel the Defendant to do more than was required by his duty under the contract.

As the Defendant gave his notice to annul the contract, only because the Plaintiff insisted upon a release from the annuities, and as the Plaintiff has, at the Bar, expressed his desire to have a specific performance of the agreement even in the case of the question as to the annuities being determined against him, it may be that both parties may now be desirous that the purchase should be completed under the direction of this Court.

If they are not, I think that the bill must be dismissed with costs.

[287] FRAMPTON v. FRAMPTON. April 22, 23, July 30, 1841.

A deed of separation between husband and wife, containing no covenant on the part of a trustee to indemnify the husband, or other valuable consideration, is not on that account void.

On the separation between a husband and wife, the former by deed made between himself, his wife, and trustees, assigned the dividends of some funds standing in the names of trustees to other trustees, for the benefit of the wife, and he covenanted that she might live apart from him, &c.; and the wife agreed to accept the provision in lieu of alimony, dower, &c.; and to exonerate her husband from all her debts, and to forfeit her rights under the deed if she violated the agreement. The deed contained no covenant on the part of the trustees, and was supported by no further consideration. Held, that the deed was not invalid, and that the wife was entitled to the provision made for her by the deed.

This bill was filed by Elizabeth Frampton, praying to have the benefit of a deed, dated the 16th day of August 1824, executed by her late husband, James A. Frampton on the occasion of a separation between them. The bill was filed against William H. Frampton, the legal personal representatives of James A. Frampton, and the surviving trustee of the deed. The facts were as follows:—

The Plaintiff, before her marriage with the late Mr. Frampton, was entitled under the will of Wm. White to a sum of £19,000 3 per cent. consols, and to a sum of £1000 East India stock, which were standing in the names of John Edmondson and Wm. Calvert, on trust to pay the dividends to her for life, with remainder to her issue. She had sold out the sum of £1900, part of the £19,000 3 per cent. consols, for a specific purpose, and the retransfer of it was secured to Edmondson and Calvert, by a policy of insurance on her life for £1500.

Before her marriage the Plaintiff, by deed dated the 16th of October 1816, assigned her interests in the stocks to Mr. Frampton, her intended husband; and in a few days after the marriage, viz., on the 22d October 1816, Mr. Frampton executed a deed-poll, whereby it was purported, that he covenanted with Edmondson and Calvert, that if he should die in the lifetime of the Plaintiff, and there should be failure of issue, Edmondson and [288] Calvert should stand possessed of the stocks, on trust for the Plaintiff for her life; and after her death, on trust for her executors, administrators, and assigns.

Differences having afterwards arisen between Mr. and Mrs. Frampton, they agreed to live separate from each other; and they executed an indenture dated 16th August 1824, and Edmondson the trustee being dead, the indenture was made between Mr. Frampton the husband of the first part; the Plaintiff, Mrs. Frampton, of the second part; James Marshall, and the Defendant William Frampton, of the third part; and Wm. Calvert of the fourth part. And, thereby, Mr. and Mrs. Frampton assigned to Marshall and the Defendant, the dividends of the stocks then standing in the names of Edmondson and Calvert, and also the dividends to arise on the £1900, if the same should be retransferred in the lifetime of Mrs. Frampton, subject to the annual premium of £47, 11s. 3d., payable on the policy for £1500; to hold and receive the same on trust during the joint lives of Mr. and Mrs. Frampton, to pay to Mrs. Frampton the annual sum of £300; and to invest the surplus in the purchase of stock, in the names of Marshall and the Defendant, and accumulate the same, and stand possessed of the accumulations, on trust to pay the interest thereof to Mrs. Frampton, in addition to her annuity of £300; and if Mr. Frampton should die in her lifetime, on trust to transfer to her the principal of such accumulations. The deed contained a proviso, that if Calvert should require the £1900 to be retransferred, the accumulations might be made answerable for that purpose, under the arrangement therein mentioned. Mr. Frampton covenanted that Mrs. Frampton might live apart from him, and dispose of any goods, property, and effects which she might acquire during the separation; and that he would do all acts to enable Marshall [289] and the Defendant to receive the dividends of the stocks; and that if they should be prevented from receiving the dividends, Mr. Frampton would, himself, pay the annuity of £300 to the trustees of Mrs. Frampton. And Mrs. Frampton agreed to accept the provision thereby made for her, in lieu of alimony, dower, or any other claim on Mr. Frampton; and to exonerate him from all debts, charges, and incumbrances to be contracted by her, and not in any way to disturb him; and that if she violated the agreement, she should forfeit her right to the accumulations, which, in that case, were to become the property of Mr. Frampton; and if he should be prosecuted for any debts contracted by her, the trustees were empowered to deduct the amount out of the annuity and pay the same to Mr. Frampton.

From the date of the deed, Mr. and Mrs. Frampton lived apart from one another. Mrs. Frampton did not, in any manner, infringe the agreement. Mr. Frampton paid to her an annuity of £300, and after 1829 some additional sums of money; but, in other respects, the deed was not strictly acted upon. The trustees did not interfere; the income arising from the stocks was paid to the account of Mr. Frampton at his bankers, and he made no investment of the surplus which remained after payments of the sums which he paid to Mrs. Frampton.

Although living apart, Mr. and Mrs. Frampton appeared to have entertained no feelings of enmity towards each other. After a lapse of some years they corresponded together, and the correspondence shewed that each of them had a desire to contribute to the comfort of the other. Mr. Frampton offered to make additions to the income, in language, from which it might be inferred, that she was not entitled to it; and [290] she expressed herself to be grateful to him for the additions which he made, and for other marks of attention shewn to her by him.

There was no issue of the marriage, and no investment had been made of the surplus dividends.

Marshall, the co-trustee of the Defendant, died in 1832.

Mr. Frampton died in September 1836, and the Defendant was his legal personal representative, as well as surviving trustee of the deed of 1824. The Defendant, however, having never acted in the trust, was ignorant of everything which had taken place in relation to it. The Plaintiff having required performance of the trusts of the deed, and the Defendant not feeling himself at liberty to comply with her requests until her demand was satisfied by a proper investigation, this bill was filed, and it prayed a declaration that the surplus dividends ought to have been invested in consols, and held on the trusts of the deed of 1824, and the dividends thereon paid to the Plaintiff. It prayed also for the proper accounts consequent on such a declaration, and for payment of what might be found due to the Plaintiff out of the estate of James A. Frampton.

It was admitted that the deeds were executed; that the subsequent correspondence took place between Mr. and Mrs. Frampton; that the dividends of the stock were received by Mr. Frampton; and that during the life of Mr. Frampton, the Plaintiff never applied to the Defendant for any account of the dividends of the stock.

The defences were, first, that the deed of separation was invalid, as being contrary to the policy of the law; [291] and, secondly, that the deed had been put an end to, by the subsequent conduct of the parties. The second objection depended principally on a series of correspondence between the husband and wife, the result of which was stated in the judgment of the Court, but which it is thought unnecessary to repeat.

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. E. F. Smith, for the Plaintiff. Whatever doubts may have been expressed by some Judges as to the policy of interfering in cases of deeds of separation between husband and wife, still they have been repeatedly supported. The difficulty generally arises in consequence of the Court being unable to enforce an agreement for a separation; here it has been performed, and the husband having received the whole benefit stipulated for on his part, ought to perform his portion of the engagement. The absence of a covenant on the part of a trustee to indemnify the husband, does not invalidate the deed; for if the deed were invalid, as contrary to the policy of the law, when it contained no such covenant, then the introduction of such a covenant could not make good that which the policy of the law condemns. The cases of Ross v. Willoughby (10 Price, 2) and Wilson v. Mushett (3 Barn. 743) are, however, express authorities that such a covenant is unnecessary. Here it is not asked to enforce any covenant against the husband or his estate; in taking the deed to be merely voluntary, then there is a valid trust created in favour of the wife, which it was not in the power of the husband to revoke. The Plaintiff now merely calls on her trustees to perform their trust. [292] She is fully entitled to the relief, the trust being complete, and there being nothing more to be done by the settlor; Collinson v. Patrick (2 Keen, 123).

The trusts of the deed have not been put an end to; the separation continued to the death of Mr. Frampton. It appears from the correspondence, that the parties entertained feelings of regard for each other; but it was not necessary that a state of hostility should exist between them, in order that the deed might continue to operate.

Mr. Stuart and Mr. Faber, contra. A contract for a separation between husband and wife is contrary to the policy of the law; and this Court will not enforce any stipulation contained in a deed executed for that purpose, unless it be supported by some other valuable consideration. The covenant of a trustee to indemnify the husband, or some other valuable consideration, has always been considered necessary to support such a deed. Here, the deed contains no such covenant, and that on the part of the wife is a mere nullity. The deed, therefore, is a simple deed of separation entered into without consideration, which this Court cannot enforce.

The trust is incomplete, and is one purely voluntary, having for its object the continuance of a separation. The trust for the benefit of the wife cannot be enforced inasmuch as the other stipulations intended for the benefit of the husband could be performed: which they plainly could not.

The trustees have never acted under the deed, and the conduct of the parties shows that a reconciliation [293] took place, and that they regarded the deed as nullity, and that the trusts had terminated. They cited Westmeath v. Salisbury (5 339), Worrall v. Jacob (3 Mer. 256), Durant v. Tiley (7 Price, 577), Durant v. Durant (2 Cox, 207), St. John v. St. John (11 Ves. 537), Bateman v. Ross (1 Dow,

Mr. Pemberton, in reply.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS reserved judgment.

July 30. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. The questions are, first, whether the deed is valid, or invalid as founded on an agreement against the policy of the law for the separation of husband and wife. And, secondly, whether if the deed were valid, it was not annulled by the waiver or abandonment of the parties.

Upon the first, it must be admitted on the one hand, that an agreement for husband and wife to live separate and apart from each other, is against the policy of the law, and will not be executed in this Court; and on the other, that contracts founded on that motive, have in numerous cases been enforced, both at law and in equity. It is in vain to regret the perplexities in which the Courts have found themselves involved, by enforcing the minor and auxiliary parts of the agreement to separate, while they profess to repudiate the principal and essential part and motive of it. It does, as Sir Wm. Grant expresses it (Worrall v. Jacob, 3 Mer. 268), seem rather strange, but has been settled that in certain cases they must do so; and [294] in this case it is, I apprehend, clear upon the authorities, that the deed now in question would have been valid if it had contained a covenant by the trustee to indemnify the husband against the debts of the wife. The principal objection made to it is, that there is no sufficient consideration, that the husband was protected only by the agreement of the wife to exonerate him from debts, and the provision, that if she violated her agreement, she should forfeit her right to the accumulations, which were, in that case, to become the property of her husband; and that he should be repaid any sums which might be recovered against him, out of the annuity of £300. It is contended, that a covenant by trustees is an essential part of a valid deed of separation; and that the want of it, in this case, necessarily makes the deed void. In the case of St. John v. St. John (11 Ves. 532), Lord Eldon seems to have considered, that this Court interfered in such cases only, upon the contract between the husband and the trustee, and the covenant of the trustee to indemnify the husband against her debts; and Lord Loughborough, in Legard v. Johnson (3 Ves. 359), expressed his opinion, that the interest of the party who bound himself to indemnify the husband against the debts of the wife, raised a consideration for that party, between whom and the husband there might be a contract to be enforced. Both Lord Loughborough and Lord Eldon expressed doubts upon the case of Guth v. Guth (3 Bro. 614); but the cases of Fitzer v. Fitzer (2 Atk. 512) and Cook v. Wiggins (10 Ves. 191) have not been overruled, and I am not aware that it has ever been decided, and no case has been adduced to shew, that without the intervention and covenant of a trustee, the husband may not voluntarily execute a deed, [295] or create a trust in favour of his wife, and that such deed or trust may not be binding as against him, even if the benefit of that deed or trust should be made dependent upon an existing or continuing separation, which was the principal, if not the only, inducement for the whole arrangement. In this case the property came from the wife. The husband had become entitled to the income during the joint lives, and he voluntarily, and without consideration, assigns the dividends and declares a trust for her; the creation of the trust being accompanied by an agreement to live separate, and a provision to forfeit or lose a portion of the beneficial interest if the agreement should be violated. Laying out of consideration the agreement of the wife, as wholly inoperative, and admitting that this Court can in no way interfere to enforce a separation; yet, considering what has been done to enforce agreements between husband and trustee, though accompanied by a provision for separation, it does not appear to me, that a voluntary assignment and declaration of trust can be vitiated by such a provision; and, without regard to any supposed contract, it would scarcely be just to say, that although a voluntary trust may be binding in other cases, it shall not be so in the case where a husband has, by creating such a trust, prevailed upon his wife to live apart from him, and waive the enforcement of her conjugal rights. And, on the whole, it appears to me, that as against the estate of the husband, this is a valid deed. I say nothing as to the effect of it between the Plaintiff and creditors of her late husband.

Conceiving the deed to be valid, I have considered the admitted facts and the correspondence, with the view to the question whether the deed was subsequently waived or abandoned.

[296] Mrs. Frampton appears to have known that the income of the trust fund was received by her husband; she received from him the annuity of £300 till 1829; in the subsequent years she received some sums of money of unequal amount in addition to the annuity. The largest additional sum was £70. If the trust had been duly performed there would have been an annual investment, and a constantly increasing income. Mrs. Frampton might therefore, from the circumstances, have concluded, that the whole income was received by Mr. Frampton; and by the non-payment to her of an increasing income, might have found reason to infer, that the trust was not duly performed; but I think, that Mr. Frampton, by receiving the income took upon himself personally the performance of the trust, to which he had made it subject; and I find nothing affording the least ground to infer, that Mrs. Frampton ever intended to waive any benefit to which she was entitled under the deed. Notwithstanding the separation, she appears to have had great confidence in Mr. Frampton, and a reliance that he would do what was right. It is true, that, independent of any intention, the conduct of the parties may be such that the law may, in analogy to the case of contracts, have put an end to the trust. I cannot say that the trust would have remained if the parties had lived together again; but however this might have been, I am of opinion, that in this case, nothing occurred which would have put an end to a contract subsisting between the husband and a trustee for the wife. The separation remained, the wife performed the species of condition imposed upon her by her husband, and although no hostility remained, and a correspondence by letter, which, under the circumstances, must be considered as creditable to both parties, took place, in the latter part of Mr. Frampton's life, there was no change in the circumstances, under which the deed was [297] executed, and no waiver or abandonment; and I am therefore of opinion, that the Plaintiff is entitled to the relief which she asks.

An account must be taken of the dividends of the trust funds received by Mr. Frampton, and of the payment thereof made to Mrs. Frampton; and there must be an inquiry what stock might have been annually purchased with the surplus of the income, and what dividends would have arisen therefrom, &c., &c.

See Moore v. Freeman, Bunb. 205; Logan v. Birkett, 1 Myl. & K. 220.

[297] ATTORNEY-GENERAL V. KERR. June 24, July 15, August 2, 1841.

[S. C. 10 L. J. Ch. 373; 5 Jur. 863. For previous proceedings, see 2 Beav. 420; 3 Beav. 425.]

Generally, the relator in a charity information is, upon obtaining a decree, entitled to his costs as between solicitor and client; and to be paid the difference between the amount thereof and that portion recovered from the Defendants, out of the charity estate. In special cases, he may be entitled to his costs, charges, and expenses. The extra costs of a charity information, instituted in respect of one only of several gifts belonging to the charity, should, in the first instance at least, fall on the property which is the subject of the information. It may happen that justice to the relator, and even the interests of the charity, might require a different provision, which would be made when the circumstances require it, but not otherwise.

This case is reported ante, 2 Beavan, 420, and 3 Beavan, 425. The information was filed with a relator to set aside a conveyance and reversionary leases of property left for the benefit of St. Thomas' Hospital, Northampton. The information having to a great extent succeeded, the Defendant, Mary Kerr, was ordered to pay certain costs, "and it was ordered that it be referred to the Master to tax and settle the costs, charges, and expenses of the relator of incidental and preparatory to these causes properly incurred, in addition [298] to the costs hereinbefore directed to be taxed and paid by the said Mary Kerr, to be paid by the trustees of the Hospital of St. Thomas for the time being, or the treasurer thereof, out of the funds belonging to the hospital." It was also thereby declared that the estate of William Kerr was entitled to compensation, for certain improvements made on the property, out of the charity estate. (3 Beavan, 427.)

These causes, on the petition of the trustees of St. Thomas' Hospital, came on to be reheard so far as related to the above costs, charges, and expenses which had already been taxed.

Mr. Bethell and Mr. Whitworth, for the trustees, contended, first, that the decree was wrong, so far as it gave the relator "the extra" costs, charges, and expenses of the relator "of incidental and preparatory to these causes properly incurred." The consequence of these words was, that although the information was filed in 1836, the bill of costs commenced three years previously, and £200 had been allowed for costs incurred prior to any relator having been found; 2dly, That these extra costs, &c., ought not to be charged on the whole property of the hospital generally, but only on the property which was the subject of the information. That as the funds of the hospital arose from various sources, and had been derived from the benevolence of various individuals, it would be most unjust to apply the funds of others, which had been devoted by the donors to charity, to the payment of costs, charges, and expenses incurred in litigation in respect of other independent property.

Mr. Pemberton, Mr. G. Turner, and Mr. O. Anderdon, contra, contended that, the costs having been taxed, it [299] was now too late to object, and that there could be no rehearing for costs; that the decree was right, and was sanctioned by authority. That in the case of The Attorney-General v. The Skinners' Company (Jacob, 630), Lord Eldon gave all parties their costs between solicitor and client, "together with any costs, charges, and expenses reasonably and properly incurred by the relators, to enable them to institute and prosecute the suit;" and in The Attorney-General v. The Corporation of Manchester (3 L. J. 64), Sir J. Leach stated "that relators in such cases were persons discharging a great public trust; that they ought to be completely indemnified, and therefore, that they ought to be allowed their costs, charges, and expenses." That on principle, it was but equitable that a party wresting charity property from a wealthy family for the benefit of a charity, should be protected against all costs. It could not be expected that parties would come forward on public grounds at their own expense, even if successful. That a charity suit formed an exception to the general rule, and that in such cases, even the heir at law was allowed his costs, charges, and expenses. [THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS. I believe that has been done. (Currie v. Pye, 17 Ves. 462).]

The charity which has the benefit of the property recovered by this information, ought to bear the expenses out of its general property; it would be more beneficial than raising the amount out of this property.

The following unreported cases relate to the question: The Attorney-General v. Trotter (M. R. 21st. Feb. 1832), The Attorney-General v. The Mayor of Dartmouth (M. R. 20th July 1832), The Attorney-General v. Hutchinson (M. R. 24th July 1832), The Attorney-General v. The [300] Mercers' Company (M. R. 27th Jan. 1833), The Attorney-General v. Corpus Christi College (V.-C. 9th March 1833), The Attorney-General v. The Goldsmiths' Company (M. R. 26th June 1833), The Attorney-General v. The Clothworkers' Company (V.-C. 24th March 1835), The Attorney-General v. Walford (9th June 1835), The Attorney-General v. The Fishmongers' Company (M. R. Jan. 1837), The Attorney-General v. St. David's (V.-C. 19th April 1838, and 15th Jan. 1839), The Attorney-General v. Harper (V.-C. 4th Feb. 1839), The Attorney-General v. Lasley (V.-C. 8th August 1839), The Attorney-General v. Nethercoat (V.-C. 29th Jan. 1841), The Attorney-General v. The Drapers' Company (M. R. 19th March 1841).

Mr. Bethell, in reply. The points complained of were not brought before the notice of the Court at the hearing. It is an important question of principle, and may therefore be set right upon a rehearing.

The treasurer of the hospital has no funds in hand to pay these costs, and if paid out of the accruing rents, the trustees will be unable to continue to perform the charitable purposes of the founders of the hospital. It is unreasonable that the charitable donation of A. should be applied in payment of the costs of a charity founded by B. The case of The Attorney-General v. Nethercoat (see 1 Hare, 400) is a strong practical instance of the effect of giving costs in such extensive terms. It was an information complaining of the mismanagement of the charity, and the Court gave an order for the sale of the charity property to pay the costs, charges, and expenses. It realised £1200, out of which costs, amounting to £1080 [301] were paid, so that the interference of the Court to protect the charity ended in its entire destruction. I brought the matter before the attention of the Court, hoping it would interfere, but was unsuccessful. Here the extra-taxed costs amount to £1043, and it is doubtful whether the property recovered, after making the allowance for improvements, will be worth it.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS observed, I have no doubt that this particular point was never brought under my attention at the first hearing; I will consider it. We are all aware of the great abuse which has been practised in these charity informations for many years past. In some cases, no doubt, they have been productive of considerable good; but in many, they have ended in the entire ruin of the charities they professed to protect.

August 2. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. These causes came on to be reheard upon that part of the decrees by which it was ordered, that the relator should have his costs, charges, and expenses, of incidental and preparatory to these causes; and that the amount of the costs, and of certain sums to be allowed to Mary Kerr, should be paid by the trustees out of the funds of the charity.

It is alleged, on the behalf of the trustees, that the relator is not entitled to such costs, charges, and expenses; and that the amount of what may be payable to the trustees ought to be paid out of the estate which is the subject of this suit, and not out of the general funds of the charity.

On the behalf of the Attorney-General and the relator it has been argued, that the relator is entitled to [302] such costs, charges, and expenses, according to the usual course and practice of the Court, and several cases in which such costs, charges, and expenses have been allowed were cited.

It appears to me, that the practice of making any such allowance is of very recent origin, and that it is not a matter of course to make it. I think that the order made by Lord Eldon in The Attorney-General v. Skinners' Company, and the order made by Sir John Leach in The Attorney-General v. Winchester, must have depended on the particular circumstances of those cases, which were of a complicated and special nature. The subject was not brought under the consideration of the Court in any of the other cases which were cited.

Sir John Leach, indeed, seems to have thought, that a relator was to be considered in some sense in the situation of a trustee; and there are several cases in which he allowed the relator his costs as between solicitor and client, and these cases are of themselves sufficient to shew that there was no general rule to allow costs, charges, and expenses. One of those cases was The Attorney-General v. Goldsmiths' Company in June 1833; and in the case of The Attorney-General v. Fishmongers' Company (1 Keen, 492), which afterwards occurred before me, I had occasion to consider, how far the relator in a charity information was entitled to costs as between solicitor and client as a right; and thinking that he was not so entitled, I thought it right, in that case, to give him his costs as between party and party only.

On considering the cases which have occurred, it appears that the relator in a charity information, where [303] there is nothing to impeach the propriety of the suit, and no special circumstances to justify a special order, is, upon obtaining a decree for the charity, entitled to his costs as between solicitor and client, and to be paid the difference between the amount of such costs and the amount of the costs which he may recover from the Defendants, out of the charity estate. (See Attorney-General v. Carte, 1 Dick. 113, and Beames on Costs, 343.)

There may be special cases in which the relator may be entitled to charges and expenses, in addition to his costs of the suit, as between solicitor and client; but it appears to me, that such cases must depend upon their peculiar circumstances, to be brought forward and established by evidence on proper occasions.

Upon the second point, I find, that there are several cases, in which the costs to be paid by the trustees of a charity, have been ordered to be paid out of the funds of the charity generally; but the trustees objecting, it appears to me more regular and proper, in the first instance at least, to charge the costs which fall upon the charity estate, on the fund recovered by the information, or on the estate which is the subject of the suit. It may happen that justice to the relator, and even the interests of the charity, may require a different provision, which would be made when the circumstances require it, but not otherwise.

I am therefore of opinion, that the decree must be varied in the two particulars complained of; and that the relator, instead of being allowed his costs, charges, and expenses, of, incidental, and preparatory to these causes, properly incurred, is only to be allowed his [304] costs of these suits as between solicitor and client; and that the costs and sums which are to be paid by the Defendants the trustees, instead of being directed to be paid out of the funds of the hospital, are to be a charge on the property which is the subject of this suit, and to be raised by sale or mortgage thereof.

Under the decree as it stood, the costs of the relator have been already taxed; and the effect of the variation now made will be to make a new taxation necessary.

The additional costs of taxation cannot be imputed to the relator alone; for although it does not appear that a claim, in conformity with the words introduced into the decree, was made to the Court (in which case it would probably have not been allowed), it was introduced into the minutes of the decree, and was well known to both sides, before the decree was settled. I think that in this respect both sides were acting in error. Whether any allowance can be made in respect of such costs, cannot be determined, either on the rehearing of the case, or on the petition, which has been presented for raising and paying the costs already taxed.

Upon that petition, I think that under the circumstances no order can be made.

[305] ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. THE DRAPERS' COMPANY. July 14, August 2, 1841.

In a charity information filed without a relator, the Attorney-General did not personally appear at the hearing, but two other counsel appeared in support of the information. Held, that the costs of a brief to the Attorney-General ought to be allowed in addition to those of the two counsel in the taxation of costs as between party and party.

Liberty given to except to the Master's report of taxation being applied for, on the ground of his disallowance of such brief, the report was referred back to the Master for review.

This was an information filed by the Attorney-General under the 2 W. 4, c. 57, without a relator.

At the hearing Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Blunt appeared in support of the information, but the Attorney-General did not personally appear. A declaration was then made against the Defendants with costs, as between party and party. (See 4 Beav. 72.)

On taxation the Master disallowed the costs of a brief given to the Attorney-General, but allowed those of the two other counsel. A petition was now presented to the Court for liberty to except to the Master's taxation on the ground of the disallowance.

Mr. Pemberton, in support of the petition.

Mr. Kindersley and Mr. Lloyd, contra, contended that the Master had come to a right conclusion on the subject; that his decision was final, and (this not being a case involving any principle) could not be reviewed. (See Alsop v. Lord Oxford, 1 Myl. & K. 564.)

That the long-settled practice upon the taxation of costs, as between solicitor and client, was to allow briefs to two counsel only, or, under special circumstances, three; Downing College case (3 Myl. & Cr. 474). That the [306] Master was therefore right in allowing only two briefs in support of the information, and in the disallowance of the brief to the Attorney-General, who did not attend the hearing, and as it appeared, never intended to do so. They argued also, that although the Attorney-General might be entitled as against the charity estate, yet that the Defendants were not liable to pay for services never rendered, and they cited Attorney-General v. Dow (Turn. & Russ. 328), Attorney-General v. Kerr (4 Beav. 297).

Mr. Pemberton, in reply. The brief was delivered to the Attorney-General, not as counsel in the cause, but in the character of a public officer whose duty it was to superintend the conduct of the suit, and who was a party to the cause. The Court itself on occasions requires the Attorney-General to attend, in order that he may fully communicate his opinion and exercise his discretion, and the practice has always been to allow his brief.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. I will consider this question, and see if the general rule which it seems has been heretofore acted on, is to be departed from in the present case.

I have frequently had occasion to observe, that there is nothing from which charities have more severely suffered than from the absence of the Attorney-General, and from his not having been furnished with full information. The duties which he is sometimes called on to perform, render it indispensable that he should be furnished with full information, which can only properly be communicated by means of a brief. Cases of hard-[307]-ship are sometimes represented to the Attorney-General in open Court, and he is asked, if he, in his discretion, will call on the Court to pronounce a decree according to the strict rights in favour of a charity (Attorney-General v. Brettingham, 3 Beavan, 91); if the Attorney-General be kept in ignorance of the real circumstances of the case, it would be impossible for him to exercise that salutary discretion.

Here it is said, that the Attorney-General ought not to be allowed his costs, because he did not attend personally at the hearing. The Attorney-General having due regard to the whole of his duty in the cause, may not have considered his personal attendance in Court necessary to the performance of that duty. This, however, is not the question, for there can be no doubt that the Attorney-General was properly furnished with a brief of the proceedings, and the real question is, upon whom the expense ought to fall.

August 2. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. This is the petition of the Attorney-General for leave to except to the Master's report. And the single question is, whether the expense of preparing a brief for the Attorney-General at the hearing, and the fee thereon paid to him, are to be deemed costs as between party and party, or costs as between solicitor and client. The Master has refused to allow them as costs between party and party, and that is the subject of complaint.

As it is the duty of the Attorney-General to attend personally to the conduct of the cause, it is not denied that he ought to be supplied with a brief of the proceedings, nor is it contended that he ought not to receive a fee on the occasion; but it is contended, that the expense should not fall on the party against whom the Attorney-General obtains a decree with costs, but should be paid out of the estate which is the subject of the information.

The Attorney-General has a duty and responsibility quite distinct from the mere duty and responsibility of counsel attending at the hearing to argue the cause; and it is a duty which cannot be performed without the knowledge which is afforded by the brief. I conceive, therefore, that his brief is a necessary part of the expense of prosecuting the suit, and that, whether he appears to argue the case at the hearing or not. Upon inquiry, I have not been able to hear of a single instance before the present, in which upon a taxation of costs between party and party the costs of the Attorney-General's brief have not been allowed. The practice has been uniform. Even those officers who have, in their own opinions, considered that such costs ought only to be allowed upon a taxation of costs as between solicitor and client, have informed me, that, although they have frequently urged their reasons for their own view of the case before different Masters, it has always been without success. I must, therefore, consider the practice to be uniform, and there is no authority in the Master's office, or here, to alter it. If a new practice is to be introduced, it must be by higher authority than mine.

I am, therefore, of opinion, that the prayer of this petition must be granted.

Refer it back to the Master to review his report and tax the costs of the Attorney-General's brief.

[309] In re SMITH. May 3, June 1, 5, 6, August 4, 1841.

[For subsequent proceedings, see 9 Beav. 182, 342. See Griffiths v. Griffiths, 1843, 2 Hare, 595; Cooper v. Ewart, 1847, 15 Sim. 564; 2 Ph. 366; In re Le Brasseur and Oakley [1896], 2 Ch. 492.]

The taxation of the bill of costs of the agent of a solicitor, upon the footing of a special agreement requiring the Master to depart from the ordinary rules of taxation, cannot be obtained upon petition.

An account of all the dealings and pecuniary transactions not connected with the bills of costs, cannot be obtained upon a petition for the taxation of costs. The account directed on petition being limited to monies paid or duly appropriated towards satisfaction of the bills.

In general, a solicitor cannot obtain the taxation of his agent's costs without bringing the amount into Court; but, under special circumstances, that condition will be dispensed with or the amount limited.

Agent of a solicitor held, by the irregularity of his conduct, to have discharged himself, and ordered, before taxation or payment of his bills, to deliver up all papers, &c., on an undertaking of the principal to redeliver them, as the Court should order.

Payment in respect of counsels' fees should specify the cause, and each particular fee. Payments, except for stated and specific fees for particular matters of business done or to be done, disapproved of.

This was a special application by Mr. Husband, a country solicitor, for the taxation of the bill of Mr. George Smith, his London agent.

The facts of the case are fully stated in the following judgment of the Court.

Mr. Pemberton, Mr. Stuart, and Mr. Cole, in support of the petition.

Sir. W. Follett, Mr. Kindersley, Mr. Bethell, and Mr. W. S. Daniel, for Mr. George Smith.

The following authorities were referred to:—As to the authority of the Court to order the taxation of an agent's bill; Lees v. Nuttall (2 Myl. & K. 284); 2 G. 2, c. 23, and 12 G. 2, c. 13, s. 6; and see Jones v. Roberts (8 Sim. 397), and Toghill v. Grant (2 Beavan, 261).

That accounts could not be taken on the taxation of a bill of costs; Anon. (2 Ves. sen. 452), Jones v. James (1 Beavan, 311). And to shew the right of the Petitioner to the immediate delivery of the papers, on the ground that Mr. Smith by his conduct had discharged himself; Heslop v. Metcalfe (8 Sim. 622, and 3 Myl. & Cr. 183), and see Cane v. Martin (2 Beavan, 584). And to shew that after action brought upon an attorney's bill containing any taxable item, the Court will refer it to taxation, without imposing terms on the Defendant; Williams v. Griffiths (6 Mee. & W. 32).

August 4. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. This petition is presented by James Husband, praying that the Respondent, George Smith, may deliver up to Messrs. Bourdillon & Sons, all deeds, briefs, and papers in his possession, as agent of the Petitioner, upon such terms as the Court may think fit. And may be ordered to deliver his further bill of costs, in any of the matters in which he has been employed as agent of the Petitioner, and his cash account in respect of the dealings between him and the Petitioner, during the years 1830, 1831, 1832, 1833, and 1834. And that it may be referred to the Master to tax the said George Smith's bills of costs from the year 1825 inclusive, down to the present time; and to settle and adjust the cash account between the Petitioner and the Respondent; and to take an account of all dealings and transactions between them, necessary for that purpose. And that in such taxation the Master may be ordered to have regard to an agreement stated in the petition, and upon which, it is alleged, the Petitioner employed the Respondent as his agent.

Mr. Smith has acted as agent for Mr. Husband, from the year 1825 down to the close of the year 1840; and there has been no taxation of his bills, and no settlement of accounts in relation thereto. I apprehend it to be the course of this Court to order the taxation of such bills, and to have the amount due thereon ascertained, on payment into Court of the amount appearing to be due upon the bills and accounts delivered.

The peculiarities in this case are, first, that the Petitioner desires to have the bills taxed upon the footing of a special agreement, which, as he alleges, was entered into and subsisted between him and the Respondent; 2dly, that the Petitioner asks for a general account of all dealings and transactions, so far as may be necessary for settling the cash account between him and the Respondent; and, 3dly, that the Petitioner claims to have the order for taxation, and for the delivery up of his papers, without bringing any money into Court.

As to the agreement, the Petitioner alleges, that the employment of the Respondent as London agent of the Petitioner, was upon an express agreement or understanding between them, that the Respondent should only charge the Petitioner with the amount of the sums actually paid out of pocket in any suits, actions, and matters of business transacted by him as the Petitioner's agent, in which the Petitioner should be unsuccessful, and should not himself get paid, or in which the Petitioner should be personally interested or concerned as a party or otherwise, and should not himself get paid.

This agreement is, as distinctly sworn to by the Petitioner, and is, as it appears to me, distinctly denied by the Respondent. Evidence on the subject has been gone into at great length on both sides, and there is, I think, reason to believe that the Respondent intended that the Petitioner should expect to have some allowance or some favour in his personal and unsuccessful [312] cases; and that the Petitioner did accordingly, and with some reason, expect some such favour or allowance; but the evidence does not appear to me to prove the agreement alleged, or any other distinct and established agreement. A vague hope seems to have been held out on one side, and entertained on the other; but I am far from being satisfied, that both parties concurred in the same view of the subject, or that any settled agreement subsisted between them.

The evidence does not appear to me to establish any clear result, and I do not conceive it to be material in the present proceeding; because I am of opinion that upon such a petition as this, the Court has no jurisdiction to compel the specific performance of a special agreement, even if the same were established by evidence which could be relied on. All that can be done upon such a petition, is to order the taxation of the bills, according to the usual course and the general rules of the Court. Taxation upon the footing of a special agreement, requiring the Master to depart from the ordinary rules, and the result of which may be to give to one party something, more or less, than the general rules of the Court authorise, and to deprive one party of the fruit of labour, to which he would otherwise be entitled, and exempt the other from liabilities to which he would otherwise be subjected, can I think, only be directed upon the establishment of the special agreement, in a formal proceeding instituted for the purpose.

I am also of opinion, that upon such a petition as this, the Court has no jurisdiction to order an account to be taken of all dealings and transactions between the principal and his agent, so far as such account may be necessary to adjust and ascertain a general cash account between them. I think that accounts of dealings and [313] pecuniary matters not connected with the bills of costs, cannot be directed as merely incidental to an order to tax the bills of costs. In such cases there is usually a direction to ascertain the amount of what is due upon the bills, or what, if anything, is overpaid; and this renders it necessary to take an account of such sums of money as have been paid, or duly appropriated, towards satisfaction of the bills. If the principal desires to obtain a general account of all dealings and transactions (including agency business), between him and his agent, on the footing, as to such agency business, of a special agreement, I think that he cannot have the relief on petition; and that in ordering the bills to be taxed on petition, no more can be done than to direct, in the usual way, that the Master do ascertain what is due or overpaid.

In Otte v. Christian (Turn. & R. 324) and Jones v. Roberts (8 Sim. 400), it was held that the principal could not obtain the taxation of his agent's bills without bringing the amount into Court; but in the two cases of Binsted v. Barefoot (1 Dick. 112, and Beames on Costs, 361), Lord Hardwicke did not order the costs to be brought in. And under special circumstances, I conceive that the condition of bringing the costs into Court may be dispensed with.

In this case it is alleged by the Petitioner, that the Respondent has for a long time, and in a great variety of transactions, committed very gross frauds against the Petitioner or his clients, in charging as disbursements in the causes and matters in which he has been employed, various sums of money which, in fact, never were disbursed. That his conduct in this and other respects has been such that he cannot safely permit him to act [314] as agent any longer. That under such circumstances the Respondent ought to be deemed to have discharged himself from his agency, and ought not to be allowed to throw any obstacle in the way of the business being carried on by some other agent. That the amount of what is really due to the Respondent must be uncertain, and that for these reasons, the Respondent ought to be ordered to deliver up the papers which he holds as the Petitioner's agent, and that the Petitioner ought to have the bills taxed without bringing the amount into Court.

Amongst other acts of misconduct with which the Respondent is charged, is this:—That he has in his bills of costs, charged as disbursements for fees paid to counsel, various sums of money, which, in fact, never were paid, or which, if paid, were less in amount than the fees charged. And Mr. Husband has sworn that Mr. Smith, on being remonstrated with on the subject, replied, "What matters it to you! You are not a loser; if I charge you, you charge your clients."

The Respondent has admitted, that in his several bills delivered, he has charged the Petitioner with money as paid for fees, which, in fact, were not paid at the time when charged; and that in several instances he has charged for fees to counsel, several sums of money larger than the amount of the fees which were in fact paid; he denies the imputed fraud, and attempts to remove the imputation, by endeavouring to shew that the overcharges were accidental errors, arising from mistakes made in the hurry of business, in the absence of necessary papers, or by the carelessness of clerks; and he alleges, that in some instances, fraud could not have been intended, because the means of detection were in the power of the Petitioner.

[315] And with respect to the expressions imputed to Mr. Smith, when remonstrated with, he denies any such expression with reference to overcharged fees; but says, that with respect to fees due to counsel and unpaid, he may have said, "the fees remaining unpaid is not a matter between you and me, as you have charged such fees to your clients; but that is a matter between me and counsel."

It is probable that some of the erroneous charges may have been unintentionally made. There are others which, I confess, I find it very difficult to impute to innocent mistake. There may have been no design to carry into execution a systematic plan of fraud, and the amount of all the overcharges which have been admitted, or proved, is not very considerable; but the mere facts that a solicitor acting as agent for his principal, has charged fees as paid, before the same were actually paid; and has, in so many instances, charged as paid for particular fees, sums of money larger than were ever really paid, proves (to say the least of it) such negligence and such disregard for the accuracy, which ought to characterise all his transactions, and shews a mode of doing business, affording such extensive means of committing fraud, and gives such reason to distrust the integrity of the person guilty of such errors, that all the confidence which ought to subsist between principal and agent must be destroyed; and without entering into the particulars of each case, I am of opinion, that there is enough admitted and proved, to shew that it became the duty of Mr. Husband to his clients, to discontinue the employment of Mr. Smith as his agent. And that for the purposes of this petition, Mr. Smith must be considered to have discharged himself from his agency; and I am of opinion that he must deliver up to Mr. Husband or Messrs. Bourdillon & Sons, if Mr. [316] Husband so desires it, all the papers in his hands as agent, on an undertaking that they shall be redelivered to him if the Court shall so order.

It appears that amongst the papers of which the Petitioner took possession on the 12th of December 1840, and which he afterwards refused or omitted to return to Mr. Smith, was an indenture of mortgage from Knapman to Mr. Husband, with two memoranda of further charge. If the indenture and memoranda are not documents to be used in any proceedings, I think that they ought to be restored to the Respondent, or deposited in Court till the bills of costs are taxed and settled.

I have felt some doubt upon payment of money into Court, as to the condition on which the taxation of the bills of costs is to be ordered. The circumstances are such, that I do not think that I ought either to require the whole sum claimed to be paid into Court, or to confine the reduction to the amount of the overcharges actually proved. But considering the amount claimed, and the amount of the overcharges alleged, and making, as I think under the circumstances I am bound to do, very large allowances for the possible case of a solicitor who has committed such errors, not being able to substantiate many other charges in his bills of costs, I think it not unreasonable, that the Petitioner should be required to pay into Court the sum of £1000. And the order which I propose to make is,

"That the Petitioner paying into Court the sum of £1000, and undertaking to pay what shall appear to be due on taxation of his bills, order Mr. Smith to deliver his further bill, from the foot of the last bill delivered. And let the Master tax the bills, and ascertain the [317] amount of what is due thereon to Mr. Smith, having regard to the sums of money which have been paid, by or on behalf of, Mr. Husband, to Mr. Smith on account thereof.

"And the Petitioner, or Messrs. Bourdillon & Sons, undertaking to redeliver the papers, &c., now in the custody of Mr. Smith as agent, in case the Court shall at any time order them to be redelivered, it is ordered, that Mr. Smith do deliver up, &c., all such papers. And Mr. Smith is to have liberty to apply for a redelivery of the papers, &c., whenever he shall be advised so to do."

If this petition had been confined to the proper object of it, the taxation of the bills, and the claim to be relieved from paying money into Court, I should have ordered Mr. Smith to pay the costs of it; considering the other subjects which have been introduced, and the costs hereby occasioned, and the difficulty and expense of apportioning the costs, it appears to me that I ought not to give any costs of this petition.

I cannot part with this case, without stating my regret, that a practice likely to lead to great abuse has arisen. I had always understood, that it was irregular for counsel to receive from the clients any sum of money, except for stated and specific fees for particular matters of business done, or to be done. It is quite obvious, that to receive money generally on account, without specifying the causes and matters, and each particular fee, leaves the client open to imposition, in a manner that might otherwise be avoided. I cannot help hoping, that the circumstances which have occurred in this case, however unfortunate in themselves, may tend to restore, where necessary, the former course of conducting business between counsel and solicitors.

Where there is no gift of the undisposed-of residue, a testator cannot, by negative words, exclude one of his next of kin from participating in it.

A testator, by his will, cut off his widow from any part of his property, and directed she should not receive any benefit therefrom, but he made no disposition of his property: Held, that she was nevertheless entitled to her share of the undisposed-of residue.

This case came on upon the petition of the children of Charles Johnson for payment of a sum of money out of Court. The following decision appeared to have been made by Sir L. Shadwell, Vice-Chancellor, on the 9th of June 1828, which not having been reported, is inserted on account of its peculiarity.

The will of the testator, Charles Johnson, was in the following words:—"I direct that my wife Harriett Johnson and her child Harriett (whom I entirely disclaim), shall be cut off from any part of my property, and shall not receive any benefit or advantage therefrom, and appoint my daughter Elizabeth Johnson, and my friend

John Howell, and my brother-in-law James Harris, executors of my will. And I direct that my daughter Ann Knight's share of my property shall be in trust for her separate use for her life, and afterwards for her children; and my son Charles's share shall be in trust for him at twenty-one, to be applied for his benefit in the meantime. As witness," &c.

It will be perceived that the testator made no disposition of his property by his will, and merely excluded his wife and daughter Harriett. He died leaving several children.

The bill was filed by the testator's widow Harriett, and her daughter Harriett.

By the decree made on the 9th of June 1828 (Reg. Lib. 1827, A. fo. 2101), it was, amongst other things, declared, that the Plaintiff, "the widow of the testator, and his next of kin, were [319] entitled to the clear residue of the testator's personal estate, according to the Statute of Distribution of Intestate's Estates."

Mr. Craig now appeared in support of the petition, the Master of the Rolls, however, directed the petition to stand over in order to bring the representatives of the widow before the Court.

[319] TULLETT v. ARMSTRONG. July 3, 5, 1841.

[For previous proceedings, see 1 Beav. 1; 48 E. R. 1 (with note); 4 My. & Cr. 377; 41 E. R. 147 (with note). See Johnson v. Gallagher, 1861, 3 De G. F. & J. 515; 45 E. R. 976; London Chartered Bank of Australia v. Lemprière, 1873, L. R. 4 P. C. 593; 9 Moo. P. C. (N. S.), 455; 17 E. R. 584; Flower v. Buller, 1880, 15 Ch. D. 676.]

A married woman, possessing separate estate, joined her husband in an annuity deed, purporting to secure the annuity on her separate estate. The husband alone conveyed the separate property, and alone covenanted. The wife entered into no obligation, and there appeared no agreement on her part to charge her separate estate.

Held, that her separate estate was not bound by the deed.

The question in this case was, whether a deed executed by a married woman was effective to charge her separate estate.

Under the will of N. Bradford, Mrs. Armstrong was, in 1819, entitled, for her separate use for life, to a certain copyhold and leasehold estate, subject however to a prior life-estate therein given to the testator's widow. As to this property the will provided no restraint against anticipation.

In April 1829 Mr. Armstrong, her husband, entered into a treaty with Mr. Izod, to whom he was then indebted, for granting him an annuity of £50 a year secured upon this reversionary interest.

By an indenture, dated the 7th of May 1829, and made between William Armstrong and Mary Ann his wife of the first part, Izod of the second part, and George Cox (a trustee) of the third part, after reciting the will of Bradford at considerable length, but thereby merely shewing that Mrs. Armstrong was entitled for her separate use in remainder to the leasehold and copy-[320]-hold estate in question, and after reciting the death of Bradford, and that William Armstrong was indebted to Izod in £201, and that Izod had agreed with William Armstrong for the purchase of an annuity of £50 payable during the life of Mrs. Armstrong, and that it had been agreed that the £201 should be considered as part of the purchase-money, and that the annuity should be secured by Mr. Armstrong's warrant of attorney, and by such assignment of Mrs. Armstrong's life interest as thereafter contained; it was witnessed, that Mr. Armstrong, alone, granted the annuity, and he alone assigned the leaseholds, and covenanted that he and his wife would surrender the copyholds to Cox. And it was agreed "between the parties" to the deed, that Cox should hold the property on certain trusts for securing the annuity. Mr. Armstrong covenanted that he had good right, &c., to assign the premises, and he covenanted for further assurance on the part of himself, and all persons claiming under or in trust for him or his wife.

The deed was executed by Mrs. Armstrong; but it will be observed that she neither joined in the operative part, nor in the covenants or engagements contained in the deed.

The widow afterwards died.

The Plaintiff had a charge on such part of the separate estate of Mrs. Armstrong as was unfettered by a restraint against anticipation (1 Beavan, 1, and 4 Myl. & Cr. 377), under a deed dated in 1832, and therefore subsequently to that of Izod, and he contested with the assignees of Izod the validity of the annuity of £50, so far as it affected Mrs. Armstrong's separate estate. The case now came on upon exceptions to the Master's report taken by the assignees of Izod.

[321] Mr. Kindersley and Mr. Wilbraham, for the assignees of Izod, contended that no particular form of words were necessary to effect an equitable assignment, and that Mrs. Armstrong being, as to her separate estate, a feme covert, her joining in the deed was sufficient to create a charge on that, which alone, she had a power of charging, viz., her separate estate. They cited Wainwright v. Hardisty (2 Beavan, 363).

Mr. Pemberton, Mr. Teed, and Mr. Haig, for the Plaintiff. It is impossible that any claim can be established against the separate estate of Mrs. Armstrong in respect of the annuity. The whole of the transaction and the deed itself shews, that the parties were proceeding on the supposition that it was the interest of the husband alone which they were dealing with, and which was the subject of the contract. The effect of the deed is not to touch the separate estate, but to pass the interest supposed to exist in the husband. A married woman, having a separate estate, may undoubtedly deal with it as a feme sole, but unless she contracts in that character her deed is wholly void. To charge her estate apt words must be used, and the onus of proving the intention of creating a charge, lies on the party alleging it.

The annuity deed is also invalid under the Annuity Act, and has not been duly proved before the Master.

Mr. Wray, for Mrs. Armstrong.

Mr. Kindersley, in reply. That it was intended to bind the separate estate, is shewn from the fact of Mrs. Armstrong's joining in the deed, otherwise it would have been [322] useless. It is therein stated to have been agreed "between the parties" (of whom Mrs. Armstrong was one), that Cox should hold the property in trust to secure the annuity; this clearly shews an intention to charge that estate, which was separate property, and which could not be effected by the husband's act alone.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. The case comes on upon exceptions to the Master's report, on which it is contended by the assignees of Izod, that even if the deed be proved, and has all the requisites of a valid deed of this nature, yet still, upon its true construction, it is not such a deed as can be considered as binding the separate estate of this lady. Now assuming the validity of the deed, and that it has been duly proved, there never was a deed in which it appeared more apparent what it was the intention of one of the parties to grant. It is perfectly clear that Armstrong was to grant his own interest, though he covenanted for himself and his wife.

The question is, whether the separate estate of Mrs. Armstrong is to be bound by this deed. If she had been a covenanting party, I apprehend it would clearly create a charge upon her separate estate, or even if the deed had recited an agreement that she should be a surety for her husband, and that her separate estate should be made liable to this annuity, I apprehend, that the Court, according to all the rules upon which it acts, would have held that the deed extended far enough to bind her separate estate and create a charge thereon, although there might not have been any formal words to that effect. But the only circumstance relied on in this case, is, that Mrs. Armstrong was a party to the deed. I apprehend however it was not her estate, but the right and interest of her husband in her [323] right, which the parties had in their contemplation; and I cannot possibly read this deed without seeing that the party who prepared it, himself supposed that it was the interest of the husband in the estate of the wife that he was dealing with. There is nothing which can bear a contrary construction; the husband alone grants and conveys, and he alone covenants that she shall do certain acts.

It is perfectly clear that when a woman has property settled to her separate use, she may bind that property without distinctly stating that she intends to do so. She may enter into a bond (Hulme v. Tenant, 1 B. C. C. 15; Healley v. Thomas, 15 Ves. 596), bill (Coppin v. Gray, 1 Y. & C. (N. C.), 205), promissory note (Bullpin v. Clark, 17 Ves. 365; Field v. Soule, 4 Russ. 112), or other obligation (Murray v. Barlee, 4 Sim. 82, and 3 Myl. & K. 209; Owens v. Dickenson, Cr. & Ph. 48, and Crosby v. Church, 3 Beavan, 485), which, considering her state as a married woman, could only be satisfied by means of her separate estate; and, therefore, the inference is conclusive, that there was an intention, and a clear one on her part, that her separate estate, which would be the only means of satisfying the obligation into which she entered, should be bound. Again, I apprehend it to be clear, that where a married woman having separate estate, but not knowing perfectly the nature of her interest, executes an instrument by which she plainly shows an intention to bind the interest which belongs to her, then, though she may make a mistake as to the extent of the estate vested in her, the law will say that such estate as she may have shall be bound by her own act. But in a case where she enters into no bond, contract, covenant, or obligation, and in no way contracts to do any act on her part:—[324] where the instrument which she executes does not purport to bind or to pass anything whatever that belongs to her, and where it must consequently be left to mere inference, whether she intended to affect her estate in any manner or way whatever, the case is entirely different either from the case where she executes a bond, promissory note, or other instrument, or where she enters into a covenant or obligation by which she, being a married woman, can be considered as binding her separate estate. Though Mrs. Armstrong was a party to this deed, there is nothing in it which shews, on her part, an intention to bind her separate estate; on the contrary, the conveyance and agreement is wholly on the part of the husband. Unless it can be shewn that Mrs. Armstrong, acting entirely independent of her husband, voluntarily joined him in a deed, and contracted or covenanted to bind her separate estate, the claim against her cannot be maintained. To create a charge she must either enter into some obligation which can only be satisfied by resorting to her separate estate, or must convey, or agree to convey, some benefit, estate, or interest belonging to her in her separate character. My opinion is, that her separate estate is not bound by the deed. The exceptions must therefore be overruled, and the Master's report confirmed.

[325] THE CORPORATION OF ARUNDEL v. HOLMES. HOLMES v. THE CORPORATION OF ARUNDEL. July 6, 19, 24, 26, August 10, 1841.

Bill by a corporation, to have a lease of the corporation property delivered up, as void under the Municipal Corporation Act (5 & 6 W. 4, c. 76), dismissed with costs, on the ground that the objection was legal, and that the question of its validity ought to be first determined at law.

Cross-bill by the lessee to have an inquisition finding the lease collusive quashed, and delivered up to be cancelled, as being irregular and fraudulent, dismissed with costs, on the ground of want of jurisdiction.

A cause and cross-cause being dismissed with costs, Held, that the costs of evidence, taken in the former cause, but used in both, should be paid for in the cause in which it was taken.

The first was a suit by the corporation against the lessee, and the second a cross-suit by the lessee against the corporation, for the purpose stated in the judgment of the Court.

Mr. Pemberton, Mr. Bethell, and Mr. Rogers, for the corporation.

Sir C. Wetherell and Mr. Wray, for the Defendant Mr. Holmes.

August 10. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. This case comes on upon bill and cross-bill. The original bill was filed by the Corporation of Arundel for the purpose of having it declared, that the Defendant was bound to make and declare his option, either to restore the lands held by him under a lease from the corporation, or to pay an additional rent for the same:—that, in the one event, he might be ordered to restore and reconvey the land to the corporation, and deliver up the lease now held by him, and account for a proper rent; or, in the other event, that he might pay the additional rent due on the footing of the lease, and such endorsement as he might have made thereon. The cross-bill prays, that if the lease in question shall be held to be within the Municipal Corporation Regu-[326]-lation Act,(1) or if the Court

(1) 5 & 6 W. 4, c. 76, s. 94, 97. The ninety-fourth section of this Act is as follows:—

“And be it enacted, that it shall not be lawful for the council of any body corporate to be elected under this Act to sell, mortgage, or alienate the lands, tenements, or hereditaments of the said body corporate, or any part thereof, except in pursuance of some covenant, contract, or agreement bond fide made or entered into on or before the 5th day of June in this present year (1835), by or on behalf of the body corporate of any borough, or of some resolution duly entered in the corporation books of such body corporate on or before the said 5th day of June, or to demise or lease, except in pursuance of some covenant, contract, or agreement bond fide made or entered into on or before the said 5th day of June, by or on the behalf of such body corporate, or in pursuance of some resolutions duly entered in the corporation books of such body corporate on or before the said 5th day of June, or except in the cases hereinafter mentioned, any lands, tenements, or hereditaments of such body corporate, or any part thereof, or to enter into any new covenant, contract, or agreement (except in the cases hereinafter mentioned) for demising or leasing any such lands, tenements, or hereditaments, or any part thereof, for any term exceeding thirty-one years from the time when such lease shall be made, or if made in pursuance of a previous agreement, then from the time when such agreement shall have been entered into; and in every lease which the said council is not hereby restrained from making, there shall (except in the cases hereinafter mentioned) be reserved and made payable during the whole of the term thereby granted, such clear yearly rent as to the council shall appear reasonable, without taking any fine for the same.”

The ninety-seventh section is as follows:—“And be it enacted, that it shall be lawful for the council first to be elected in any borough under the provisions of this Act, to call in question all purchases, sales, leases, and demises not made in pursuance of some such bond fide covenant, contract, agreement, or resolution made or entered into as aforesaid before the said 5th day of June, and all contracts for the purchase, sale, lease, or demise of any lands, tenements, and hereditaments, and all divisions and appropriations of the monies, goods, and valuable securities, or any part of the real or personal estate, of which on or before the 5th day of June in this present year, the body corporate of which they are the council, whether in their own right or as trustees for charitable or other purposes, was seised or possessed, which shall have been made or contracted between the said 5th day of June, and the day of the declaration of their election; and for that purpose, if it shall appear to the said council that there is ground for believing that any such purchase, sale, lease, or demise, or such contract, or such division, or appropriation of the premises, was collusively made for no consideration, or for an inadequate consideration, it shall be lawful for the council of such borough, at any time within six calendar months next after the first election of councillors under this Act shall have been declared in such borough, upon notice of their intention being first given in the London Gazette, and also affixed on the outer door of the town hall or in some public place within the borough, to cause the value of the lands, tenements, hereditaments, and premises in question to be inquired of and found by a jury of twelve indifferent men of the county in which or adjoining to which in the case of Berwick-upon-Tweed, and of all counties of cities and towns corporate, such lands, tenements, hereditaments, or premises do lie; and in order thereto, the said council is empowered to summon and call before such jury all persons having the custody and possession of any deed or agreement concerning the said lands, tenements, hereditaments, and premises made or entered into since the said 5th day of June, and to cause all such deeds and agreements to be produced before the said jury and examined by them, and to examine upon oath every person who shall be thought necessary to be examined (which oath the mayor is hereby empowered should have jurisdiction in respect thereof, it may be declared that the lease is valid:—that the inquisition mentioned in the pleadings [327] was irregular, and a fraudulent contrivance by the corporation, and ought to be quashed, and may be delivered up to be cancelled:—that the corporation may [328] be restrained from proceeding at law to recover possession of the lands comprised in the lease; and that the Plaintiff may be declared entitled to be paid certain sums paid by him for the use of the corporation.

The case is, that the corporation of Arundel granted a lease of certain corporation lands to Mr. Holmes, on [329] the 14th day of July 1835; and that the borough council, first elected under the Municipal Corporation Regulation Act, conceiving themselves to be entitled to call the lease in question, took proceedings, under the ninety-seventh clause of the Act, to have the value of the land inquired of and found by a jury: that an inquisition was accordingly held; that the jury found that the rent reserved by the lease was less than the real value, and that the lease was collusively granted. That the corporation, thereupon, called on Mr. Holmes, either to restore or reconvey the land, or to make an indorsement on the lease, acknowledging his liability to pay the additional rent found by the jury to be the real value; and Mr. Holmes having neglected to take any notice of this demand, the bill is filed to obtain the relief I have stated.

On the other hand, Mr. Holmes alleges, that his lease, being a lease at rack rent, is not within the meaning of the Act: that the inquisition was unfairly conducted, the corporation having refused to summon witnesses for the lessees, and having to administer); and the council shall, by ordering a view or otherwise, use all lawful means for the information as well of themselves as of the said jury in the premises; and the jury shall find the value of the said lands, tenements, hereditaments, and premises, and the consideration which shall have been given, and also that which ought of right to have been given for the purchase, sale, lease, demise, or appropriation thereof, according to the terms of such purchase, sale, lease, demise, contract, or appropriation, and taking into account all the circumstances under which the same shall have taken place; and if the jury by their oaths shall find that no consideration, or a consideration less than that which they shall have so found to be the value which ought therefore to have been given, shall have been collusively given, or contracted to be given, by the terms of any such purchase, sale, lease, demise, contract, or appropriation, the party to such purchase, sale, lease, demise, contract, or appropriation, shall have his option, either to reconvey and restore the lands, tenements, hereditaments, and premises in question, and to abandon the contract to which he shall have been party, upon receipt in each case of the consideration, if any, which he shall have given for the same, or to give, therefore, in each case such additional consideration, so that the whole consideration given shall be that which ought of right to have been given, so found by the jury as aforesaid; and in every such case as last aforesaid, the additional consideration given, or to be given, shall be indorsed on the original deed or conveyance; and unless he shall so do within one calendar month next after the finding of the jury, every such purchase, sale, lease, demise, contract, and conveyance shall be absolutely void and of none effect as against the said body corporate and their successors; and in every case in which any such contract shall have been abandoned as aforesaid, or in which any such purchase, sale, lease, demise, contract, or conveyance shall become void and of none effect, under the provisions of this Act, the party who would otherwise have had the benefit of the same shall be remitted to his former estate, title, and interest (if any) in the premises, as if no such contract, purchase, sale, lease, or demise had been made or entered into; and for summoning and returning such juries, and for imposing fines on the sheriff, his deputy, bailiff, or agent, and on the persons summoned and returned on the said jury, and on any person required to give evidence, who shall in this behalf contravene the provisions of this Act, the Council of every such borough shall have all the powers given in that behalf to the trustees or commissioners of any turnpike road, by an Act made in the third year of His late Majesty George the Third, intituled An Act to amend the General Laws now in being for Regulating Turnpike Roads in that part of Great Britain called England, &c.

omitted to bring to the consideration of the jury many circumstances material to the due consideration of the case; and that the subject not being fairly brought under the consideration of the jury, the inquisition is invalid, and not only cannot be made the foundation of any relief in this Court, but ought to be declared invalid, and ought to be delivered up.

For the corporation, it is said, that under the provisions of the Act, the lease is either void altogether, both at law and in equity, or it is void in equity only; that if it be void in equity only, the Plaintiffs are entitled to a reconveyance or surrender; and that if it be void altogether, they are entitled to have it deli-[330]-vered up to be cancelled to prevent its remaining as a cloud upon the title.

I am of opinion, that upon the case stated by the Plaintiffs, supposing the inquisition to be valid, and no indorsement made upon the lease, the lease is, under the Act, absolutely void and of none effect as against the corporation, and such being the case, that the Plaintiffs are entitled to recover possession at law, and need not come into this Court for a reconveyance. The lease, though void, is not invalid upon the face of it, and would therefore, as it appears to me, be a document which the Plaintiffs would be entitled to have delivered up, if they had it not in their own power to have its validity tried at law; but if the lease be void, the corporation may bring their ejectment, and have its validity tried at once; and such being the case, I think that the bill to have the lease delivered up cannot be sustained. (See Simpson v. Lord Howden, 5 Myl. & Cr. 97, and the cases therein referred to.) I am therefore of opinion that the original bill must be dismissed; and, considering the charges which it contains, I think that it must be dismissed with costs.

The cross-bill appears to me to be open to objections as strong as those which affect the original bill. No relief is sought, except in the event of the Court having jurisdiction on the subject of the lease; but whatever may be thought of the lease, the inquisition, whether it has been correctly taken or not, is a species of public record or document in the custody of the corporation. The objections made to it are all of them legal objections, properly cognisable in another place; and I think that a Court of Equity has no jurisdiction to [331] quash it, or to order it to be delivered up to be cancelled, or to restrain proceedings founded upon it. I am therefore of opinion that the cross-bill must also be dismissed with costs.

In the circumstances in which the parties were placed, it might have been very proper for either of them to have filed a bill of discovery. They have, I think, both of them erred in seeking for relief in this Court.

The whole of the evidence was taken in the cross-cause, but was read in both causes. A question being submitted to the Court as to how the costs of the evidence should be paid,

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS said, that it must be paid for in the cause in which it had been taken.

[332] MINCHIN v. NANCE. Feb. 9, August 10, 1841.

The completion of a contract having been delayed for thirteen years, the property became deteriorated by dilapidations. Held, under the circumstances, that the loss must fall on the purchaser, as the state of the title was such, that he ought to have completed his purchase and taken possession.

In August 1828 the Plaintiff agreed to sell a property to the Defendant. The contract was to be completed on the 9th of October following, and the purchaser was to be entitled to possession up to that time, and if the purchase should not be then completed, the purchaser was to pay interest at 5 per cent. from that day until full payment. The abstract having been delivered, all parties seemed to agree that a good title was not shewn; and in November 1828 the time for completion was enlarged to the 21st of February 1829, when the purchase-money was to be paid without interest, and the Defendant let into possession; and if the Plaintiff should fail to make a good title, the deposit was to be returned, with interest at 4 per cent. from the 9th of October. The Defendant refused to complete, and in 1829 brought an action for his deposit, and the Plaintiff filed his bill for specific performance. The Defendant had not taken possession, and great dilapidation had occurred. It was decided that a good title had been shewn in August 1828. A decree was made against the Defendant with costs; and it was determined that A. should sustain the loss by dilapidation, and should pay interest at 4 per cent. only on his purchase-money from the time of filing the bill.

This was a suit for specific performance, which now came on for further directions. The facts of the case are fully stated in the judgment.

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Tennant, for the Plaintiffs, the vendors.

Mr. Bethell and Mr. Toller, for the Defendants, the purchasers.

Mr. Briggs, for trustees.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. This was a cause heard for further directions and costs on the Master's report.

The bill was filed by the vendors for the specific performance of an agreement to sell the Crown Inn and other property at Portsmouth.

[333] The estate was advertised for and put up to sale by auction on the 5th of August 1828, subject to several conditions, and, amongst others, to the following:—viz., that the purchaser should pay a deposit of 20 per cent. on the amount of his purchase-money, and sign an agreement for payment of the remainder on or before the 9th day of October then next, at which time the purchase was to be completed, and the purchaser was to be entitled to possession of the premises purchased up to that time. The vendors were to pay all taxes and outgoing; and if, from any cause, the purchase should not be then completed, the purchaser was to pay interest, at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum, for his purchase-money, from that day until its full payment.

James Rands and the Defendant Andrew Nance became the purchasers, at the price of £6940. They paid the sum of £1388 as a deposit, and signed an agreement in writing, for payment of £5552 to the vendors, on the 9th of October then next, in case a good title should be shewn to the premises purchased.

An abstract of title being delivered by the vendors, and certain objections being taken to the title as shewn by such abstract, and both parties conceiving that a good title had not been made, they came to a new agreement in writing, on the 27th day of November 1828; and by such agreement, after reciting that the vendors were not prepared to make out a proper title to the premises, it was agreed, 1st. That the vendors were to make out a good title, and procure all necessary parties to join in a conveyance of the estate, by the 21st of February then next. 2dly. That on a good title being made out, and proper conveyances executed, the purchasers were to pay the remainder of their purchase-money on the said 21st day of February next, but with [334]—out any interest for the same; and were to be let into possession of the premises. 3dly. But if the purchasers should require further time for the payment of their purchase-money, they should have the option of deferring payment thereof, for any period not exceeding three calendar months; but in that case they should pay interest thereon, from the said 21st day of February at the rate of 4 per cent. per annum. And in case the purchasers should elect not to require further time, they were to be let into possession of the premises on the said 21st day of February; but the vendors were to retain the title-deeds till the remainder of the purchase-money should be paid. 4thly. On the completion of the purchase the purchasers were to be allowed to deduct from their purchase-money, interest on their deposit, from the 9th day of October until the time of completing the purchase, at the rate of 4 per cent. per annum; and also interest on the remainder of the purchase-money, at the same rate (on account of its lying unproductive), from the said 9th day of October up to the then present time. 5thly. If the vendors should fail to make a good title to the premises, and to procure the necessary parties to join in the conveyance, by the time above appointed for that purpose, the deposit money should be returned, with interest at the rate of 4 per cent. per annum, from the said 9th day of October last, until the same should be repaid.

After this second agreement had been entered into, the title was further investigated, and the discussion continued till a considerable time after the 21st of February 1829. Mr. Rands, one of the purchasers, died; and on the 8th of June 1829 the solicitor of Mr. Nance returned the abstract of title, and refused to complete the contract; and he afterwards, in July 1829, commenced an action against the vendors, to compel them to pay back the deposit.

[336] On the 2d of November 1829 the present bill was filed, praying for a specific performance of the contract, and to restrain the Defendant, Mr. Nance, from further proceeding in his action for the deposit.

The answer of Nance insisted that the Plaintiffs had not made out a good title; and submitted, that, even if the Plaintiffs could then shew a good title, the Defendant ought not to be compelled to accept the same, and complete the contract: and the answer alleged that the premises had become dilapidated.

The cause was heard on the 27th of July 1830; and it was then referred to the Master, to inquire whether the Plaintiffs could make a good title to the estate; and he should find that they could, he was to inquire at what time it was first shewn to the Plaintiffs could make such good title; and the consideration of further actions and of the costs of the suit was reserved.

On the reference, many objections were taken to the title by Mr. Nance. The Master allowed one of them, and thereupon certified that the Plaintiffs could not make a good title to the estate. And the Plaintiffs having excepted to the report, because was heard on the exception on the 19th of July 1831. On the hearing, the exception to the report was allowed; it was referred back to the Master to review the report; and the deposit was ordered to be returned. This order was affirmed, on appeal, by the Lord Chancellor, on the 16th of January 1832.

The Master having reviewed his report, to which the exception had been allowed, he his reviewed report, dated the 1st of December 1832; and thereby reported, that the Plaintiffs could make a good title to the estate, [336] and that such good title was shewn on the delivery of the first abstract of title, by the solicitor of the vendors to the purchasers' solicitor (which was in August 1828).

The cause came on to be heard for further directions on the 22d day of February 1833; and it being then represented that the Master's finding, as to the time when the title was first shewn, was erroneous, leave was given to file an exception to the report, which exception was filed accordingly, and a petition was presented by the vendors and Finlayson, stating that the vendors could not procure good and sufficient conveyances of the estate to be made; and that the buildings on the estate were in a ruinous state; and that the Petitioners were unwilling to take possession of the estate, or to run the risk of commencing any repairs upon them, until they were satisfied of obtaining a proper and valid conveyance; and it was prayed, if it seemed to the Court that the contract should be performed, that the Plaintiffs might cause a sufficient conveyance to be made, within a limited and reasonable time; and that an account might be taken, of the dilapidations which had taken place, since the time when, under the conditions, the purchasers ought to have been let into possession of the estate, and of the waste committed thereon; and that the amount of the dilapidations should be deducted from the purchase-money. On the 26th of June 1833 the petition was overruled; and it was thereby determined that a good title was shewn on the 5th of August 1828; and the Court declared that the Plaintiffs were entitled to a specific performance of the agreement of the 5th of August 1828, as altered by the agreement of the 27th of November 1828, if they could make a proper conveyance of the estate; and was referred to the Master to inquire whether the Plaintiffs could procure all necessary parties to join in such conveyance; [337] and if they could, he was to cause a proper conveyance, and was to inquire whether the premises had suffered any, and what dilapidations; and to what extent in value, since the date of the agreement of the 5th of August 1828, with liberty to state special circumstances; but the inquiry was to be without prejudice to any question, whether the Plaintiffs were to pay or make compensation for such dilapidations, or as to the costs of the in making this order, with liberty to state special circumstances, Sir John Stowell intimated an opinion, that if the purchasers had a substantial objection to the title, and had reason to think that the objection could not be removed, they were not bound to take possession.

The Master made his report on the 2d of March 1840, and thereby found that the Plaintiffs could procure all necessary parties to join in the conveyance of the premises, and he settled a proper conveyance accordingly. And he found that the premises were not in a good state of repair at the date of the contract; that they had suffered great dilapidations afterwards; and that the said dilapidations were to the extent of value, since the date of the contract, of £500.

The report contains no statement of any special circumstances respecting the conveyances; and the report that the vendors were able to procure all parties to join in a proper conveyance stands without qualification.

After the date of this report, and on the 30th of April 1840, the Defendants Nance and Finlayson moved for leave to pay into Court the sum of £5552, the amount of purchase-money remaining unpaid; and it [338] was ordered that they should pay the same into Court, and should thereupon be let into possession of the estate; but that was to be without prejudice to any question in the cause. And the money, when paid in, was to be invested, and the interest to accrue due thereon, was to be accumulated.

The cause coming on for further directions and costs, and the Plaintiffs having finally established that they shewed a good title to the property in August 1828, having proved that they were able to procure all proper parties to convey, now that the Defendants may pay interest according to the contract of August 1828, except so far as that contract was varied by the contract of November 1828. They insist that they are in no respect answerable for the dilapidations which have taken place, and having succeeded in establishing that they shewed a good title before the bill was filed, and in maintaining their right to specific performance, they claim the costs of the suit.

Prima facie, the Plaintiffs having succeeded in every point which was in question, are entitled to the relief for which they ask; but the Defendants allege, that they ought not to be compelled to pay any interest, or more than the interest, which accrued between the date of the Master's report, and the time when the purchase-money was paid into Court. They claim interest on the deposit-money and the amount of dilapidations, with interest; and insist, that, except as to such part of the costs of suit as arose from a denial of the Plaintiffs' right to a specific performance, they are entitled to the costs of suit; and this claim, very extraordinary, no doubt on the part of a Defendant, who has wholly failed in making out his case, is founded on the alleged construction of two contracts, on the allegation that the [339] was not good till it was made so by the decree, and that the objections to the conveyance were not removed, till more than ten years after the date of the contract.

The difficulty in the case arises from the common mistake under which both parties laboured, with respect to the title. In the result of the long and expensive investigation which has taken place, it has appeared and is now established, that a good title was shewn in the month of August 1828; and, although there was considerable difficulty in procuring all proper parties to join in the conveyance, there is nothing in the case from which I can infer that if the title which afterwards appeared to be good, had been accepted, a good conveyance might not have been procured, even within the time first limited for the performance of the contract. Both parties, however, at that time, concurred in the opinion that a good title was not then shewn, and consequently the second contract was entered into. By the time for performing the contract was enlarged till the 21st of February 1829, but at that time, and for some time afterwards, both parties, in common error, continued to think that a good title was not shewn; and the negotiation for making the title good continued, till at length, on the 4th of May 1829, the purchasers, in their intention of putting an end to the business, and desiring to have the deposit returned with interest; and the vendors desiring an answer to some questions, making any arrangement for repayment of the deposit, and being told in reply that the purchasers entirely declined the purchase, and being afterwards again urged to the payment of the deposit money, with interest, then, for the first time, and on the 18th of May 1829, expressed doubts whether the objections taken to the title were tenable, and stated their determination to [340] take the opinion of counsel, and giving a decisive answer as to the return of the deposit. Mr. Randa, one purchasers, having died; it seems to have been hoped that the objections to the title might have been waived; but the deposit being still pressed for, and an action being maintained for the recovery of it, the opinion of Mr. Humphreys, a conveyancer, was shewn on the 6th of June 1829; and the vendors, being then advised that they had already shewn a good title, communicated to the purchasers their intention of filing a bill for a specific performance of the agreement, and to stay proceedings in the Court. The answer of the 14th of July 1829 to this communication was, that the vendor of the purchasers had no objection to accept service of subpoena, and so the litigation was given for the litigation which has since taken place.

A good title was shewn in August 1828. If the title had been admitted, there is, I think, anything to shew that a good conveyance might not have been procured before the 21st of February 1829, the time fixed by the second contract. And the vendors had insisted on the title, as shewn by the abstract, there seems to be no reason, why the purchasers should not have been held responsible for not taking possession at the time when, under such circumstances, they ought to have done.

But the vendors, instead of insisting on the title as shewn by the abstract, pressed in the objections; and it was not till May or June 1829 that it occurred to them, that the objections might not be tenable. In this state of things, it does not appear to me that it was the duty of the purchasers to take possession at that time. As since appeared that they might have taken possession with safety, and that it was against their own interest that they did not; but, looking at their situation [341] at the time (the vendors then admitting that the title was not satisfactorily made out), I do not think that the purchasers were bound to take possession on the 21st of February 1829, or even after the opinion of Mr. Humphreys was communicated to them; but I conceive that the rights of the parties, as declared by the decrees, must be considered to have relation to the time when the bill was filed, and I think that, on the very peculiar circumstances of this case, I must consider it to have been the duty of the purchasers to take possession on the 2d of November 1829, the day when the bill was filed.

Thinking that it must be deemed to have been their duty to take possession on that day, and that they are not answerable to the vendors for not taking possession on that day, yet, as they might safely have taken possession before, and might, and in consequence ought to have known, from the abstract, that the title was shewn to be good, I think that the vendors are not to be deemed answerable to them for withholding the possession, or for the consequences of their not taking possession; and on the whole, I am of opinion that the vendors are not answerable for the dilapidation which the property suffered.

By the first contract the purchase was to be completed on the 9th of October 1828, and if from any cause it could not then be completed, the purchaser was to pay interest at 5 per cent. per annum from that day until full payment.

Under the common error as to the title, the second agreement was entered into. The time was enlarged till the 21st of February 1829, and on a good title being made, the remainder of the purchase-money was to be then paid, without any interest for the time.

[42] On the supposition that a good title might be shewn and possession given on the 21st of February, and that the purchasers might require further time for the payment of their purchase-money, they were to have the option of deferring payment three months from the 21st of February, paying interest at 4 per cent. And on completion of the contract, the purchasers were to deduct from their purchase-money, interest at 4 per cent. on the deposit (of £1388), from the 9th of October to the time of completing the contract, and interest on the remainder of the purchase-money, from the 9th of October to the 27th of November 1828.

I think that the effect of this second contract, was to supersede that part of the first contract, which provided for the payment of interest on the residue of the purchase-money, at the rate of 5 per cent.; but it appears to me, that the vendors are not to interest on the unpaid purchase-money, at 4 per cent. from the time when, under the circumstances, it appears to me the contract ought to have been completed, or the filing of the bill; and that, under the second agreement, the purchasers are not to interest, at the same rate, on the unpaid part of the purchase-money, from the 9th of October to the 27th of November 1828, and on the deposit money, from the 9th of October 1828 to the 2d of November 1829.

From the commencement of the suit the purchasers have failed in every point and I am of opinion that they must pay the costs of the suit.

[For subsequent proceedings, see 5 Beav. 146; 9 Beav. 521.]

An order, on motion, for payment into Court by a trustee of trust funds admitted to have been sold out under a power of attorney executed by him, refused, on ground that there was not a sufficient admission of the misapplication, and trustees being authorized to vary the investments.

In a suit against trustees for a breach of trust, one of them admitted that the fund had been sold out, by means of a power of attorney executed by him for the purpose, as he stated, of investing it on more advantageous securities; he stated that he was not concerned in the receipt of the produce, but he had been informed that it had been received by his co-trustee, or by J. M. by his permission. The settlement contained a power to vary the investments. Held, that there was not the answer, a sufficient admission to justify an interlocutory order on this trust for payment of the money into Court.

This was a suit instituted against trustees by their cestui que trusts, for the purpose of making them responsible for a breach of trust, in selling out and misapplying trust funds.

A motion was now made, on behalf of the Plaintiffs, that Mr. Montriou, one of the Defendants, might pay a sum of £5300 into Court.

The facts are so fully stated in the judgment of the Court, that it is unnecessary to repeat them.

[344] August 9. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. This motion asks that the Defendant, Mr. Montriou, may be ordered to pay a large sum of money into Court, under the following circumstances.

By a settlement, made in contemplation of the marriage, which afterwards took effect, between John Meyer and Margaret Ancrum, several sums of stock were transferred for the benefit of the intended husband and wife, and the children of the marriage.

Henry Martin Ancrum, George Gilbert Currey, and George Meyer were named as trustees of the settlement, which contained powers to change the trustees, and to change the securities, on which the trust monies were invested.

By deeds, executed pursuant to the power in the month of November 1824, George Meyer, one of the original trustees, together with William Ancrum, and the Defendant William Montriou, became the trustees of the settlement; and the sum of £2334, 0s. 7d. 3 per cent. Bank annuities, five several sums of £3648, 15s. £243, 0s. 10d., £246, 18s. 3d., £264, 2s. 9d., and £100 (making together £4000) 3 per cent. Reduced annuities, and the sum of £1000 Navy 5 per cent. annuities, were transferred into their names, on the trusts of the settlement.

In the year 1824 a part of the Reduced annuities (£2624, 13s. 5d.) were assigned, as it is said, under a power of attorney granted to George Meyer, by the two original trustees, William Ancrum and William Montriou.

In the year 1825 the sum of £1050 New 4 per cents., into which the £1000 Navy 5 per cents. had been con-[345]-verted, was sold by Montrion, under a power of attorney executed by George Meyer and William Ancrum.

And in the year 1826 the remainder of the Reduced annuities (£1878, 6s. 7d.), and the sum of £2334, 0s. 7d. 3 per cent. Bank annuities, were sold by George Meyer, under a power of attorney executed by William Ancrum and William Montrion.

The bill alleges, that the sums produced by the sales amounted altogether to £6882, 13s. 1d. Mr. Montrion says, that, from the information he has received at the bank, they amount to £6300 only. He says further, that of this sum £1063, 16s. 9d. was the produce of the New 4 per cents. sold by him; and that he duly applied £1000, part thereof, in a manner authorized by the trusts of the settlement; and that he paid the remainder of the produce of the New 4 per cents. (£63, 16s. 9d.) to John Meyer.

The Plaintiffs allege, that the whole of the £6300, with the exception only of the £1000, was misapplied; and by this motion, they call upon Mr. Montrion, to pay into Court the sum of £5300.

It is contended for Mr. Montrion, first, that to whatever extent he may be made liable at the hearing, he cannot, upon motion, be called upon to pay into Court, more than the money which actually came to his hands, and has not been duly applied; and secondly, that £1063, 16s. 9d. was the only sum which came into his hands; and the sum of £63, 16s. 9d., the only part of it which was not duly applied.

Mr. Montrion, in his answer, admits that all the stocks in question were transferred to, and standing in [346] the joint names of himself and George Meyer and William Ancrum. He says, that the stocks were sold and converted into money, for the purpose of investment in more advantageous securities, yielding a large income. That he received the £1063, 16s. 9d., but was in no other way concerned with the sale of any of the stocks (except the Navy 5 per cents.) than as having joined in securing powers of attorney for that purpose; and was in no way privy to such sale, or to the receipt of the money arising therefrom; but he has been informed, that the monies arising from the sale of the other funds, were received by George Meyer, or by his permission, by John Meyer.

Mr. Montrion has given no satisfactory account of the application of the sums of money, the produce of the sale of the trust stock, which, as he has been informed, were received by George Meyer or John Meyer; and if the facts appear at the hearing, no otherwise than they now appear, I think that Mr. Montrion will be held liable to replace the stock, which he enabled George Meyer to sell, and the produce of which will not appear to have been duly applied.

But upon the answer, I do not find that Mr. Montrion admits any misapplication of those monies. He gives, as I think, an unsatisfactory account of several sums which appear to have been employed by John Meyer, and of some investments in the names of the trustees of the settlement; but there being only an admission that he executed a power of attorney, whereby, in fact, he enabled one of his co-trustees to receive the money, and no admission that the money was misapplied, I am of opinion, but I cannot, consistently with the practice of the Court, order him to pay the money which has not been in his hands into Court.

[347] The case of Collis v. Collis (2 Sim. 365) was referred to as an authority for his application. But in that case, a part of the trust fund consisted of £2231, 10s. 5d. per cent. Bank annuities, purchased with £2000, the amount of Shackle's mortgage. The trustees were Edward Shackle, Robert Fennell, and William Hinds. In the 25th of June 1825 Charles Collis, Matthias Dupont King, and Henry King became trustees. The report does not say, that the funds were transferred into the names of the new trustees. But in July 1825 the stock was sold, and Charles Collis and Matthias Dupont King lent the produce to Henry Collis, on his personal security. Henry King admitted the loan, but did not admit that he was any party to it. The order was made, on motion, for payment of money into Court, by Matthias Dupont King, Henry Collis, and Charles Collis. Henry King was not included. Now, if the stock never was transferred into the names of the new trustees, the sale was made by the old trustees, and the case has no application to the present; and if it was so transferred, the sale must have been made by the new trustees, of whom Henry King was one, and yet he was not ordered to pay the money into Court; and the order is no authority for that which is now asked.

The Plaintiffs allege that Mr. Montrieu appears by his answer to have received £2500, in addition to the sum of £1063, 16s. 9d., the receipt of which he distinctly admits.

The first sale of stock was in October 1824. The sum sold was £2624, 13s. 5d. Reduced 3 per cent. annuities; and supposing the fact to have been, as Mr. Montrieu has been informed it was, that the money [348] was received by George Meyer, or by his permission, by John Meyer; under these circumstances, the statement in the answer is, that in or about December 1824, John Meyer advanced to Henry Hoghton £2500 at interest, on the security of his bond, and a deposit of two policies of insurance, one for £2000 on the life of Henry Hoghton, and the other for £4500 on the life of Catherine Meyer, and the lease of a house in King's Arms yard.

Mr. Montrieu states that he is unable to set forth, whether or not this sum of £2500 was the produce of the trust funds.

In a subsequent part of his answer he states that, in December 1826, Henry Hoghton died; that the Defendant and Jeremiah Hoghton being his executor, received the £2000 due on the policy, which was part of the security for the £2500 lent by John Meyer to Henry Hoghton, and sold the leasehold house in King's Arms yard, other part of the security, for £500; that Henry Hoghton died insolvent, and Jeremiah Hoghton, the co-executor of the Defendant, being a large creditor, and disposed to dispute the validity of the security held by John Meyer, it was agreed between John Meyer, the Defendant, and Jeremiah Hoghton, that only £1000, part of the sum paid on the policy for £2000, should be applied in reduction of the debt arising out of the loan of £2500, and that the remaining sum of £1000 should remain a charge on the other policy of £4500, the remaining part of the security. That the £1000, part of the policy for £2000, was accordingly paid over or duly accounted for to John Meyer. The Defendant then says, that the policy for £4500 remained in his hands until December 1837, when the policy was redeemed, and he received the £1000, which remained charged upon it. From [349] the statement, there is considerable probability that the £2500 was trust money; but considering that Mr. Montrieu was the solicitor of John Meyer, and had other money transactions with him, and might have had the policy in his hands as solicitor, or on other accounts, it does not appear that there is such a statement of facts respecting the £2500, or any part of it, as to justify me in concluding that it was so clearly trust money as to be applied, that I ought to order it to be brought into Court.

The sum of £171, 7s. appears to have been money which it was the duty of the trustees to invest upon the trusts of the settlement. It was received by Mr. Montrieu, and by him paid to John Meyer. If included in the notice, it should be brought into Court; but if not, I think that the order must be confined to the sum of £63, 16s. 9d.

NOTE.—At the hearing, on the 20th of July 1842, the Defendant Montrieu failing to shew that the funds sold out had been properly invested, was held liable to make good the amount. See 5 Beav. 146.

Liability of an equitable assignee of leaseholds, in possession, to the covenants in the lease.

The liability of an equitable assignee of leaseholds is that of simple contract, and the Statute of Limitations limits his liability to six years after the cause of suit.

Bill dismissed without costs, on the ground of the Defendant not having (in a simple case) raised his defence by plea.

The question in this cause was as to the liability of an equitable assignee of leaseholds, who had taken possession, to the covenants in the lease. The defence made was, first, that there was no liability in equity; and, secondly, that, as the breaches had occurred six years before the filing of the bill, the Statute of Limitations barred the remedy.

The facts are so fully stated in the judgment of the Court, that, to prevent repetition, they are not here stated; but the reader is referred to the first part of the judgment. The lease determined in 1830, and this bill was filed in 1838.

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. L. Wigram, for the Plaintiffs, relied, as to the Defendant's liability as equitable assignee, on the cases of Jenkins v. Portman (1 Keen, 435), Close v. Wilberforce (1 Beavan, 112), Willson v. Leonard (3 Beavan, 373), Lucas v. Comerford (3 B. C. C. 166, and 1 Ves. jun. 235, and 8 Sim. 499); and as to the defence of the Statute of Limitations, they contended, that the Defendant was liable on an equitable covenant, and that the Defendant had incurred, in equity, the same liability, which he would have been subject to at law, if he had taken a legal assignment.

Mr. Kindersley and Mr. Bacon, for the Defendant Benson.

[351] The Defendant is in no way responsible to the Plaintiffs. He has incurred no legal liability, and there is no equity to render him subject to the claim of the Plaintiffs.

The case of Lucas v. Comerford does not bear out the principle which it had been supposed was laid down in that case. There, the Defendant was in possession and claimed the benefit of the lease, and he merely disputed his liability in equity to the covenant to repair; he admitted his liability on all the other covenants, and "submitted to perform and fulfil the same as long as he should remain in the actual possession and enjoyment of the premises" (8 Sim. 504). The case of Flight v. Bentley (7 Sim. 149) was expressly overruled by Moores v. Choat (8 Sim. 508).

The lessor has all he contracted for, viz., the liability of the lessee, and his other legal remedies. What right can he have, to acquire an additional security through a contract or dealing between two other parties, by which he is not bound. Not giving a party to the contract, he could not compel its specific performance (8 Sim. 23), as none but persons parties to a contract can be parties to a suit for a specific performance. (Wood v. White, 4 Myl. & Cr. 460.) And the lessee might release his equitable assignee without the concurrence of the lessor.

Possession does not affect the question. In Jenkins v. Portman, the Court said, "It does not appear that the fact of a mortgagee by assignment of a leasehold interest giving actual possession of the mortgaged property, is more important in equity than it is at law." [352] If the point depends on the possession, then an under-lessee would be liable in equity for the covenants in the original lease, but there is no authority for such a proposition.

Mr. Pemberton, in reply.

Nov. 13. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. This bill, in substance, says, that the Defendant Thomas Starling Benson may be decreed to repay to the Plaintiffs several sums of money, which they have been compelled to pay, in consequence, as they allege, of Mr. Benson having neglected to perform the covenants of a lease, in which he was equitably interested.

In the year 1769 Richard Salway, being entitled for his life to the premises in question in this cause, with a leasing power, in a manner not authorised by the power, granted a lease thereof to George Upporn and Thomas Main, for a term of years which expired on the 19th of July 1830.

Although the lease was invalid, the title of the lessees was not disputed, and they, and the persons claiming under them, continued in the enjoyment of the property, paying the rent reserved.

Subject to the lease, the property, after certain devolutions of title, became vested in Thomas Beale and Job Walker Baugh. The lease itself, which contained the usual covenants to repair, became vested in Samuel Sanders, under whose will it passed to the Plaintiffs and Defendants (except Thomas Starling Benson), for the interests whereby severally given to them.

[353] Samuel Sanders, the lessee, in 1781, granted an under-lease for fourteen years to James John Haig and John White. This under-lease became vested in John Haig and Frederick Teush; and on the 28th of September 1795 Sanders granted an under-lease of the premises to Oxley and Teush, for a term which was to expire on the 24th of June 1830; and in this under-lease, Oxley and Teush covenanted to keep the premises in repair, and give them up in good repair at the end of the term.

The under-lease was never assigned, and such legal interest as was given by it, remained in Oxley and Teush during their joint lives, and after the death of Oxley, was vested in Teush alone. The beneficial interest in, or the equitable title to, the under-lease, belonged, in the first instance, to Oxley and Teush the under-lessees. It afterwards became the property of Oxley, Teush, and John Ferard, as part of the effects of a partnership which subsisted between them; and, in the year 1809, the persons beneficially interested in the under-lease were Oxley, Ferard, and Thomas Green, who were partners in the business of vinegar makers, and held the property comprised in the lease, as part of their partnership effects. In the beginning of the year 1810 a partnership was formed between the Defendant Thomas Starling Benson and Oxley, Green, and Ferard; and upon that occasion, it was agreed, amongst other things, that the under-lease should be taken as part of the partnership effects; and accordingly, although the premises were not used in the partnership business, the rent, arising from them, was brought into the partnership account.

It seems that, in May 1812, an under-lease of the premises was granted to John James, and the Defendant Mr. Benson states, that this under-lease was not executed [354] by him, but by his partners Oxley, Green, and Ferard only. The rent continued to be brought into the partnership account during the lifetime of Oxley; and after his death, to the account of the firm in which Benson, Green, and Ferard were partners, till the dissolution of that firm in 1820; and, under arrangements made upon and subsequent to the dissolution, at first between Benson and Green, and Ferard, and afterwards between Benson and Green and Thomas Champion, Mr. Benson, in January 1822, became entitled to the rents reserved by the under-lease granted to James; and he paid the rent which, from time to time, became due to the persons claiming under Sanders, by virtue of the under-lease to Oxley and Teush of September 1795; and in this state things remained until the expiration of that under-lease at Midsummer 1830.

The reversion in fee was in those who derived title from Salway. The legal interest in the lease granted by Salway, so far as it could be made available for any purpose, was vested in the Plaintiffs, as claiming under Sanders. The legal interest in the under-lease granted by Sanders, so far as it could be made available, had survived to Teush, who is said to have died insolvent; the beneficial interest in the same under-lease had been enjoyed and dealt with, as partnership property, by Oxley and Teush, by Oxley, Teush, and Ferard, by Oxley, Ferard, and Green, by Benson, Oxley, Green, and Ferard, and by Benson, Green, and Ferard, successively; and ultimately, Benson alone became entitled to the rents reserved by the under-lease, which, during the partnership subsisting between him and Oxley, Ferard, and Green, had been granted to John James.

Before the expiration of the under-lease, great dilapidations were permitted to take place on the property; [355] and in 1829 one John Barton, being in the occupation of the premises, and having pulled down a part of the buildings, the Plaintiffs filed a bill and obtained an injunction against him, to restrain further waste, and in this proceeding, they allege, that they expended a sum of £133, 18s. 2d. which they were unable to compel Barton to repay.

Very soon after the expiration of Sanders's under-lease, it was the duty of the Plaintiffs to deliver up possession of the property to Beale and Baugh, the owners of the reversion. Barton, who was in the occupation, refused to deliver up possession to the Plaintiffs, and the Defendant Benson declined to interfere. The Plaintiffs were therefore compelled to resort to legal proceedings, and they ultimately recovered possession from Barton, at an expense, as they say, of £276, 17s. 4d. Having delivered possession to Beale and Baugh, the Plaintiffs were required to make compensation, and in the result of an action prosecuted against them, they were compelled to pay to Beale and Baugh, for damages and costs, £692, 11s. 6d., and they incurred costs of their own to the amount of £159, 11s. 7d.

The Plaintiffs, by their bill, allege, that all the acts in respect of which these several costs and damages were incurred, were done during the time when the Defendant Benson was equitable owner of the under-lease granted to Oxley and Tenah, and whilst he was either in possession of the property, or in possession and receipt of the rents and profits thereof; and they, therefore, contend, that the Defendant Benson was bound to keep the premises in repair, and to deliver up the possession on the expiration of the under-lease: that his neglect to perform that duty, has occasioned all the loss and expense which have been incurred by the Plaintiffs; and [356] that he is now liable to repay them; and that is, in substance, the relief sought by this bill.

The Defendant Benson admits that he had an interest, at first jointly with his partners, and afterwards, individually, in the rents payable by the occupying tenants; but he denies that he ever became liable to perform the covenants contained in the under-lease to Oxley and Teush; and moreover, he insists, that if he was ever liable to do the acts intended to be secured by those covenants, it could only be by an obligation in the nature of an assumpsit:—that the right of the Plaintiffs, if any, against him, accrued on the expiration of the under-lease:—and that the bill was not filed for more than six years afterwards. And therefore he insists, that the Plaintiffs' remedy, if any they ever had, is lost by the lapse of time.

Under the provisions of the agreement of the 1st of January 1810, and by reason of the dealings with and under the lease to Oxley and Teush, which afterwards took place, I am of opinion, that Mr. Benson became beneficially interested in that lease. I cannot concur in the argument that he was only entitled to an account of the rent by the occupier, without having any interest in the premises. The Defendant had, I think, all such beneficial interest in the estate as could be acquired under the lease; and having that beneficial interest, I think that he could not be exempted from the duties or burthens which appear to me, to be annexed to the beneficial interest; but as he never executed the lease, or any covenant to perform the covenants contained in the lease, it does not appear to me, that his obligation was in the nature of a covenant, or special contract. I think that the Plaintiffs were entitled to require Mr. Benson to perform the duties attached to his beneficial [357] interest in the lease, but that there being no covenant, the remedy of the Plaintiffs had no higher or stronger foundation than simple contract. Now the beneficial interest of Mr. Benson ceased on the 24th of June 1830, and the bill was not filed till the 11th of June 1838. The expense incurred in restraining Barton from committing further waste was incurred in April 1829. In the ejectment the writ of possession was obtained on the 7th of June 1831; and the right to damages for dilapidations, accrued on the expiration of the lease. It is true, that the amount of dilapidations was not ascertained till some time afterwards, but the right of the Plaintiffs accrued at the expiration of the lease, and the time must be reckoned from that period. I am, therefore, of opinion that the Plaintiffs, even if they might otherwise have been entitled to relief, are not so entitled, in consequence of their having so long delayed in filing of their bill. And the bill must be dismissed.

I have considered the costs of this case, which, prima facie, would belong to the Defendants; and if they had put in a plea, stating that point of objection which has prevailed, undoubtedly, they would have been entitled to costs; but they have put in a long defence, and stated that the Defendants had no interest whatever in the lease, and have raised points which, it appears to me, are not sustainable. I therefore think the justice of this case is satisfied by dismissing the bill without costs.

By the settlement made on the marriage of E. M., the ultimate limitation of personal property was, "to such person or persons as at the time of the death of E. M. should be her next of kin." E. M. died leaving a father, mother, and a child.

Held, that, under this limitation, the father, mother, and child took as her next of kin in joint-tenancy.

By a marriage settlement, the wife's portion was limited to the wife for life, with remainder to the husband for life, with remainder to the children of the marriage, to be vested at twenty-one or marriage; and in case none should attain that age or marry, then in trust for the brothers and sisters of the wife or their issue, as she should appoint, and in default of appointment, in trust for her next of kin. Held, that the children of the marriage were not excluded from taking under the ultimate limitation.

The Plaintiff in this cause claimed to be entitled to the sum of £10,000 comprised in the settlement made on the marriage of Henry Withy and Emily Mangles.

By the settlement, dated the 23d of August 1825, it was, amongst other things, provided, that within six months after the death of Robert Withy (the father of the intended husband), his executors should pay to the trustees of the settlement the principal sum of £5000; and that within six months after the death of James Mangles (the father of the intended wife), his executors should pay to the trustees of the settlement, the principal sum of £10,000; and the trustees were to invest the two sums, and pay the interest of the £5000 to Henry Withy for life, with remainder to Emily Mangles for her life, and the interest of the £10,000 to Emily Mangles for life, with remainder to Henry Withy for life; and after the death of the survivor, the trustees were to hold both sums, in trust for the children of the marriage, in such manner as the parents or the survivor of them should by deed or will appoint, and in default of appointment, for the only child of the marriage, if there should be but one, and if more than one, in equal shares; but the share of shares to be considered interests vested in a son or sons at twenty-one, or in a daughter or daughters at twenty-one or marriage. And in case there [359] should be no son living to attain twenty-one, and no daughter living to attain twenty-one or be married, the trustees were to stand possessed of the two sums of £5000 and £10,000, upon the trusts following, that is to say:—the sum of £5000, on trust for the executors, administrators, and assigns of Robert Withy, and the sum of £10,000 in trust for such of the brothers and sisters of the said Emily Mangles or any of their issue, in such shares, &c., as she should by will appoint; and in default of such appointment, upon trust for such person or persons, as, at the time of the death of Emily Mangles, should be her next of kin.

The marriage was duly solemnized, and there was issue of the marriage one child only, Emilius Henry Withy, who was born on the 5th of February 1828. On the 8th of February 1828 the wife died, leaving that child and her father James Mangles and her mother, her surviving; and in the course of a few days afterwards, viz., on the 15th of February 1828, Emilius Henry Withy died, leaving his father and James Mangles, his grandfather and his grandmother surviving.

Under these circumstances, the limitations of the two sums of £5000 and £10,000, in default of any child living to acquire a vested interest, took effect: and the question in this cause was, to whom the sum of £10,000, limited to "such person or persons as, at the time of the death of Emily Mangles, should be her next of kin" belonged. At the time of her death, her father, her mother and her only child were living.

The Plaintiff, the legal personal representative of Henry Withy the father, who died in 1837, and who also represented the child, insisted that the child was the next of kin, and claimed the £10,000 by virtue of the limitation.

[360] The Defendants insisted, in the first place, that by the intentions of the settlement the child was excluded; and that if the child was not excluded, then upon the construction of the settlement, the father, mother, and child were equally near of kin; and taking as joint-tenants, the representative of the child, who died first, was not entitled to anything.

Mr. Tinney, Mr. Pemberton, and Mr. Geldart, for the Plaintiff. The questions in this case are these, who, according to the law of England, is to be considered the next of kin of Mrs. Henry Withy living at her death, and whether the child of a deceased person does not take as next of kin, in priority of the parents of the deceased? "The nearness or propinquity of degree is reckoned according to the computation of the civilians." (2 Black Com. 504.) By the law of England, as well as by the civil law, in the distribution of an intestate's property, descendants are first entitled, then ascendants, and lastly, collaterals. (4 Burge's Com. 31, and see Keilway v. Keilway, Gilb. Ch. Rep. 189.) In the fourth volume of Burge's Commentaries, the rule of the civil law is thus stated, "Although the father and son are distant from the deceased in an equal degree, yet it has been seen that the son is preferred. The respective degrees in which a person is of kin to the intestate, are important only when they are of the same line. But if there are claimants of different lines, the line to which they belong is the first consideration, that of the degree is of secondary consideration. The descendant entirely excludes the ascendant, and thus the grandson, who is of the third degree, excludes the father who is of the first. The inheritance descends, rather than ascends. [361] But on failure of descendants of the deceased, the father and mother are next called to the succession, and they exclude all collaterals, except his brothers german and their children." (4 Burge's Com. 37.)

Again, by the 31 Edw. 3, c. 11, administration is to be granted to the next and next legal friends of the intestate; and by the 21 Hen. 8, c. 5, s. 3, it is to be granted to the widow of the deceased, or to the next of kin, or to both," and administration is granted in respect of interest: Crooke v. Watt (2 Vern. 124). And the right to the administration of the effects of an intestate follows the right to the property in person: In re Gill (1 Hagg. 342). It is necessary only to see who would be preferred to administration, in order to ascertain who would, as next of kin, be entitled to the property of an intestate. As to this Blackstone observes (Com. vol. 2, p. 504), "In the first place, the children, or (on failure of children) the parents of the deceased are entitled to the administration, both of which are, indeed, in the first degree, but as the children are allowed the preference." (See Godolphin's Orphans Legacy, 16.) So, the right line is, in administration, always preferred. (See 12 Mod. 623.) As in Smith's case (2 Strange, 891), a mandamus to grant administration to the father, in respect of the son's estate, there being an infant grandson, was refused. So the grandmother, being in the right line, is entitled to administration in preference to the aunt: Blackborough v. Davis (1 P. Wms. 48, and 12 Mod. 619).

Gifts to the next of kin have been held to entitle the persons who would take a personal estate in case of [362] intestacy under the Statute of Distributions (Barman's Powell's Devises, vol. i. p. 280, n., and see 3 Swinburne, 911 (7th edition)); and expressions similar to that of next of kin, have been held to mean the next of kin under the statute. Thus in Cruys v. Colman, (1) a gift "to her own family" was held to be equivalent to own kindred, and to point out the persons entitled under the statute.

The child is not excluded under the gift to the next of kin of the mother, merely because he had a provision under a previous limitation: Elmsley v. Young (2 Myl. & K. 780), Pearce v. Vincent (2 Myl. & K. 800, 2 Bing. N. C. 328, and 2 K. 230).

Mr. Kindersley and Mr. Lovat, for the representatives of the father of Mrs. Henry Withy, and Mr. J. Humphry, for the mother of Mrs. Henry Withy. By the intention of the parties to the settlement, which "is the truth and honour of the law," Woodcock v. The Duke of Dorset (3 B. C. C. 568), the children of the marriage are excluded from taking under the ultimate limitation to the "next of kin;" the only provision intended for them being that which precedes the power of appointment amongst the brothers and sisters of Mrs. Henry Withy; Bird v. Wood (2 Sim. & St. 80), Elmsley v. Young (2 Myl. & K. 780).

Secondly, under the limitation to the next of kin of the wife, her father, mother, and child took the £10,000 [363] as joint-tenants. The limitation being by deed, the construction may be different from that which would take place if the question arose under a will. It may, however, be admitted, that in the right of administering the estate of an intestate, the child and the descending line are usually preferred to the father; and that (under the statute) the children, and the representative deceased children, are, in the distribution, preferred to the parents; but the right to administer or to the succession, does not determine who are next of kindred to an intestate, for a husband would be entitled, though he be not of kindred to his wife. The question is, who are the personæ designatæ, within the terms of "next of kin" contained in the settlement. This point was finally settled by the case of Elms v. Young, which decided, that in ascertaining what parties are to take under a limitation contained in a deed, to "the next of kin," the artificial and changeable rules of distribution of an intestate's estate, are not to be regarded; but that you must go only to the fact in nature, and thus ascertain who are the nearest of kindred, and alone will be entitled to the property. In that case the question was this, who was entitled, under a limitation to the "next of kin" of Peter Elmsley; the claimants were his brother Alexander, and the children of a deceased brother John, and it was held, that the nephews, being more remote in kindred than the brother, had no right to share in the property under the limitation to the "next of kin." The same principle had been previously decided by Sir Thomas Plumer in Brandon v. Brandon (33 L. J. 312, and 3 Wilson, C. C. 14).

(1) 9 Ves. 319. Similarly a gift to "relations," Thomas v. Hole, Forrester, 251; "near relations," Whithorne v. Harris, 2 Ves. sen. 526; and "nearest relations," Gooding v. Gooding, 1 Ves. sen. 231, and Belt's Sup. 128, have been held to mean next of kin within the Statute of Distributions.

In the present case, the parents and child of the wife were equally next of kin to her at her death, for "a father is [364] certainly as near of kin to the son as the son to the father;" Collingwood v. Pace (1 Vent. 414). The consequence is, that on the death of the child the parents became entitled by survivorship, and the Plaintiff's interest.

They also cited Gardner v. Sheldon (Vaughan, 259), Carter v. Crawley (Raymond, 496), Cowden v. Clerke (Hobart, 29), and Co. Lit. 10 b.

Mr. Tinney, in reply.

July 28. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. Upon the consideration which I have been able to give to the settlement, I cannot collect any intention to exclude the child. The particular event which occurred was not contemplated; and as to the sum of £10,000 no provision was made, otherwise than by the limitation to the next of kin of Mrs. Withy. Whether a child should be next of kin, does not appear to me to have been thought of, and there was no expressed intention, and as far as I can discover, no constructive intention to include or exclude the child, I find myself under the necessity of inquiring under the circumstances, ought to be deemed to be the next of kin of Mrs. Withy at the time of her death.

The Plaintiff alleges, that according to the meaning of the expression "next of kin," which is adopted by the law of England, the child of any proposed person should be deemed his next of kin, in exclusion of his [365] father and mother. The Defendants admit, that by the law of England, the child of an intestate person is entitled to administration to the effects of such person, in preference to his father or mother, and is also entitled to the succession of the intestate's estate in preference to his father or mother; but they say, that this preference, or, as it is sometimes called, does not confound the nature of things, or make the child nearer of kin to his parent, than the parent is to his child: that the law does not administer an intestate's estate, and the right of succession to it, are the same in the civil and municipal law, and may be arbitrarily determined, in such manner as will best promote the public interests; but they allege that nearness of kin, or proximity in degree of consanguinity, is a fact in nature, and admits of no regular qualification; and the Defendants, therefore, found their claim upon this, that persons who fall properly under the description of next of kin, must be standing in equal degree of propinquity, and that the father and mother must necessarily be deemed as near of kin to their daughter, as the child of the father to her mother; and, if this were not a fact in nature, they allege, that, by the law of England, the parents and the children of any proposed person are to be deemed equally near of kin to him.

I conceive that the consideration is not what is or ought to be deemed to be the nature, but what has been understood by the law of England to be the meaning of the term "next of kin." The Defendants contend that, by the law of Eng-parents and the children of any proposed person, are to be deemed equally near of kin to him.

"The next of kin, according to the Statute of Distributions," is an expression frequently, though inaccurately, used. The statute of 22 & 23 Car. 2, c. 10 orders distribution among children and representatives of deceased children, or amongst brothers and representatives of deceased brothers; and the term "next of kin, according to the statute," comprehends persons who are of kindred in one degree, and children of children who are of kindred in a degree more remote, and brothers who are of kindred in one degree, and children of brothers who are of kindred in a degree more remote. The term "next of kin" is not accurately used in such cases, because persons, other than the next or nearest of kin, are comprised in it. And, although it has sometimes been considered, that this extended and inaccurate meaning of the term has become so far prevalent and of common use, that it might be properly attributed to the expression in a case where it was not controlled by the context, yet, in deeds and wills, the expression is often used in such a way, as to exclude any supposed intention, of comprising, amongst the next of kin, those, who being in a degree of propinquity more remote, might, under the statute, take by representation. And it has now been settled, that the expression "next of kin," when used simpliciter, does not include such persons as could only take by representation under the Statute of Distributions. To this extent, therefore, it has been determined that the persons who are entitled to distribution in case of intestacy, are not, for that reason only, to be deemed next of kin of a person deceased.

By the statute of 21 H. 8, c. 5 the Ordinary, in cases of intestacy, is to grant administration to the widow or next of kin of the deceased; and where there are several persons equal in degree of kindred, and more than one require the administration, the Ordinary is to elect [367] which shall have it. Under this statute the child is preferred to the parent, and in the passage which, in the argument, was cited from Blackstone (2 Com. 504), it is said, "In the first place the children, or (on failure of children), the parents of the deceased are entitled to the administration; both of which (i.e., the children and the parents) are indeed in the first degree, but still us, the children are allowed the preference." The child, which has preference in administration, has also preference in distribution, and it has become a rule in the Ecclesiastical Courts, that the right to administration follows the right to the property. But unless the preference can be considered as given, on the ground that the child is, by law, deemed to be nearer of kin to the intestate than the parent, we have made no advance towards a legal interpretation of the term "next of kin;" and although it does appear to me, that the common use which is made of the term "next of kin," in connection with the administration and distribution of personal estates in cases of intestacy, may occasionally have given rise to a notion, that the persons to whom the law gives the succession are legally and for all purposes to be considered as the next of kin, yet this does not appear to be a notion which can be supported in law. The instruction given to the term, "next of kin," with reference to the statute of Car. 2, shows, that the next of kin entitled to administration and distribution, are not deemed to be next of kin for all purposes; and I apprehend, that in all other cases, the term "next or nearest of kin" must be construed according to their simple and obvious meaning, or according to the legal construction of the whole instrument in which they occur.

[368] Whatever arbitrary distinctions may have been adopted in computing collateral degrees of consanguinity, all writers upon the law of England appear to concur in stating, that in the ascending and descending line the parents and the children are in equal degree of kindred to the proposed person; and I think, that, except for the purposes of administration and distribution in cases of intestacy, and except in cases where the simple expression may be controlled by the context, the law of England does consider them to be in equal degree of consanguinity.

The law of England gives a preference to the child over the parent in distribution, but I think we cannot therefore conclude, that with respect to every disposition of property, made in words to give the same to persons equally near of kin, the parents are to be held more remote than the child. If, in this case, the words of the limitation had, in any way, referred to the law of distribution, there would have been a guide to the interpretation; but there is no such reference. The will stands by themselves simply, the limitation is to the next or nearest of kin, and cannot take upon myself to say, that the settlor had in his contemplation the law of distribution of intestate's effects, and intended a limitation in conformity with the law. To act upon such an hypothesis, would be, in effect, to introduce into the settlement an implied reference to the law of distribution of personal estates in case of intestacy, and it does not appear to me that this can safely be done.

Conceiving, therefore, that by the law of England, the father, mother, and any of any proposed person are equally near of kin to such person, I am of opinion, that at the time of Mrs. Withy's death, her father, mother, and child being next of kin, the limitation took effect in their favour; and I think that they took property limited to them as joint-tenants, and consequently, that the Plaintiff has an interest in the fund in question. The bill must therefore be dismissed.

[369] THE REV. JOHN HALE v. GEORGE HALE. July 7, 8, 21, 1841.

A receiver of a partnership granted in a case where no misconduct in management was alleged, on the ground that the Defendant insisted on a legal objection as denying all right of his partner to a share in the partnership.

Receiver of a brewery granted on the application of a spiritual person who was a dormant partner therein.

This was a motion, on behalf of a dormant partner, for a receiver of partnership property, against the partner in possession.

The testator Joseph Hale, who, in his lifetime, carried on the trade of a brewer in partnership with the Defendant George Hale and two other persons, was entitled to one-fourth of the stock and profits.

In 1810 he made his will, whereby he gave his estate and effects to the Defendant and Pewtress, in trust to pay an annuity to his wife for life, and subject the trust, to pay the dividends and proceeds to the Plaintiff his son; and after the widow's decease upon trust, to transfer and pay to the Plaintiff the whole of the residuary estate. The testator appointed his wife, Pewtress, and the Defendant executors.

The testator died in 1812, and his will was proved by his wife, James Pewtress and the Defendant George Hale.

After the death of the testator, it seemed to have been proposed that the Plaintiff should succeed directly and avowedly to his father's interest in the partnership; and the parties appeared to have been about to enter into a proper agreement for that purpose, when it was suggested that it was not competent for the Plaintiff, being a spiritual person, by law, to enter into partnership in a trade or concern. The consequence was, that expedients were resorted to to vest the interest in another person for his benefit, and the executors of the testator agreed, in respect of the testator's interest, to continue partners in the concern, in relation to the residuary estate which belonged to the Plaintiff. The business continued to be carried on by them in conjunction with the other partners.

In 1815 new articles of partnership were entered into between the other partners and the Defendant and Pewtress, who represented the interest of the testator's estate.

The partnership was continued until 1820, when the two other partners and Pewtress died in 1827, and the widow died in 1832. The partnership continued until the whole interest in the partnership property having become vested in the Defendant and the Plaintiff. The Plaintiff continued to be treated as a partner in the concern, and accounts were from time to time rendered to him, which he examined and signed down to July 1840; and he received from the Defendant his share of the profits, which, from time to time, arose.

The Plaintiff became desirous of putting an end to the partnership and of withdrawing from the affairs; but in consequence of disagreements between the parties, this bill was filed for effecting that purpose. It prayed for an account of the partnership for a declaration that the Plaintiff was entitled to one-half of the profits, that the concern might be sold, and for a receiver and manager in the meantime.

[371] The Defendant insisted that the testator's share had ceased to form part of his assets, and had become the absolute property of the Plaintiff, and that by virtue of the statutes of the 21 Hen. 8, c. 13, ss. 5, 32, the 57 G. 3, c. 99, s. 3, and the 1 & 2 Viet. c. 106, ss. 29, 31, the Plaintiff was not entitled to the relief prayed by the bill; or, if that defence were untenable, he then insisted, that the accounts which had been signed by the Plaintiff were settled accounts, and that he was hereby barred from any claim to have them opened and examined; but he stated he was willing to come to a fair account with the Plaintiff if the suit was withdrawn.

It should be observed that by the first-mentioned statute (21 Hen. 8, s. 5) it is enacted that no spiritual person shall, by himself nor by any other for him, buy to sell again for profit, any cattle, &c., or merchandise, upon pain to forfeit treble the value; and it is enacted that every such contract shall be utterly void. By the thirty-second section it is provided that no spiritual person shall keep a tanhouse or beerhouse, upon certain penalties.

The 57 G. 3, c. 99 (passed in July 1817) repealed so much of the former Act as related to "buying and selling," and by the third section enacted that no spiritual person should, by himself, or by any other for him, engage in or carry on any trade or dealing for profit under certain penalties; and it enacted that every contract made by him in any such trade should "be utterly void and of none effect."

By the third-mentioned Act, 1 & 2 Viet. c. 106 (passed in August 1838), the 21 Hen. 8, c. 13, was wholly repealed; and by the twenty-ninth section it [372] is enacted, that no spiritual person shall, by himself or by any other for his use, engage in or carry on any trade or dealing for gain or profit, unless the partners shall exceed six, "or in any case in which any trade or dealing, or any share in any trade or dealing, shall have devolved or shall devolve upon any spiritual person, or upon any other person for him or to his use, under or by virtue of any devise, bequest, inheritance, intestacy, settlement, marriage, bankruptcy, or insolvency; but in none of the foregoing excepted cases shall it be lawful for such spiritual person to act as a director, managing partner, or to carry on such trade or dealing as aforesaid in person." The thirty-first section enacts that spiritual persons illegally trading may be punished, and for the third offence deprived, and contains the following proviso: "Provided always that no contract shall be deemed to be void by reason only of the same having been entered into by a spiritual person trading or dealing, either solely or jointly with any other person or persons, contrary to the provisions of this Act; but every such contract may be enforced by or against such spiritual person, either solely or jointly with any other person or persons, as the case may be, in the same way as if no spiritual person had been party to such contract."

A motion was now made on behalf of the Plaintiff for a receiver.

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Romilly, in support of the motion. The Defendant says that, because the Plaintiff is a clergyman, he has a right to exclude him from partnership property; but whatever may be the construction of the statutes, it is incompetent for the Defendant to do so after acquiescing for years, and making himself a trustee for the Plaintiff. The De-[373]-fendant, as executor, is liable to account on some footing or other.

In the case of Hall v. Franklin (3 Meeson & W. 259) one point was not brought under the consideration of the Court, namely, that where a person is a sleeping partner, not interfering with the trade, and neither buying nor selling, he does not come within penal statutes of this description. This was decided in Raynard v. Chace (Burr. 2), which was a case for penalties under the 5 Eliz. c. 4, s. 31, forbidding persons exercising trades, unless they have been apprenticed; and the business being wholly conducted by a qualified partner, it was there held by Lord Mansfield and the other Judges, that a dormant partner was not liable to the penalties. Lord Ellenborough was of the same opinion in Keen v. Dormay (15 East, 161).

The ground for this application is this, that the Defendant excludes the Plaintiff, and absolutely denies the title of his partner.

They also referred to Armstrong v. Lewis (2 Cr. & Mee. 274; and see S. C. 3 Myl. & K. 45).

Mr. Kindersley, Mr. Bethell, and Mr. Goodeve, contrâ. No right of suit can arise out of a contract to act in contravention of an Act of Parliament; Erney v. Osbaldiston (2 Myl. & Cr. 53); "for no relief can be given in a Court of Justice to those, who shew that they have thought proper to disappoint the policy of the law, and to do that which the policy of the law requires should not be done;" Harmer v. Westmacott (6 Sim. 290). Here, the Plaintiff deliberately [374] entered into the partnership with full knowledge of its legal invalidity.

The cases on the statute of Elizabeth do not apply, the object of that statute being to insure trades being carried on by competent and experienced persons, as was the case in Raynard v. Chace; but here the object is to prevent the minds of clergymen from being turned from their spiritual duties by becoming interested in the success of a trade.

No misconduct is imputed to the Defendant, and there is no exclusion, so that the grounds for a receiver are wanting.

Mr. Pemberton, in reply.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. The defence which is made by the Defendant in this cause is certainly very extraordinary. For thirty years the Defendant has admitted the interest of the Plaintiff in this partnership, and has accounted to him, from time to time, for his share of the profits. Few things then could surprise one more, than to find at the end of such a period, when legal relief is demanded on the behalf of the Plaintiff, the Defendant saying to the Plaintiff, "You are a spiritual person, and by law are entitled to no relief whatever; I admit I have had the management of that which I have considered to be your property for thirty years. I have admitted you to a share of the profits which from time to time have arisen from the concern; but now I say that you are entitled to nothing by law in respect of this property; however, when your legal title is defeated, I am willing to come to a fair account; in other words, I will account to you in such manner as I think just and right when I have established that you [375] have no lawful right whatever." Certainly a defence more singular and more likely to occasion regret to the party making such a defence when he comes seriously to consider it, one has seldom seen.

Let us consider the matter for a moment without reference to the statute. Whether this gentleman is a partner or not, would, in one sense, be entirely immaterial. That which was partnership property at the death of the testator, was continued and employed in the trade, and made profitable to those who were engaged in and had the benefit of it. It is said there was no provision to allow the executor of a deceased person, or the legatee of a deceased partner, to enter into the partnership. This is very true, but what is an executor or the legatee entitled to? Has he a right merely to the pecuniary value at the death of the testator, or has he a right to the profits which have been made by the continuing partners, by the use of the property which belonged to him by virtue of the bequest? Is there anything more clear in the law as administered in this Court, than that he is entitled to the latter? The executor of a deceased partner, or the legatee of his interest, is not obliged to submit to the statement of the account which is made by the continuing partners, clearly not in the absence of all contract to that effect, which is admitted to be the case here. He has a right to say, "I must have the actual value of my share of the partnership assets determined, and although it may be very inconvenient for you to ascertain the value in the mode prescribed by the law, yet, if we cannot otherwise agree, I must have it ascertained by the only mode by which it can be ascertained accurately, namely, by a sale for what it will fetch in the market." I apprehend that there can be no doubt that the executor and legatee have a right to have the partnership property realised, and the real value of [376] their share determined, by ascertaining the value of the surplus after satisfying all demands upon the partnership assets. That being the case, the Plaintiff, whether a partner or not, had a right to have the amount of his share ascertained by realising the whole of the property. If he were a partner, that result cannot in the least degree be doubted, for there was a partnership continuing for an indefinite time, which not having been determined, continued on the terms on which it before existed. Therefore whether he was a partner, or a legatee permitting his property to remain engaged in the partnership, trade, he would have a right, at any moment, to put an end to the partnership, by merely communicating his will to the other party; and then, of course, he would have a right to have his share of the property ascertained.

I observed in the course of the argument, and I see it warranted in some parts of the answer, that the Defendant sets up this sort of claim: he says, let the amount of the testator's share at his death be ascertained, that is what I owe you, and that I am willing to pay you; and it has been maintained throughout, that he is only entitled to have the value made out in some way, but not in the only way in which the true value can be ascertained. It appears to me that the argument in that respect is without foundation, for whether this be considered to be a portion of the residuary estate of the testator, or whether it be considered to be a share which the Plaintiff is entitled to as a partner, he has either a right to have the affairs of the partnership wound up, or to have the property which is in it ascertained in the only manner in which it can be ascertained.

It is then said, that it must be considered as a partnership, and therefore the statute applies.

[377] That is a matter of so very great importance to everybody, that I had better read the statute over very carefully before I express my opinion upon it. If I should be of opinion that the statute does not preclude the Plaintiff from relief, then the question is what is to be done in the meanwhile.

I think it a most unfortunate thing that the Defendant should have instructed those who act for him to set up this defence, because it amounts to a claim of the whole property to himself. I cannot admit the ingenious construction which is attempted to be put upon this answer. It is a denial of the right of the Plaintiff to relief of any kind, and the result of supporting the defence would be, that for anything that the law can do, the property belongs entirely to the Defendant who claims it.

Then is a partner, being a legal personal representative, having property of his own intermixed with the property of the Plaintiff, to be allowed to say, "I claim this as my own, to do with as I please, and although you have a prima facie case in this Court, you shall not interfere with my management of it at all?"

I shall read the statute, and consider of the sort of order which ought to be made. If I think the statute does not preclude the Plaintiff from relief, then I shall ask for a copy of the notice of motion. I cannot but think it would be very expedient if the parties would come to some better arrangement than by means of this Court. It has been said (and I have said it myself) that I am very reluctant to interfere in a case where there is no insolvency or difficulty of that sort. The Defendant does not devote a very large portion of his time to the business, but that may not be necessary: nothing, how-[378]ever, is made out against him as to his management of the property, and, therefore, there is not the least reason, upon the ground of any misconduct, to deprive him of the possession. The reason to deprive him of the possession of the property (if it be a sufficient reason) is, that he claims the whole property for himself by the means which he has set out in his answer.

July 21. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS said that he had considered the case, and was of opinion that the Plaintiff was entitled to a receiver and manager.

The Defendant appealed, but the cause coming on before the Lord Chancellor on the 21st of December 1841, the matter was referred to arbitration.

[379] BONSER v. COX. March 1, 2, 5, 1841.

D. 789; Ward v. National Bank of New Zealand, 1883, 8 App. Cas. 764; In re Wolmershausen, 1890, 62 L. T. 545.]

A. agreed to become a surety for B. in a joint and several bond to C., and B. was to give a counter bond of indemnity to A. The bond to C. was executed by A. only; but B. executed the counter bond to A. Held, that A., the surety, was released.

R II.—13

A. gave to C. a promissory note, as surety for B., upon an agreement that C. should advance the amount to B. by draft, at three months' date. C. made the advance immediately to B., and not by draft at three months. Held, that the surety was released.

All persons interested in the Master's report are entitled to be heard in support of it, but none but the excepting party can be heard against it.

This cause came on upon exceptions to the Master's report, and related to claims on the estate of Mr. John Cox deceased, for the administration of whose estate this suit had been instituted.

It appeared that Richard Cox (the brother of the testator John Cox) carried on the business of a banker at Oxford, in partnership with Messrs. Morrell, under the firm of Cox & Morrell; and he was also engaged in a colliery business in the Forest of Dean, in partnership with D. Davies, under the firm of Cox & Davies.

Messrs. Cox & Morrell had made considerable advances to Messrs. Cox & Davies, and Richard Cox having applied to his partners for a further advance, it was agreed that they should advance a further sum upon his brother John Cox becoming security for the repayment of £3000. John Cox agreed, as surety for Richard Cox, to execute a joint and several bond to James and John Morrell for the sum of £3000, upon having a counter bond for the like sum from Messrs. Cox & Davies, to indemnify him.

A joint and several bond, intended to be executed by Richard Cox and John Cox, was prepared, and was carried by a clerk to John Cox for his execution, and was accordingly executed it. The same clerk afterwards went to the house of Richard Cox, to obtain his execution, but he, being from home, did not then execute it, and the bond having been mislaid, was never, in fact, executed by Richard Cox.

[380] The counter bond was, however, given by Richard Cox and Davies to John Cox, and the further advances were made by the bankers to Messrs. Cox & Davies. Some time after Richard Cox ceased to be a partner in the bank.

In this suit Messrs. Morrell claimed before the Master the sum of £3000 and interest, as due upon the bond, from the estate of John Cox. The claim was resisted, on the ground that John Cox was a mere surety, and that the bankers, having neglected to obtain a bond from the principal debtor, had released the surety.

The claim was disallowed by the Master, and Messrs. Morrell took exceptions to the Master's report, which now came on for argument.

Mr. Bethell and Mr. Anderdon, in support of the exceptions. The ground on which the Master decided is this; he was of opinion that the bond was valid, but he decided, that, not being executed by Richard Cox, the surety was placed in a condition less favourable than he ought to have been; on that ground alone he disallowed the claim of Messrs. Morrell. This might have been so if there had been no counter bond given, but here the rights and interests of the surety were preserved and protected by the counter bond given by Richard Cox and Davies. Though not executed by Richard Cox, the instrument, being joint and several, is valid as against the estate of John Cox, who executed it (Sheppard's Touches, 69): Mathewson's case (5 Coke, 23 a.), Elliot v. Davis (2 Bos. & P. 338), Hawkshaw v. Parkins (2 Swan. 539), Underhill v. Horwood (10 Ves. 225), Prendergast v. Devey (6 Mad. 124), Hulme v. Coles (3 Sim. 12), were cited.

[381] If John Cox had paid the amount of the bond, he could not have enforced it against Richard Cox; Copis v. Middleton (Turn. & Russ. 224).

Mr. G. Richards and Mr. Dixon, for the executors. John Cox, being a mere surety, became released, in consequence of the creditor not having obtained the signature of Richard Cox to the bond; for the former only agreed to execute a bond, in which Richard Cox, the principal, was to join. The remedies of Messrs. Morrell against Richard Cox were not therefore such as were contracted for by the surety, who is consequently released. Such it is admitted would be the case if no counter bond had been given, but that cannot have the effect of affixing Richard Cox's signature to the bond to the bankers, which was contracted for by the surety.

If John Cox had paid the bond, he would, according to the practice stated in Copis v. Middleton, have got it assigned to a friend and have kept it on foot. Leaf v.

Gibbs (4 Car. & P. 466), Calvert v. The London Dock Company (2 Keen, 638, and 7 Ad. & E. 143), Bowmaker v. Moore (7 Price, 223), Capel v. Butler (2 S. & S. 457), Samuel v. Howarth (3 Mer. 272), were cited.

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Keene, for the Plaintiff, were proceeding to argue against the exceptions, when

Mr. Bethell objected, that they could not be heard on this occasion. He argued that, as in the Master's office the contest was between the exceptant and the executors alone, another creditor had now no right to be heard.

[382] THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS. The rule is, that all persons interested in the Master's report are entitled to be heard in support of it; but nobody but the party who has excepted can be heard in support of the exceptions.

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Keene then proceeded. The surety can only be charged upon the contract which he has agreed to enter into, and is released if it be varied. A surety agreeing to enter into a bond which is joint and several, cannot be made liable on one which is several only; Whitcher v. Hall (5 Barn. & C. 269), Parsons v. Cole (2 Vern. 608), Mayhew v. Crickett (2 Swan. 185), Boulbee v. Stubbs (18 Ves. 20).

Mr. Bethell, in reply, insisted that the surety had not been damnified.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. I think that it cannot, upon any principles on which this Court acts, be doubted, that the surety has an interest, and a most material interest, in the rights and remedies which the creditor has against the principal debtor; he is not to be held bound where the situation of circumstances, in respect to the rights and the remedies which the creditor has against the principal debtor, are different from that which was contemplated by himself and all other parties. I do not think that it is material to enquire in what way the surety contemplated benefit or protection to himself, by stipulating that a particular remedy should be held by the creditor against the principal debtor. A man may reasonably say, I will be surety to you for payment of such a sum, [383] provided you have it secured by the bond of the principal debtor, but I will not be surety upon any other terms. The surety in this case has a right to say, "The arrangement was, that Mr. Richard Cox as well as myself should be held bound by bond to the creditor: that arrangement never was carried into effect." The circumstance of Mr. Richard Cox being held by bond to the surety, does not appear to be material in this case.

I think that this exception cannot be sustained; that the Master is right, because the surety had not that which he contemplated, and that which was a material portion of the contract stipulated for by him at the time when he entered into this obligation. In the contract, as existing between the principal debtor and the creditor, there is a departure from that which the surety stipulated for, and in a matter in which, I conceive, the surety had a most material interest. This exception must therefore be overruled. (This decision was affirmed by Lord Cottenham, June 25, 1841.)

March 5. There were two other exceptions argued, in which the Master of the Rolls reserved judgment, the facts of which are fully stated in his judgment.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS. In October 1831, two bills for £500 each, drawn by Davies on Richard Cox, at three months' date, and accepted by him, were nearly due. And at the same time, another bill for £750, drawn by David Davies on John Cox, and accepted by him for the accommodation of Davies, was nearly due. John Cox, to enable Richard Cox to obtain from Cox and Morrell, money [384] wherewith to meet the two bills for £500 each, and to enable Davies to provide for the bill of £750, joined Richard Cox in signing two promissory notes, one for £999, 10s., and the other for £750, to Cox and Morrell. Each of these notes was expressed to be given "for value received, by a draft at three months' date."

In giving these notes, John Cox was a mere surety; the purposes for which the notes were given are admitted, and from the words of the notes, it is plain, that the surety became liable upon a contract, whereby Cox and Morrell were to advance the money upon a three months' credit.

A question was raised, whether the money advanced upon the notes was applied for the purposes intended by the surety; and if it were necessary to decide that question, I should have considerable difficulty in doing so upon the evidence as it now stands; but, upon consideration, it does not appear to me that it is necessary to come to any determination upon that point; for taking the fact to be, as alleged by the Messrs. Morrell, that in both cases their advances upon the notes were made for and applied to purposes intended by the surety, still those advances were not made by drafts upon a three months' credit, but directly in cash, within that time, and in such a way as to give to them, upon each advance, an immediate demand against the principal debtor. I conceive the intention to have been, that the principal debtor should have the means of obtaining money, without being liable to any proceedings to compel repayment till the expiration of three months, and that by the mode of advance which was adopted, the principal debtor became, on each advance, immediately liable to a proceeding for the recovery of money paid to his use.

[385] The right of the creditor against the principal debtor was thus materially different from that which was intended by the surety; and I think that it was not a sufficient answer to say, that no demand was made upon the surety within the three months for which credit was to be given.

In the case of Bacon v. Cheony (1 Stark, 192), before Lord Ellenborough at Nisi Prius he said, "If I engage to guarantee, provided eighteen months' credit be given, the party is not at liberty to give twelve, and after the expiration of six more to call upon me;" and so in this case, John Cox having become surety provided three months' credit were given, I think that Messrs. Morrells were not at liberty to pay upon less credit, and after the expiration of three months to call upon John Cox.

If the drafts had been given as intended, they might have been discounted; but in that case the payments would have been on the discounts, and the drafts would have been on the discounts, and the drafts would have run their course, and have afforded the credit contracted for; but as Messrs. Morrells did not give the credit, on the faith of which the surety became liable, I think they released him, and, consequently, these exceptions must be overruled.

NOTE.—The Lord Chancellor, on appeal, referred these exceptions back to the Master, and (as I have been informed), without overruling the principle of this decision. [10 L. J. Ch. 395.]

[386] HENLEY v. STONE. March 26, 1841.

Liberty to amend was given to the Plaintiff, on the terms of his doing so within three weeks. The amendment was however made after the expiration of that time. The Court, though of opinion that leave ought to have been obtained to file the amended bill, refused to direct the amended bill to be taken off the file, on the ground of the conduct of the Defendant, who had promised to draw up the order, but had neglected doing so, and had thereby created the delay.

An order, giving costs to the Defendant, and liberty to amend to the Plaintiff, though bespoken and paid for by the Defendant, may nevertheless be obtained by the Plaintiff.

On the 4th of December, a plea to the whole bill having been allowed with costs (3 Beavan, 355), liberty was given to the Plaintiff to amend her bill, she amending the office copies, and "undertaking to amend her bill within three weeks from that time."

On the 7th of December the Defendant's solicitor bespoke and paid for the order.

On the 21st of December the Plaintiff's solicitor, having obtained the intended amendments of the bill from his counsel, applied at the registrar's office for the order, and found it had been bespoken and paid for by the Defendant's solicitor. He thereupon informed the Defendant's solicitor, that if he did not take away the order, he (the Plaintiff's solicitor) would do so. On the 29th of December the Defendant's solicitor, in answer, stated that he had the order, and would pass the same at the opening of the offices. The Christmas vacation then intervened; the Plaintiff's solicitor afterwards made several applications to the Defendant's solicitor to get him to pass the order, but which was not done until the 20th of January. The Plaintiff obtained a copy and filed the amendments on the 23d.

It was now moved, on behalf of the Defendant, that the amended bill might be taken off the file for irregularity, on the ground that it had been filed after the [387] expiration of the three weeks mentioned in the order of the 4th of December.

In answer to the application, the Plaintiff's solicitor stated on affidavit, "that he desired to be allowed to pass the said order himself, and offered to pay for it accordingly, but was informed by the registrar that the said order having been bespoken by the Defendant's solicitor, could not be passed by the Plaintiff's solicitor, nor could he have an office copy of it until it should be passed by the Defendant's solicitor; and that he, the Plaintiff's solicitor, thereupon enquired of the said registrar, how he could compel the Defendant's solicitor to pass the order, and was informed that the only way was to apply to the Court for that purpose."

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. James Russell, in support of the motion.

Mr. Kindersley and Mr. Mylne, contra.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. The Plaintiff obtained an order to amend on the 4th of December, undertaking to amend within three weeks. The order having been obtained, I apprehend it was open to either party to have it passed and entered. Both parties had an interest in it, the Defendant to obtain the costs, and the Plaintiff to obtain the authority to amend. The course pursued by the Plaintiff was to prepare to act on the order before she applied for it. The draft bill was amended by counsel on the 21st of November, and before she had made any application for the order. The Defendant had applied for the order on the 7th of December, and I have not the least doubt but that, with using due diligence, he might have ob-[388]-tained the order on the 9th, perhaps on the same day on which he applied for it. However, he bespoke the order and paid for it. This was unknown to the Plaintiff who had prepared the amendments, and she was afterwards told that the order had been bespoken and paid for by the Defendant. She seems to have then understood that she could not obtain the order, because it had been ordered and paid for by the Defendant. I find that is not so, for, though bespoken by one party, it may be obtained by the other party. The consequence was, that she did not use all the means in her power to obtain the order. It is clear that she relied, and had some reason to rely, on the Defendant to prosecute the order, for a communication was made to the Plaintiff's solicitor, which, if made in good faith and prosecuted, would most probably have obtained the order in time to comply with the exigency of the order.

When, however, the time had expired, and when the Plaintiff could not comply with the order, the bill was amended.

The time having expired, the amended bill was not regularly filed, and I think that leave ought to have been obtained by the Plaintiff, to file the bill notwithstanding the lapse of time.

The question, however, now is, whether the conduct of the Defendant was such that he ought to avail himself of the irregularity; I am of opinion that he has so conducted himself, that he has not a right to avail himself of that irregularity; and I must therefore refuse the order, but without costs.

[389] HENLEY v. STONE. July 6, 1841.

A second plea for want of parties is valid where the objection is first introduced by an intermediate amendment of the bill.

A plea, that A. B., an equitable mortgagee by deposit of title-deeds, was not a party, overruled, the bill alleging that the deeds were in the Defendant's possession, but the plea, though alleging a deposit generally, not stating distinctly that they were deposited with A. B., or that they still remained in his hands.

This bill was filed to set aside a purchase alleged to have been fraudulently obtained, and the vendor having got in an old mortgage, the bill also sought a redemption of that mortgage.

The Defendant, on a former occasion, had pleaded that certain persons interested in the equity of redemption had not been made parties to the suit, and the plea, on argument, was allowed. (3 Beavan, 355.)

The Plaintiff amended her bill by adding these parties and otherwise; whereupon the Defendant Stone filed a second plea for want of parties; by which, after tracing the devolution of the mortgage, and after stating how it became vested in the Defendant Thurley, it stated, that before the filing of the bill, Thurley applied to W. E. Johnson to lend her £200; which he agreed to do, upon having the same secured to him by a deposit of the said thereinbefore mentioned indenture. It then stated as follows:—"and Thurley, on the 3d of July 1840, deposited the same accordingly, and at the same time received the sum of £200 from the said W. E. Johnson; which said sum, together with an arrear of interest, is now due and owing to him on such security as aforesaid." And therefore he pleaded that Johnson was a necessary party to the suit.

The plea now came on for argument.

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Giffard, in support of the plea, contended, that under these circumstances, Johnson [390] was a necessary party, and that the suit could not proceed in his absence.

Mr. Kindersley and Mr. Mylne, contra, contended, first, that this was a second dilatory which could not be allowed. Rawlins v. Dalton (3 Y. & C. 447), Anon. (Moseley, 207), Ritchie v. Aylwin (15 Ves. 79. See Bosanquet v. Marsham, 4 Sim. 573; Robertson v. Lord Londonderry, 5 Sim. 226; Prosser v. Edmonds, 1 Y. & C. 481; Rowley v. Eccles, 1 Sim. & St. 511).

Secondly, that there was no general rule that all incumbrancers ought to be made parties.

Thirdly, that the plea was to the whole relief and discovery, and the Defendant, by giving part of the discovery by his plea, had overruled it.

Fourthly, that the statement was not sufficient as to the deposit; for the deeds were by the bill alleged to be in the possession of the Defendant, and it did not appear by the plea in whose possession they now were.

Mr. Pemberton, in reply. This does not come within the rule of a second dilatory, because the bill has been amended, and the Plaintiff's case has been varied; besides which, the Court cannot look out of the present record to take notice of a former plea. Secondly, though prior incumbrancers may not be necessary parties, yet all persons having a claim in respect of the same charge, which is sought by the bill to be redeemed, must be made parties to the suit. Thirdly, the discovery objected to is given as part of the averments of the plea, and therefore does not come within the rule. And fourthly, the deeds are distinctly stated to have been deposited with [391] Johnson at the time of the advance of £200; they must, therefore, be assumed to be still in his possession. (Ellice v. Goodson, 3 Myl. & Cr. 653.)

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. Nobody can doubt that it is the duty of a Defendant who puts in a plea for want of parties, to state plainly and distinctly what his objections are; and if his case is, that the suit is defective for want of several parties, then, if he makes his objections as to one, two, three, and four persons, but retains a fifth whom he may bring forward by plea at a subsequent occasion, such a proceeding would be extremely improper.

Where, however, a Defendant puts in a plea for want of parties, which is allowed, and liberty is given to the Plaintiff to amend his bill, it may happen that the amendment of the bill may bring forward additional circumstances to shew that some other persons are necessary parties, in addition to those brought forward in the plea. There could not be a greater injustice than to preclude a Defendant from taking the objection for want of parties, which is for the first time introduced by the amendment.

If such be the rule, that fact must be the subject of consideration, and the Court must look to the former plea and to the record; and I apprehend that the Court has always a right to look to its own records to see what has taken place in the case. (Ellice v. Goodson, 3 Myl. & Cr. 653.)

In this case the objection formerly made for want of parties, was not because a person entitled to a mortgage had not been made a party, but because one interested in the equity of redemption had not been [392] brought before the Court. The objection now is, that there is a person interested in the mortgage sought to be redeemed who is not a party. It is however unnecessary for me to decide the other question and the objections raised to the plea, because I think that the plea is defective in point of form. A Defendant, objecting by plea that a certain person is a necessary party, is bound to state the transactions in respect of which he had become a necessary party. I think that the circumstances of this equitable mortgage ought to be clearly and distinctly set out, so as to shew that when the party is added, the defect will be cured, and an end will be put to it.

It is impossible to ascertain now whether, if Johnson were made a party, the objection would be removed; it is only to be ascertained by inference in whose hands the deposit was made, and if this person were made a party, the Defendant might again object that some other person in whose hands the deeds now are is still a necessary party. The plea is defective, and must be overruled.

[392] HENLEY v. STONE. June 26, 29, 1841.

Proper form of order on obtaining further time to answer, on condition of a serjeant-at-arms, under the 21st Order (1833).

Where a Defendant obtains further time to answer, on condition of his entering his appearance with the registrar and consenting to a serjeant-at-arms, but neglects so to do, the Court cannot compulsorily direct it to be done.

The Defendant Stone appeared to the bill on the 29th of March, and his time for answering would consequently have expired on the 24th of May; but in the meantime he applied to the Master and obtained a month's further time to answer, from the 10th of May, upon the conditions mentioned in the 21st General [393] Order, 1833 (Ordines Can. 50), viz., of entering his appearance with the registrar, and consenting to a serjeant-at-arms, as in the case of a commission of rebellion returned "non est inventus."

The Defendant accepted the terms, and on the 20th of May procured the order to be drawn up; by which it was ordered that Stone should have a month's time from the 10th of May "to plead, answer, or demur, not demurring only, but that the Defendant should enter his appearance, and consent to a serjeant-at-arms," &c.

The Defendant, however, neither entered his appearance nor consented, although his solicitor, being threatened with an attachment, by letter dated the 1st of June, promised to enter the appearance and file the answer in due time.

On the 9th of June the Defendant filed a plea, and on the same day the Plaintiff gave notice of motion "that it might be ordered that Stone should forthwith enter his appearance with the registrar, pursuant to the order of the 10th of May."

The motion was now made.

Mr. Kinderley and Mr. Mylne contended, that the Defendant was now bound to perform his undertaking and to perform the condition of the order, the benefit of which he had accepted on those terms.

Mr. C. P. Cooper and Mr. James Russell, contra. The appearance with the registrar must be voluntary, as the whole proceeding is founded on consent. The order [394] ought to have been drawn up by the Defendant, and not by the Plaintiff, and if the Defendant neglects doing so, the Plaintiff is at liberty to proceed as if no order had been made. In Judd v. Wartonaby (2 Myl. & K. 813), Sir C. C. Pepys decided that he could not compel a Defendant to enter his appearance, &c., under such an order, and he was of opinion "that a compulsory consent could not be the effect of any conditional order." A party cannot be compelled to consent.

[THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS. I do not understand how it was that this order came to be drawn up before the appearance and consent had been entered with the registrar.]

Mr. Kinderley, in reply.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. I will not decide this case now, though I confess I should have great difficulty in making the order asked.

I presume the Master intended to make the ordinary order, but I cannot say that I think he has done so. If this had been the ordinary order, it would have been, "That upon the Defendant entering his appearance with the registrar by his clerk in Court in six days" (see Hinde, 144), he should have the month's time; that is, he is to have the time on submitting to the condition imposed; but until he has submitted, he is not to have the benefit of the order. The order ought not to be available until the condition has been performed, and he cannot have the benefit until his Six Clerk has signed the consent and appearance. The consequence of not accepting the condition is, that the Defendant loses all the benefit of [396] the order, and is subject to all the consequences of not answering as if no order had been made.

The communication made by the Defendant's solicitor, unless made bond fide, is improper, and requires explanation; but the order which is asked against the Defendant, cannot be granted for the purpose merely of punishing the bad faith of the solicitor. I should have the greatest difficulty in making the order which is asked, and my present impression is, that I cannot make it.

His Lordship added, "I have frequently said, in this place, that I never knew an experienced solicitor consent to a serjeant-at-arms in order to avoid an attachment for want of answer. Nobody would, on consideration, subject himself to such stringent conditions to avoid an attachment."

The case stood over, but ultimately no order was made.

[395] PARKER v. BULT. August 9, 1841.

The term "injunction causes," in the Fifth Order of April 1828, means those cases only in which the injunction depends on the exceptions; and not causes in which an injunction is prayed, or has been dissolved.

Where, therefore, an injunction had been obtained and dissolved, the Plaintiff cannot refer the exceptions for insufficiency until the expiration of eight days.

In this case the Plaintiff obtained the common injunction for want of answer, which, on the 22d of April, was extended to stay trial. The Defendant put in an answer on the 18th of June, and on the same day obtained an order nisi to dissolve the injunction. On the 10th of July the Plaintiff attempted to shew cause [396] for the merits, but, having failed, the injunction was dissolved.

On the 26th of July the Plaintiff filed exceptions to the answer of the Defendant and referred them the same day.

By the 5th Order of April 1828 (Ordines Can. 6), it is ordered, "that where exceptions, taken to an answer for insufficiency, are not submitted to, the Plaintiff may, at the expiration of eight days after the exceptions are delivered, but not before, unless in injunction causes, refer such answer for insufficiency."

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Colvile, for the Defendant, now moved to discharge the order of reference for irregularity, contending that the Plaintiff was not at liberty to refer the exceptions until the expiration of eight days after their delivery, inasmuch as that the Defendant might have an opportunity of putting in a further answer. They contended that the term "injunction causes," in the 5th General Order, did not mean causes in which an injunction was prayed, or had been obtained, but causes in which the obtaining or continuing of an injunction depended on the fate of the exceptions. They cited Candler v. Partington (6 Mad. 102) and Brooks v. Brooks (8 Sim. 558).

Mr. James Russell, contra. A Plaintiff in possession of an injunction cannot refer the exceptions instantly; but that is not the present case. This motion must be decided on the express terms of the 5th Order, which gives the Defendant eight days to put in a further answer, except "in injunction causes:" [397] this case comes within the exception, being an injunction cause, and moreover one in which an injunction was actually obtained.

Mr. Pemberton, in reply.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. It seems to me that the expression "injunction causes," in this General Order, means those causes only in which the injunction depends on the exceptions. The order must therefore be discharged.

[397] CHARLTON v. RICHMOND. May 7, 1842.

the twelve days for setting down a demurrer under the 34th General Order of August 1841, are not office days.

By the 34th of the orders of August 1841 (Ordines Can. 174) it is ordered "That where the Defendant shall file a demurrer to the whole bill, the demurrer shall be held sufficient, and the Plaintiff be held to have submitted thereto, unless the Plaintiff shall, within twelve days from the expiration of the time allowed to the Defendant for such demurrer, cause the same to be set down for argument."

In the present case the Defendant filed a demurrer to the whole bill on the 28th March. The Plaintiff never set it down for argument, but on the 11th of April obtained an order of course to amend on payment of 20s. costs; and he amended the bill accordingly.

[398] The Defendant now moved to discharge the order of the 11th of April, that the bill as amended might be taken off the file for irregularity with costs.

An affidavit was filed in opposition, stating that the Defendant's time for demurring expired on the 29th of March, and that the registrar's office was shut for the Easter days from the 25th of March to the 4th of April, on which day the demurrer was filed at the registrar's office.

Mr. Pemberton, in support of the motion. The Defendant's time for demurring expired on the 29th of March, and therefore the demurrer ought to have been set down by the Plaintiff for argument within twelve days after the 29th of March, or at latest on the 10th of April. This was not done, and therefore by the express words of the General Order referred to, the demurrer must be held sufficient, and the Plaintiff be held to have submitted thereto. It was consequently irregular to obtain an order to amend.

Mr. Tinney and Mr. Bagshawe, contrâ. The order of August 1841 must be construed with reference to the old practice. By the 14th of Lord Coventry's Ordinances (Ord. 77) the demurrer is to be set down within eight days after it is put down to be allowed without motion. Now it has been held that these eight days are eight office days; Bullock v. Edington (1 Sim. 481; and see Boys v. Morgan, 9 Sim. 262). The twelve days, therefore, in this case must mean twelve office days, since the Defendant would have eight office days, while the Plaintiff would not have the same advantage. If any other construction were put on this order, then if twelve days elapsed while the offices were closed [399] it would be impossible to comply with the exigency of the order.

In all events, an opportunity ought to be given to the Plaintiff of setting the bill right.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. A very ingenious argument has been used to shew that the General Order ought not to have been expressed as it is, in cases may arise in which the operation of the order would produce the greatest inconvenience. But has there been anything in this case which ought to deprive the Plaintiff of the benefit of the order? The demurrer was filed on the 28th of March, and in the regular course of business the Plaintiff must have had some notice of it, and must have had an opportunity of doing what was necessary. The duty of the Plaintiff was to enter the demurrer with the registrar within eight days, and he did so on the 4th of April; the complaint is, that he did not take all the time he might have taken under the decision referred to. On the 11th of April, and after the demurrer had under the Thirty-fourth Order become sufficient, the Plaintiff obtained an order to amend, and the question is, if this proceeding was regular; I think it is so according to the terms of the Thirty-fourth Order, the demurrer was then set, and I cannot think, if the order is to be applied at all, that there is any inconvenience in this case. The proceeding of the Defendant was quite regular, and though I regret the consequences, yet it is absolutely necessary, if these General Orders are to be obeyed at all, to act strictly on them. The motion must be granted with costs, but the Plaintiff will not be prevented filing a new bill if he should be so minded.

Ordered with costs by L. C. 3d of December 1842.

R. II.—13*

[400] STUBBS v. SARGON. April 16, 1841.

A party consenting to the alteration of a date of an order after it had been served cannot object that the order, as altered, has not been served on him.

And order was made on Horner, a purchaser under the Court, to pay his purchase money into Court before the 10th of March.

This order was duly served, and the time expired without Horner having obeyed the order. The Accountant-General would not receive the money after the expiration of the time and by consent between the parties, and to prevent the necessity of a new order the registrar altered the order, and substituted the 17th of March for the 10th.

Horner still made default, and

Mr. Pemberton now moved for the four-day order.

Mr. Cooper, contra, objected that the order directing the payment of the money before the 17th had not been served, and contended that this application could not be granted.

Mr. Pemberton, in reply. There was but one order, altered, it is true, with the consent of all parties, and for the convenience of Horner.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale] said he could not allow the purchaser to take advantage of this objection, as it would be a positive fraud upon the parties.

[401] ADDIS v. CAMPBELL. May 3, 4, 5, 8, 1841.

B. purchased a reversionary interest of A. at a gross undervalue, and under circumstances which rendered the transaction void in equity, C. had notice of the invalidity of the contract, but ten years afterwards he purchased the reversion of B., paying to B. the full value; A. joined in the conveyance and confirmed the sale. The Court, being of opinion that C. had not taken proper steps to protect A. in the second transaction, set it aside, and decreed a reconveyance, on repayment of the consideration given by B. to A. in the first transaction.

This suit was instituted for the purpose of setting aside a sale of a reversionary interest, on the ground of fraud and inadequate consideration, under the following circumstances:—

In the year 1818 a freehold and copyhold estate in Norfolk, stated to produce about £600 a year, stood limited to the following uses: i.e., to the use of Francis Gostling for life, with remainder to his first and other sons in tail, with remainder to his daughters in tail, with remainder to Mildred Addis for life, with remainder to Henry Joseph Addis, her son in tail, &c., &c. Trustees were in the usual manner interposed to preserve contingent remainders.

[402] Mildred Addis died in July 1818. Francis Gostling, the first tenant for life, was then a widower without children, and of the age of sixty-four years. Subject therefore to the life-estate of Francis Gostling, and the contingency of his having issue, Henry Joseph Addis was then entitled in remainder in tail to the estate in question.

Henry Joseph Addis was, at this time, of the age of thirty-eight, of a reckless, improvident and abandoned character; and having, in April 1818, committed a felony at Margate, he absconded, and was in a state of great destitution. In the following month of August he entered into a treaty with John Crook, a Quaker residing at Norwich, for the sale to him of his contingent reversionary interest in the lands in question.

The opinion of an actuary was taken by Crook as to the value of the reversion, the age of the tenant for life and the rental being somewhat understated. The actuary was of opinion, that, exclusive of the contingency of Francis Gostling having issue, the value was nearly £8000, and stated that the contingency referred to was not capable of computation, but that not more than one-third of the price ought to be deducted for the contingency. This deduction being made, the value appeared to be between £5000 and £8000. This treaty having become known to Charles Addis, a solicitor, who was the cousin of Henry Joseph Addis, he endeavoured to cause the sale of the reversion to be made by auction, and this course was also advised by Francis Gostling, as the mode by which it would fetch its value. During a short period John Crook affected at least to concur in this object; instructions were given to an auctioneer, and the property was advertised for sale by auction; but before the day of sale had arrived, Crook succeeded in [403] obtaining a private contract for the sale of the reversion of the greatest part of the land to himself for £500, Henry Joseph Addis covenanting to suffer a recovery on the death of Francis Gostling, and to levy a fine in the meantime. This contract having been communicated to Charles Addis, he "upbraided Crook with having made an unconscionable bargain, and of acting unfairly in procuring Henry Joseph Addis to sign a contract in the absence of any professional adviser;" and he prevailed on Crook to give his bond to Henry Joseph Addis for the payment of £800 when he, Crook, should obtain possession of the land under the contract. The remainder of the property was afterwards subjected to the contract, the consideration money was then increased to £625, and the money secured by the bond was increased to £1000. In the result, on the 20th of April 1819 Henry Joseph Addis received £650 and the bond for £1000 payable when Crook should obtain possession of the estate, and conveyed his interest to Crook by deed and fine.

Francis Gostling appeared to have been perfectly well aware of the fraudulent nature of the sale to Crook, and he expressed in strong terms his opinion of the transaction. In letters written by him in the years 1818 and 1819, he, amongst other things, expressed a hope "that some of the family would dispute the sale," and stated also, "that by filing a bill in Chancery it might be set aside," and that Henry J. Addis "had sold the reversion for less than one year's rent."

In 1820 Henry J. Addis returned to Margate, where he was apprehended, tried, and convicted of the felony, and was sentenced to seven years' transportation. Subsequent to the expiration of his imprisonment, he returned [404] to Margate, and in 1827 became an inmate in the workhouse.

In 1828 a communication seemed to have taken place between Mr. Costigan, a Catholic priest, resident at Margate, and Francis Gostling, respecting Henry J. Addis; and in a letter written by Mr. Gostling to the former, he expressed himself as follows:—"The attempt was made to file a bill in Chancery against the man who bought Henry's reversion by private contract, as the Chancellor sets aside all purchases of this nature, in which he must have succeeded. It was advertised to have been sold by public auction, but the Quaker attended on Henry some weeks in London, and paid for £500; nothing like one year's rent of the estates. A more rascally transaction was hardly ever known. A further bond was procured by Mr. Charles Addis for £1000, payable when this man got possession of the property, which bond Henry sold to the Quaker's friend for £50, as I am well informed."

On the 15th of May 1828 Gostling contracted with Crook to purchase the reversionary interest in the property (with an inconsiderable exception) for £6500; at which sum it was then valued by a land agent and valuer, and Crook engaged to procure the signature of Henry Joseph Addis. The necessary deeds were prepared by Crook's solicitor at Norwich, and were also perused and settled by him, on behalf of Henry Joseph Addis, but no communication appeared to have taken place between this solicitor and Henry Joseph Addis. In these deeds Henry Joseph Addis joined and he concurred in the conveyance to Gostling. The deeds being engrossed, were carried by Crook to Margate, and on his arrival at that place Henry Joseph Addis, who was an inmate in the workhouse, was sent for to the inn. [405] What then took place was detailed in the evidence of the landlord, as follows:—

"Henry Joseph Addis came to my house, and an interview took place there between the said John Crook and the said Henry Joseph Addis, in my presence, in which the said John Crook took out a bundle of parchments, and said, that he had got some writings which he wanted him, the said Henry Joseph Addis, to sign, and he added, addressing the said Henry Joseph Addis, 'If you behave honourably to me, I will to you.' They then left my house together, for the purpose of going to the office of Mr. Dearn, a solicitor of Margate, and returned, in a short time, to my house; upon which, I asked the said John Crook, whether the business had been accomplished to his satisfaction, and whether the said Henry Joseph Addis had complied with his wishes, to which the said John Crook replied in the affirmative; and upon my asking him whether the purchase which he had made of the said Henry Joseph Addis was an advantageous one, he replied, that it was very much so, and stated that he had cleared £6000 by it, and that he had given the said Henry Joseph Addis, £640 for his right to the property. I then observed, that the said Henry Joseph Addis was in very distressed circumstances, and that I hoped that, as he the said John Crook had made so good a bargain, he would bear him in mind; and upon the said John Crook asking me what I thought he ought to do for the said Henry Joseph Addis, I replied, that I thought that he could not do less than allow him £1 a week during the remainder of his the said John Crook's life. This the said John Crook readily consented to do, and he requested me to take the trouble of making the payment to the said Henry Joseph Addis weekly, which I agreed to do."

[406] The deeds were executed on the 5th of September 1828, and in pursuance thereof three recoveries were suffered of the property, which became thereby limited to Gostling in fee-simple.

It appeared that Crook, from time to time, and particularly about the time of the second contract, doled out small sums of money to Henry Joseph Addis, and from the execution of the second conveyance to the time of Crook's death, the £1 a week and other trifling sums were paid by him to Henry Joseph Addis. He also bought up his £1000 bond for the sum of £400.

Crook died in 1841, Addis died in the workhouse in 1832, and the Plaintiff, his eldest son, attained twenty-one in 1834. Mr. Gostling died in July 1835, aged eighty, and his interest was represented in this suit by the Defendant Mr. Campbell and others.

This bill was filed in May 1838 against the representatives of Crook and the representatives of Gostling, for the purpose above stated. The estate was now valued at £20,950. The valuation now made of the reversion in 1818, independent of the contingency, was somewhat above £11,000.

The case is reported, on an interlocutory application, in 1 Beavan, 258. The case now came on for hearing on the merits.

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Piggott, for the Plaintiff. First, as to the original purchase by Crook. A purchaser of a reversionary interest is under an obligation to prove that he gave full value for his purchase. This is now a perfectly established rule of the Court. [407] Gowland v. De Faria (17 Ves. 20), and Hinckman v. Smith (3 Russ. 433). It has not been attempted to shew that Crook gave full value; the contrary is expressly proved by the valuation taken by Crook on the occasion. The Defendants will, however, say that inasmuch as the estate of Henry J. Addis depended on the contingency of Mr. Gostling dying without issue, it is not capable of valuation. It may, perhaps, be impossible to make an accurate valuation; but at the same time the consideration may, as in the present case, be shewn to be so grossly inadequate as to invalidate the transaction. There are, however, cases where sales of reversions depending on similar contingencies have been set aside. In Barnardiston v. Lingood (2 Atk. 133) the contingency on which the reversion depended was the death of Sir Samuel Barnardiston without issue male. A similar contingency existed in the case of Bowes v. Heaps (3 Ves. & B. 117), and the sale was avoided. Sir William Grant there observed, "Whether any individual will marry and have issue, is an event not easily reducible to calculation: but a man in such a state of health as George Bowes is described to have been, was not, according to ordinary probabilities, likely to have children. The Court has not held, that a bargain depending on such a contingency is wholly out of its reach. Lord Ardglass v. Muschamp (1 Vern. 237), Wiseman v. Beake (2 Vern. 121), and Barnardiston v. Lingood (2 Atk. 133), were cases in which death without issue male was the contingency, upon which the lender, or purchaser, was to reap the stipulated advantage: yet the uncertainty of such a risk did not prevent the Court's setting aside the bargain in each of those cases."

[408] In Baker v. Bent (1 Russ. & Myl. 224), the reversion depended upon the contingency of the tenant for life, who was sixty-three years of age, and a bachelor, dying without issue; the purchaser had deducted one-half of the contingency; Sir John Leach adopted that principle, and referred it to the Master to compute the value on that basis. Here the Court may adopt the principle stated in the valuation of the actuary, of deducting one-third for the contingency; but in any view the consideration on the first purchase was so grossly inadequate that it cannot stand.

As to the second purchase it appears that Gostling had full notice of the invalidity of the transaction with Crook; nothing can be stronger than the expressions used by Gostling respecting it; yet in the face of this he became the purchaser from the man who had committed the fraud, and paid into his hands the whole consideration. The circumstances under which Crook prevailed on Henry J. Addis to concur in the conveyance, are such as to render it ineffectual as a bar to the claim of the Plaintiff. Addis appears to have been in the greatest distress in a poorhouse, and entirely under the influence and pressure of Crook, who doled out small sums to obtain his concurrence.

They also cited Boswell v. Mendham (6 Mad. 373).

Mr. Kindersley, Mr. S. Sharpe, and Mr. Roupell, for the parties claiming under Mr. Gostling. It is not necessary for the Defendant to maintain the first transaction with Crook, that is not the case relied on by the Defendant; but even in that there is great exaggeration; there is no evidence of misrepresentation [409] or fraud; the property was valued and the valuation was communicated to Henry Joseph Addis and his solicitor, and every exertion was made by that solicitor and by Mr. Gostling to induce Henry Joseph Addis to effect a sale by public auction; but Henry Joseph Addis insisted (as he had a right to do) on selling by private contract. After the contract had been entered into, the solicitor of the vendor again interfered, explained the transaction, and got better terms for his client; it is evident that he had full knowledge as well as professional assistance.

Assuming the first transaction between Crook and Addis to have been wholly void, still the subsequent transaction, in which Gostling was guilty of no fraud and paid the full value, cannot be impeached. Addis had full knowledge of the invalidity of the first transaction, and seems to have taken some proceedings to set it aside, but which he declined prosecuting. Eleven years after the first transaction, he solemnly confirmed it, by a deed which shews to him that Mr. Gostling was paying the full consideration to Crook, on the faith of that confirmation. Could Addis, who by his confirmation induced Gostling to pay his purchase-money, turn round and insist on the invalidity of the transaction, to which he, by his conduct, led him to enter? It would be a fraud that this Court would not endure. The transaction was confirmed eleven years after, when the parties had full knowledge, and full value was then paid by Gostling.

The time which has elapsed is of the greatest importance in this case. The bill was filed nearly twenty years after the transaction took place, when all the parties and most of the witnesses were dead. A few letters are picked out from a correspondence to shew [410] the transaction; but how is it possible for a Defendant to meet the case fairly after such a lapse of time, when the witnesses are dead, and he has no means of procuring the other part of the correspondence? The circumstances, too, have altered, and it is not until, in the result, it is found that the contingency has not happened, that the parties come forward to question the transaction. If Gostling had had issue, then nothing would have been said of the matter, but the purchaser would have been allowed to sustain the loss. The contingency, too, was such as rendered it perfectly impossible to put any value on the reversion; and the dealings between a tenant for life and one having a subsequent estate tail, which can only be barred with the consent of the tenant for life, is not regarded with the same strictness as other transactions by this Court.

Throughout the transaction Gostling did all he could to get Addis to set aside the first purchase; he, however, refused; and then Gostling became naturally desirous of preventing the family estate passing to strangers, and he purchased it from the only parties from whom he could obtain it, for the full value.

M'Queen v. Farquhar (11 Ves. 479), was cited.

Crook's representative did not appear.

Mr. Pemberton, in reply.

May 8. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. This bill is filed for the purpose of setting aside certain conveyances, made by the Plaintiff's father to [411] John Crook, deceased, and Francis Gostling, deceased, on the ground of the same being obtained by fraud. And the bill prays, that the Defendants or some of them may be decreed to execute all proper conveyances for vesting the hereditaments in question in the Plaintiff.

It appears that in the year 1818, and under the will of Francis Gostling the elder who died in 1806, Francis Gostling the younger, the testator of the Defendant Alexander Francis Campbell, and of the other Defendants, except William Crook, was entitled for his life to the freehold and copyhold estates, which are the subject of the suit; with remainder to trustees, to preserve contingent remainders; with remainder to the issue of the body of the same Francis Gostling; and at the same time, under the same will, Henry Joseph Addis, the father of the Plaintiff, was entitled to the same estates for an estate in tail general, in remainder expectant on the death of Francis Gostling, and the failure of the limitations in favour of his issue.

Henry Joseph Addis, at the time referred to, was about thirty-eight years of age, a person of an unsteady, reckless, and improvident character, who had been reduced by profligate and extravagant conduct, to a state of great destitution; and is shown to have resorted to guilty and dishonest means to relieve himself from the wretched state of distress to which he was sunk. It is not shewn, in this cause, that he was absolutely of unsound mind; but it is plain, that such a person is prone to temptation, and if not incapacitated from binding himself in legal transactions, is incapable of protecting himself with ordinary prudence, and very liable to be imposed upon; and this state of mind, though not sufficient to make his transactions void, is an element most important to be considered, upon a question [412] whether a deed has been obtained by fraud, circumvention, and undue influence.

[His Lordship here shortly stated the circumstances of the sale and conveyance to Crook, and proceeded.] I have not thought it necessary to state the particulars of this transaction in minute detail. It is not denied, that the consideration was grossly inadequate to the value; and the evidence shews a case of fraud, such as can lead to no doubt that the transaction must have been set aside, if due application for the purpose had been made to this Court. The attempt made by Charles Addis to prevent the transaction, and to procure some additional benefit for Henry Joseph Addis, cannot, in my opinion, be considered as any confirmation of such a transaction.

Mr. Francis Gostling was tenant for life in possession of the property; he was desirous to keep it in the family; and, if Addis's reversionary interest had been sold by auction, was willing to purchase at a fair price; he was consequently disappointed by the transaction with Crook, and being acquainted with the particulars, he expressed himself highly indignant at the conduct of both Crook and Henry Joseph Addis, and on various occasions stated his impression, confirmed by Mr. Charles Addis, and probably by others (for it appears he was in communication with other solicitors), that by filing a bill the transaction might have been set aside.

Upon the evidence which is given in this case, I am of opinion, that Francis Gostling perfectly well knew that Crook had committed a gross fraud upon Henry Joseph Addis, and that the transaction might be set aside in equity. He was at the same time greatly offended with Henry Joseph Addis, for making a sale by private contract, instead of by auction, which would [413] have given him an opportunity of purchase at a fair value.

From a letter, which was written by Francis Gostling to Mr. Costigan on the 14th of April 1828, it appears that Mr. Gostling not only retained his opinion of the fraudulent nature of the transaction, but had even been endeavouring to prevail on Henry Joseph Addis to take proceedings to set it aside; which, he says, must have been successful, and the expression he uses is, that "a more rascally transaction was never known."

Up to this time no imputation rests on Mr. Gostling. Knowing the transaction to be voidable, and wishing it to be avoided by the act of Henry Joseph Addis, and at the same time entertaining a rational and fair desire to become the owner of property himself, it is very probable that he wished the transaction to be set aside, in order that he might become, as he had originally intended to be, the purchaser from Addis.

What were the inducements which he offered to Addis to file a bill; what, if any, assistance he proposed to give, or what influenced Addis to refuse to interfere, is unknown; but I think it may reasonably be inferred from the letter of the 19th April 1828, that Addis had not consented to take any proceedings; and it seems, that very soon afterwards, Mr. Gostling became desirous of purchasing the estate from or through the means of Crook. He was owner of the estate for life; he was desirous of being owner in fee; from Crook he could only obtain a base fee, in addition to his own life-estate; but if Addis could be induced to join, recoveries might be suffered, and an estate in fee-simple might be obtained.

[414] In this state of things, it is said, that he was advised that he might safely and properly make the purchase, if he paid to Crook, the full and fair value of the interest to be purchased; provided also, that Addis was made a party, and joined in and confirmed the conveyance, and was made a party to suffering the recoveries.

It seems to have been justly considered, that the transaction with Crook required confirmation; but it is not easy to conjecture, how it came to be supposed, that a consideration paid to the party who had committed a fraud, could have any effect in binding the rights of the party against whom the fraud had been committed.

The question in the cause is, whether Mr. Gostling took the requisite means of making a safe and proper purchase; and it is very extraordinary, that knowing, as he did, that the purchase of Crook was voidable, by reason of the fraud which Crook had practised, he should contract with Crook alone, not only for the interest which Crook professed to have purchased, but also for the acts which were required to be done by Addis, for the purpose of acquiring the title, which Gostling desired to have. Addis was a person destitute, and peculiarly liable to be imposed upon; Crook was a person, not only capable of practising a fraud, but who actually had practised a fraud, in this very matter; and yet Gostling, wanting an act to be done by Addis, and knowing the fraud already practised by Crook, engages Crook to procure from Addis the further act which was required to be done, and in no way concerned himself with the means by which the concurrence of Addis was to be obtained. Addis, with his reckless and improvident habits and disposition, was not only left exposed, but was knowingly subjected to the influence of the same person who had already imposed upon him. That [415] Gostling intended to commit a fraud, or to procure a new fraud to be committed, on Addis, is, in my opinion, very unlikely. I think it most probable, that he intended to give the true and just value for the property, and thought that Addis would never attempt to enforce his rights; but contracting as he did, with Crook alone, knowing the fraud which had been practised by Crook, paying to Crook alone what he may have thought the true and just value of the estate, he was, in fact, paying to Crook the full price of his fraud: and whatever consideration he paid, seeing that it all moved to Crook, and no part of it to Addis, except through the means of Crook, I am of opinion, that by such dealing as this, Gostling could not place himself in a better situation than Crook stood; and that by the whole transaction, notwithstanding his payments, he subjected himself, as towards Addis, to the same responsibilities to which Crook was already subject.

Crook, by a continuation or repetition of fraud, similar to that which he had previously practised, obtained from Addis that concurrence in the conveyance which Gostling desired, and for which he paid Crook alone. Gostling, I think, not designedly, but in effect, and with knowledge which ought to have put him completely on his guard, procured Crook to continue or repeat that fraud. With the knowledge he possessed, and after his mode of dealing, I think that it became incumbent upon him, and upon those claiming under him, to shew that the transactions between Crook and Addis were fair, and that Addis received a just consideration. Nothing of this kind is even attempted. Addis was left a victim to the contrivances of Crook; and those who advised Gostling never concerned themselves to see whether Addis was fairly dealt with, or received any consideration whatever. I infer from the letter of the 29th of July [416] 1828, that some communication, by letter, had taken place between Addis and Crook; but the evidence appears to me to shew, that Addis was as much defrauded by Crook in the second transaction, as he had been in the first: he conveyed away a reversionary interest which was worth several thousand pounds, and in return, received no title to anything, and remained dependent on the voluntary performance by Crook of a verbal promise to pay him £1 a week.

Not thinking it important, whether the sum paid by Gostling to Crook was the value of the reversionary interest, subject to the contingency or not, I have not thought it necessary to consider very minutely the evidence of value, which has been tendered. Whatever was the payment to Crook, I think, that by the transaction, Gostling placed himself only in the situation in which Crook stood in relation to Addis; and that as Crook's transactions with Addis were fraudulent, and Gostling was under all the circumstances affected by them, the Plaintiff, as the person who would have been entitled if the fraud had not been practised, is now entitled to be relieved.

EXTRACT FROM DECREE.—Decree, the indentures of 1819 and the fine, and the indentures of 1828 and the recoveries, fraudulent and void against Plaintiff. And upon payment by Plaintiff of all the sums paid by Crook for the reversionary interest, and in respect of the bond with interest at 5 per cent., direct a reconveyance. Account of rents, of monies paid, and of lasting improvements, &c. (Reg. Lib. 1840, A. 1486.)

[417] BOURNE v. MOLE. Nov. 3, 1841.

A Defendant had been ordered by the Vice-Chancellor in another suit to give inspection of documents. The order had been made two years, but had not been acted on. Held, that this did not prevent an order for production in the present suit.

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Rogers, for the Plaintiff, moved for the production of documents, admitted by the Defendant's answer to be in his possession.

Mr. Cockerell, contra, stated that the Defendant had been ordered by the Vice-Chancellor, in another suit, to produce these documents at his office for the inspection of the Plaintiff in that suit, at all reasonable times; and he contended that he was disabled from leaving them with his clerk in Court in this suit.

He admitted, however, that the order had been made by the Vice-Chancellor two years back and had not been acted on.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS ordered their production.

[417] SMITH v. MASSIE. Nov. 3, 1841.

The costs of affidavits, used to qualify the answer of a Defendant, so as to excuse him from the production of documents, must be paid for by the Defendant.

Mr. Pemberton, on a former day, moved for the production of documents admitted to be in the Defendant's possession. The motion coming on,

Mr. Kindersley appeared for the Defendant, and was permitted to produce affidavits qualifying the statements [418] in the answer, and shewing grounds for excusing the production of some of them. (Hughes v. Biddulph, 4 Russ. 190; Parkhurst v. Loudon, 1 Mer. 394; Parsons v. Robertson, 2 Keen, 605; Morrice v. Swaby, 2 Beav. 500; Curd v. Curd, 1 Hare, 274; Llewellyn v. Badeley, 1 Hare, 527.)

Affidavits were filed on both sides; but ultimately it appeared that the Defendant was not bound to produce the documents in question.

Mr. Pemberton now asked for the costs of the affidavits.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. Affidavits have been made to correct a mistake in the Defendant's answer, and which were absolutely necessary to relieve the Defendant from the necessity of producing the documents. This led to considerable expense, and was wholly occasioned by the omission or mistake in the answer. The Defendant has also brought forward, by affidavit, information, which it appears was in his possession at the time of filing his answer, and if he had stated the Plaintiff, we must assume, would not have asked for more than he was lawfully entitled to. By the mistake of the Defendant he has created additional expense, and the clear justice of the case requires that this additional expense should be paid by him. The costs of the affidavits must therefore be paid for by the Defendant.

[419] WOOD v. VINCENT. Nov. 3, 1841.

Requisites for obtaining the stop order under the General Order of April 1841.

Mr. Bird applied for a stop order under the General Order of the 3d of April 1841 (Ord. Can. 161). A question having been raised as to the sufficiency of the affidavits to warrant the order,

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale] observed. Two things are necessary under this General Order. First, you must shew generally the title of the assignor, it is not absolutely necessary to shew the particular share of the fund to which he is entitled. Secondly, you must shew the assignment, either by proving its validity in the usual way, or by the assignors appearing and admitting it.

[419] RANELAGH v. RANELAGH. Nov. 8, 1841.

[For other proceedings, see 2 My. & K. 441; 39 E. R. 1012; 12 Beav. 200.]

Test of pecuniary legacies to each of four persons for life, interest at £5 per cent., to be paid till the heir attained twenty-one; and "in case of the demise of any of the above parties without legitimate issue, then his or her proportions to be divided equally amongst the survivors." After the testator's death, one of the legatees died without having been married. Held, that the survivors were absolutely entitled to the legacy.

The testator, Lord Ranelagh, by a codicil to his will, expressed himself in the following words:—

"My daughter, Mary Ann Jones, having a fortune of £10,000, which I hold in trust for her, &c., I give her for the present only £200 to buy mourning. I give to my two daughters Sarah Antonia Jones and Louisa Jones, during their natural lives, £4000 each. I give to my two sons Thomas Cowley Jones and Thomas Edward Jones £2000 sterling each, during their natural lives; legal interest at 5 per cent. to be paid to all of them in equal quarterly payments, commencing from the day of my decease, till my son the Honourable Thomas Jones or my heir in entail dies his or her twenty-first year of age. To prevent any mistake or misconception in my directions, I repeat my intentions respecting the above legacies in figures:—

Mary Ann Jones £200 to be paid forthwith.

Sarah Antonia Jones	£4000	{ £5 per cent. interest to be paid quarterly till my heir is twenty- one years of age.
Louisa Jones	4000
Thomas Cowley Jones	2000
Thomas Edward Jones	2000

In case of the demise of any of the above parties without legitimate issue, their respective proportions to be divided equally amongst the survivors."

The testator's eldest son, now Lord Ranelagh, was appointed residuary legatee.

By another codicil the testator appointed Lady Ranelagh and his daughters Mary and Sarah Antonia Jones his executrices.

At a former hearing of the cause (2 Mylne & Keen, 441) it was contended on behalf of the two daughters and the two younger sons, that they took an absolute interest in their respective legacies, on the ground that the gift over in case of the death of any of them without issue, was to be re-ferred to an indefinite failure of issue. Sir John Leach, and Lord Brougham on appeal, did not adopt that construction; and it was declared that the legatees were entitled to interest in the legacy until the Plaintiff attained twenty-one, and it was ordered that the several legacies should be carried over to the separate accounts of the several legatees, and the dividends were to be paid to the legatees for life, or until further order; and upon the deaths of any or either of the legatees, liberty was given to any person interested to apply.

The sum of £4149 Reduced annuities was accordingly carried over to the separate account of the Defendant Sarah Antonia Jones. She died in 1840, without ever having been married.

Petitions were now presented by her personal representative and by the other legatees for payment to them of the £4149.

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Romilly, for the legal personal representative of Sarah Antonia Jones, claimed the fund in question, contending, that the order on the former hearing did not exclude her claim to an absolute interest, and that the fund had been carried over to a separate account, because the question was doubtful, and to enable the parties interested, when the event contemplated happened, to contest the right. They argued that the rule was settled, that where there was a gift of personality to A. for life, and a gift over on a general failure of his issue, A. would take an absolute interest. (See Lepine v. Ferard, 2 Russ. & Myl. 387, and the authorities there referred to.)

Mr. Tinney and Mr. Bigg, for one of the surviving legatees, and [422] Mr. Kindersley, for another, contended they were absolutely entitled by survivorship to the fund.

Mr. G. Turner, for Lord Ranelagh, contended, that as the first gift was for life only, the surviving legatees would take by survivorship for life only, and not absolutely.

Mr. Pemberton, in reply:

Barlow v. Salter (17 Ves. 479), Massey v. Hudson (2 Mer. 135), Nicholls v. Skinner (Prec. Ch. 528), Hughes v. Sayer (1 P. Wms. 534), were cited.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. The question depends upon the construction of the codicil; I must assume in the absence of any statement to the contrary, that the very point contended for to-day was raised in the pleadings: beyond doubt it was discussed on the hearing of the cause, for a claim being made by Sarah Antonia Jones to be entitled absolutely to this fund, the Court was of opinion that she was only entitled to an order that it should be placed to her account, with a direction to pay her the dividends, and liberty to apply on her death. By this I consider that the claim of the lady was negatived, though the rights were not further declared, because of the possibility of claims being made by any children she might have. As regarded her claim, it was incumbent upon the Court to declare it specifically, or to do what amounted to a negative of that right; this I think was done. In consequence, therefore, of the former order of this Court, I consider myself precluded from making the order asked; if I were not, I should have great difficulty in deciding, except in conformity with the former decision, when all [423] the previous authorities appear to have been carefully examined. I do not think it advisable to say more, because if the parties should be advised to take the case before another tribunal, they may do so unfettered by anything which has passed here.

I consider that the survivors take the fund absolutely, and an order must be made for payment to them; but the costs of all parties ought to be paid out of the fund.

[423] HEMPSTEAD v. HEMPSTEAD. Nov. 9, 1841.

A. having a lien on the testator's estate, established his debt under the decree; but his claim for interest was disallowed by the Master, whose report stood confirmed. The estate was sold, subject to A.'s lien, and A. having refused to accept from the purchaser his principal without interest, was not allowed to participate as a creditor in the purchase-money.

Messrs. Ware had acquired from the testator in the cause a lien on the leases of certain property belonging to him.

By the decree made in June 1838 in this cause, which was for the administration of the testator's estate, the Master was directed to take an account of the testator's debts, and to compute interest on such of the debts as carried interest; and he was ordered to inquire whether there were any and what incumbrances affecting his real estates, and he was to take an account thereof.

In July following Messrs. Ware gave notice under the Act, to the executors, that they should claim interest on their debt from that time, unless immediately paid.

The Master reported the lien and debt due to Messrs. Ware, and that there was due thereon the sum [424] of £252, 12s. 4d., but he disallowed the claim for interest. The report was confirmed, no exceptions having been taken thereto.

By a subsequent order, the property was ordered to be sold subject to the incumbrances of such persons as would not consent thereto; and the same was afterwards sold, subject to the lien of Messrs. Ware. The purchase-money was paid into Court.

The purchaser tendered the principal sum found due to Messrs. Ware, who refused to receive it without interest.

The Plaintiff presented this petition, praying a declaration that Messrs. Ware were not entitled to participation with the other creditors in the fund in Court, and that the same might be divided between such other creditors.

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Sheffield, in support of the petition.

Mr. Kindersley, contra, for Messrs. Ware.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. The prayer of this petition must be granted. The Master under the decree has found the amount due to Messrs. Ware; and the report having been confirmed, I must take his finding to be right. The estate was then sold subject to their lien, and the purchaser has tendered the amount found due by the Master, which Messrs. Ware have refused to accept. There may be a [425] question between them and the purchaser, but there is none under the decree. Having refused to accept the tender, can they come against the general assets?

Order made.

[425] RAVENS v. TAYLOR. Nov. 12, 1841.

A testator devised an estate X, and other estates to A., charged with annuities and an estate Y, and his residuary real, and personal estate to B., subject to the payment of his debts, funeral expences, and legacies. He afterwards revoked so much of the second devise as included Y., and devised it, subject to the same annuities, and in the same manner as the estate X. Held, that the charge of debts, &c., on Y was revoked.

The testator, W. Martin, by his will devised four closes of land situate in Welbarston, containing fifty acres, purchased of W. Humfrey, and a close situate in Welbarston purchased of W. Dixon, to the third son of his niece, in fee charged with certain annuities.

He also gave and bequeathed all the residue of his real estate, if any, including an estate at Welbarston, which he had contracted to purchase from Sir J. H. Palmer, Bart., and his son, and all the rest and residue of his personal estate of what nature or kind soever, subject to the payment thereof of his just debts, funeral and testamentary expences and legacies, unto Thomas Stanbrough, Samuel Talbot, and W. Notcutt, their heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns, to be equally divided between and among them, share and share alike.

By a codicil, the testator, after reciting that he had, by his will, in the devise therein contained of the residue of his real estate, unto Thomas Stanbrough, Samuel Talbot, and W. Notcutt, included an estate at Welbarston, in the county of Northampton, which he had lately contracted to purchase from Sir J. H. Palmer and son, he did thereby absolutely revoke so much [426] of his said last-mentioned devise as included the said estate so contracted to be purchased, and in lieu thereof, he gave and devised the same estate to the same uses, and subject to the same annuities, and in the same manner in every respect, as he had in and by his said will given and devised his four closes of land in Welbarston aforesaid, therein described as containing fifty acres purchased of Humfrey, and his other close at Welbarston aforesaid, containing eight acres, purchased of Dixon.

The testator died in 1832.

The question was, whether the estate purchased of Sir J. H. Palmer and son, was charged with the debts, funeral expenses, and legacies of the testator.

It was contended by some of the parties, that the codicil only revoked the beneficial devise to the residuary devisees, and that this part of the testator's estate remained subject to the debts, &c. Beckett v. Harden (4 M. & S. 1).

Mr. Pemberton, Mr. Tinney, Mr. Kindersley, Mr. Neate, Mr. Chandless, Mr. Phillips, Mr. Freeling, Mr. Blunt, Mr. G. Turner, Mr. James Russell, Mr. O. Anderdon, and Mr. Spurrier, appeared for different parties.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale] was of opinion, that the estate in question was not charged with the debts, funeral expenses, and legacies.

[427] LINCOLN v. WRIGHT. Nov. 12, 13, 1841.

[Reported on other points, 4 Beav. 166. See Chillingworth v. Chambers [1896], 1 Ch. 704.]

Two executors permitting their co-executor to retain in his hands the ascertained residue, held liable as for a breach of trust.

Enquiry refused as to the concurrence of cestui que trust, where it was not alleged by the answer, and was unsatisfactorily proved by the evidence.

Executors liable for the default of their co-executor, who had become bankrupt, held entitled, upon payment by them, to the benefit of the proof in bankruptcy against his estate.

The testator, by his will, "gave and bequeathed the remainder and residue of his property to his trustees after named, to be put out on real or Government securities, in the name of his trustees;" and he gave the interest to his daughter Susan Lincoln, and her husband William Lincoln, for their maintenance and support during their natural life, or the life of the survivor, with remainder to their children; and he appointed Wright and Rust "executors" of his will.

The testator made a codicil, whereby he appointed Boughen, with the said Wright and Rust, "executors" of his will.

The testator died in November 1826, and his will was proved by his three executors. Wright was appointed the active executor by his co-executors: and, in 1827, a sale by auction took place of the testator's property, the greater part of which was sold to John Andrews Lincoln, one of the children of the tenants for life.

In 1830 the residuary account, signed by the three executors, was passed at the Stamp Office, shewing a residue of £808 on which duty was paid. At the end of the year 1830 J. A. Lincoln paid the remainder of what was due on account of his purchases to the Defendant Wright. Wright had, in fact, received the whole of the residue, amounting to about £800, which he never invested in Government securities as directed by [428] the will, but retained in his hands, and he, from time to time, paid, yearly, £32 as interest to the tenants for life. From the evidence in the cause, the Court came to the conclusion, that he had received and retained the £800 with the knowledge and concurrence of his co-executors.

This bill was filed in 1839 by Mr. and Mrs. Lincoln and some of their children, and it sought to make the executors responsible.

Wright became embarrassed, and after he had filed his answer he was declared a bankrupt, and, having obtained his certificate, was examined as a witness.

There was no allegation in the answer, that Mr. and Mrs. Lincoln concurred in the breach of trust; but the evidence of Wright stated as follows:—"I believe the said Plaintiffs (Mr. and Mrs. Lincoln) did know that the said capital was not invested pursuant to the trusts of the said testator's said will; I have no particular reason for that belief, because I had no conversation with them on the subject; but my impression is, that they were aware that it was not invested."

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Jemmett, for the Plaintiffs. Where personal property is bequeathed to executors as trustees, there, by proving the will, they accept the trusts, Mucklow v. Fuller (Jacob, 198); and the retainer by one of the amount of the clear residue, with the knowledge and concurrence of the others, render them all liable to the loss that has happened; Booth v. Booth (1 Beavan, 125). As the amount seems ascertained, the Plaintiffs were taking the accounts, and ask for a declaration of the Defendants' [429] liability for the sum of £797, 19s. 10d., the balance shewn by Wright's answer, with the costs of the suit.

Mr. G. Turner and Mr. Steers, for the Defendants Rust and Boughen. One executor in trust is not answerable for the receipts of the other, merely by taking probate, permitting the other to possess the assets, and joining in acts necessary to enable him to administer; Hovey v. Blakeman (4 Ves. 595). Boughen was not appointed a trustee by the codicil, but merely an executor, and one executor is not liable for the receipts, &c., of the other. It appears that two of the Plaintiffs acquiesced, and consequently this bill cannot be maintained either by them or by the other Co-plaintiffs; Jacob v. Lucas (1 Beavan, 436). If there be any doubt as to the fact, an inquiry ought to be directed.

The bill is not so framed as to entitle the Plaintiffs to an immediate decree: the amount must be ascertained, as the account passed at the Legacy Duty Office, is merely wind facie evidence of the balance. If the Defendants Rust and Boughen are compelled to pay, they ought to have the benefit of the proof against Wright's estate.

Mr. Cooper, for Wright.

Mr. Rolé, for the assignees.

Mr. Pemberton, in reply. The objection of the concurrence of the cestui que trusts is not raised by the pleadings, and is not borne out by the evidence.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. The testator in this cause died in the month of November 1826, having given his residuary estate to his [430] executors, with a direction that it should be invested on real or Government security, and that the income should be paid to the Plaintiffs Mr. and Mrs. Lincoln for life, with remainder over to their children.

The will was proved by the three executors; and it is perfectly clear, upon the evidence, that all three executors acted in the administration of the estate. The residue appears to have been ascertained, and that residue remained in the hands of Wright one of the executors, and in consequence of his bankruptcy the whole or a great part of it has been lost. The principal object of this suit, is to charge the other executors with the amount of that loss, so as to make good to the trust, that which has been abstracted from it, by the breach of trust, or by the disobedience to those main directions which were given by the testator for the security of his residuary estate. It does not appear to me to be very material to consider, whether the three executors, or only two of them were trustees; because the residue was ascertained, the amount of it appears to have been admitted, and it seems to be perfectly clear, upon the evidence, that two of them permitted that residue to remain in the hands of the third. It is a very short case, and on those settled principles on which this Court acts, I can have no doubt whatever, but that the two executors are liable for the loss which was incurred by the bankruptcy of the third.

This bill is filed for the purpose of having an account, in order that the amount of the loss sustained may be accurately ascertained. The bill charges that the amount of the ascertained residue was £800 and upwards. That statement, so far from being denied, is admitted by the answer; and, by the evidence produced, it seems that the three executors sent the residuary [431] account to the Stamp Office, which accords with the statement in the bill and with the admission in the answer; nevertheless, it does not appear that the bill proceeds on the ground of that being an ascertained balance, but alleges that the sum due to the estate was that sum and upwards, and says for the account. The Plaintiffs now desire, with a view to save further expense in the prosecution of this cause, to rest satisfied with the balance charged in the bill, proved in the evidence, and admitted by the answer. The Defendants object to this course, and say that they are entitled to have the account taken; and it appears to me that they ought if they desire it to have the account taken. I think that they are entitled to have the account taken under the circumstances; but they are not entitled to have the account taken for the purpose of delaying the performance of that duty, which, I apprehend, is fixed upon them by the circumstances and facts of this case. I think that I ought to order them to pay into Court, that which appears to be the admitted balance, nay, the proved balance, due from the three executors, and I ought, as it is desired on the part of the Plaintiffs, to state, that upon the application of the Defendants, the account is directed.

A point which has very frequently been the subject of discussion in this Court is raised, whether, if they are liable for the whole, they are not at least entitled to be relieved from some portion of their responsibility; because, as they allege, the persons who are tenants for life, and some of the persons who have an interest in remainder, acquiesced in that departure from the strict direction of the will, in consequence of which the loss has been sustained. They say, that Mr. and Mrs. Lincoln consented to the arrangement by which the money was left in the hands of Wright; that, at any rate, it [432] was perfectly well known to them, and that they acquiesced in it, and that the same may be said of the Defendant John Andrews Lincoln. Now, nothing can be more clear than the rule which is adopted by the Court in these cases: that if one party, having a partial interest in the trust fund, induces the trustee to depart from the direction of the trust for his own benefit, and enjoys that benefit, he shall not be permitted, personally, to enjoy the benefit of the trust, whilst the trustees are subjected to a serious liability which he has brought upon them. What the Court does, in such a case, is to lay hold of the partial interest to which that person is entitled, and apply it, so far as it will extend, in exoneration of the trustees, who, by his request and desire or acquiescence, or by any other mode of concurrence, have been induced to do the improper act. Now, is there any evidence whatever of such acquiescence or concurrence here? First of all, it does not appear that any such thing is alleged in the answer; next, is there any proof of it? It does not appear to me that there is any proof of it; for the only person who is called on to prove it states, he believes the parties knew that there had not been an investment according to the terms of the trust; but he states "that he had no particular reason for that belief;" and the only reason suggested for believing that he entertained that belief is this, that the tenants for life received the income from Wright, which was, or may have been a larger income than would have arisen from an investment in the funds. I think that this is not sufficient either to prove it or to warrant me in directing an inquiry.

I must declare, in the first place, that these trustees are liable to make good the loss which has been sustained by the bankruptcy of Mr. Smith Wright, and I must order them to bring into Court the sum of [433] £797, 19s. 10d., and upon the application of the Defendants the accounts must be directed to be taken. The claim against the bankrupt's estate should be perfected, and upon payment into Court of the amount by Rust and Boughen, the benefit of the proof against the bankrupt's estate should be assigned to them by the Plaintiffs.

[433] MASSIE v. DRAKE. Feb. 1, March 30, 31, April 17, 19, Nov. 15, 1841.

[Affirmed by Lord Chancellor Dec. 20, 1845.]

The mere circumstance that a bill of costs contains items which would be disallowed or reduced on taxation, is not, of itself, sufficient to entitle the party to a taxation of a bill which has been settled and paid.

Costs directed by decree to be taxed as between a solicitor and client, cannot, on petition, be ordered to be taxed on another principle.

Where an account, comprising bills of costs, is settled and paid as between a solicitor and client, and no surprise or fraud is practised, the Court will not direct a taxation of the bill, though it appears to contain items which would be disallowed or reduced on taxation, unless it appears that the overcharges are in themselves so extravagant and improper, as under the circumstances to be considered fraudulent.

Upon the settlement of an account between a solicitor and his client, a sum of £75 was retained by the solicitor, by consent, to answer particular costs not then ascertained. The Court limited the taxation to such particular costs.

There were three several petitions entitled in the above cause, and presented by Captain Drake, Mrs. Drake, and her executor Mr. Lloyd, for an account, and for the taxation of their solicitors' bills, under circumstances which are fully stated in the following judgments of the Court.

Mr. Kindersley and Mr. Koe, in support of the petition.

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. James Russell, contra.

The following authorities were referred to. Horlock v. Smith (2 Myl. & Cr. 495), Wright v. Taylor (Id. 526), Langford v. Nott (1 Jac. & W. 291), [434] In re Murray (519), Ex parte The Earl of Uxbridge (6 Ves. 425), In re Barker (6 Simons, 476), 1 G. 2, c. 23, s. 23.

The following is the judgment on Captain Drake's petition.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. This petition is presented by Captain W. W. Drake, in a creditor's suit, in which a decree was made for the due administration of the estate of the Rev. William Wickham Drake, and it prays for taxation of the costs of all parties to the suit: that the Plaintiff's costs may be paid as between party and party: and that Messrs. Harper & Jones may deliver to the Petitioner certain bills of costs specified in the prayer (viz., bills amounting to several sums of £415, 4s. 10d., £186, 8s., £47, 2s. 6d., £43, 7s. 2d., £77, 3d., £169, 8s. 10d., and £75); and that the same may be taxed: and for an amount of the monies received by Harper & Jones for the Petitioner and of their taxation thereof, and that the balance may be paid.

As the costs charged have all of them been paid, the Petitioner has undertaken to shew a special case entitling him to the relief which he asks.

The testator William Wickham Drake, the Petitioner's father, by his will bequeathed his personal estate from payment of his debts, and having disposed of his personal estate and part of his real estate, he devised to his son, the Petitioner, a variation in fee in other real estate, chargeable with such of his debts as the [435] before provided would not extend to satisfy. He appointed his wife Susannah Drake, his brothers John Drake and Thomas Drake, and his son-in-law John Edward Tarleton, executors of his will.

At the institution of this suit, Messrs. Harper & Parry Jones acted as the solicitors of the Plaintiff and of the executors. The Petitioner employed Messrs. Foster & Lumley as his solicitors.

A decree was made in May 1836, and various proceedings took place under it. A report was made in July 1838. It would seem, that both before and after the report proposals were under discussion, for the purpose of raising a sufficient sum to pay all the demands upon the testator's estate. No arrangement having been made, and the cause having become abated, a decree in the revived suit was made on the 13th of June 1839; and in that decree, it was ordered that all the costs of the suit should be taxed and paid.

During the discussion of the means of raising money to satisfy the debts, Messrs. Foster & Lumley, the solicitors of Captain Drake, had employed Harper & Jones, the solicitors for the Plaintiff and the executors, to raise £7000 out of Captain Drake's estate. This not being done, afterwards, in 1839, Captain Drake instructed Harper & P. Jones to raise £10,000 for him, and they undertook to do so. They accordingly raised the money; the securities, however, were not executed, and on the 7th of September 1839 Captain Drake wrote to Harper, enclosing a draft of the proposed mortgage and a statement of the manner in which £10,000 was to be appropriated, and when it was done. To this letter an answer was given. It is stated that the bill of costs of Messrs. [436]

Foster & Lumley, the solicitors of the Petitioner, was taxed and paid in October 1839; and that nine other bills, some of them for costs in the suit, and others of them costs of trustees and executors for the expenses of the trust and of administration properly payable out of the estate, were sent to the Petitioner on the 24th of October 1837; and that the bill of Messrs. Raymond

& Still, the solicitors for another party to the cause, being taxed, was paid on the 1st of November 1839. On the 17th of November, Captain Drake wrote to Mr. Harper as follows:—"When we last parted, I understood you that the remainder of the business would be completed in three weeks from that period. It is now six, and I trust you will excuse my impatience in writing to you, and let me know how far you have advanced; what sums you have paid; what remain to be paid (which I hope are none) out of the £10,000, and what residue there is left; how that is to be appointed, and at what time. Also I hope you will be kind enough to allow a compromise in your claims, and let me know the amount of it, so that every point of this lengthy business may be finally and completely settled."

This letter was not answered till the 9th of December, and then not satisfactorily, for only an imperfect account was sent, and there were two items left with the sums in blank.

With this account Captain Drake was not satisfied, and on the 23d of December he desired further explanation; and particularly desired to know what allowance would be made on Mr. Harper's several charges, and how the blanks were to be interpreted; and Mr. Harper having referred Captain Drake to his agents for explanation, Captain Drake expressed his wish rather to communicate with Mr. Harper himself. To this Mr. Harper [437] replied on the 26th of December 1839, by saying, that he believed the charges were the usual charges, and if not, that it was his desire to make them so; and he again referred Captain Drake to his agents, and said he should be happy to meet them in making any allowance which could be expected.

Captain Drake in his next letter, of the 30th December 1839, desired to have the blanks filled up, and to know, whether the account as to the other items was to be considered as correct and final; and he stated his intention of going to the agents of Mr. Harper. To this letter Mr. Harper replied on the 6th of January 1840, that he could not supply the blanks, but that he believed the items of the account delivered to be correct.

It appears that Mr. Matthew Finch, a wine merchant at Deptford, had been employed by the trustees as their receiver and agent, and had also been employed by the Petitioner upon some occasions as his agent, and that the Petitioner had sent the nine bills of costs, which had been sent to him in October, to Mr. Finch; and the Petitioner stated, that Mr. Finch made some representations to Vincent & Sherwood, the London agents of Harper & Parry Jones, as to the large amount of the bills.

Mr. Pell, the managing clerk, as to this matter of Messrs. Vincent & Sherwood, says, that upon Mr. Finch stating the amount of the bills to be greater than Captain Drake expected, he, Pell, said, that if Captain Drake wished it, he would get the bills in the suits taxed, and that there was an order directing such costs to be taxed, to which Finch replied, that Captain Drake did not wish the bills to be taxed, and that his only reason for mentioning the amount was, that a deduction might be made [438] if Harper & Jones could afford to make the same. This statement is positively denied by Mr. Finch. On the 8th of January 1840 Mr. Finch, as he says, in consequence of a communication which Captain Drake had received from Harper & Parry Jones, desired an interview with Vincent & Sherwood. The interview took place, and some time afterwards Mr. Vincent informed Mr. Finch that Harper had authorised him to say, that he would make a deduction of £183 from the amount of the bills of Harper & P. Jones. And on the 22d of January 1840 Mr. Harper wrote to Mr. Finch, and observed, that the delay which had taken place since Captain Drake confided in him, was nothing like the inconvenience which was produced to parties for the seven years whilst the matter was kept open to save his interests. On the 27th of January Captain Drake again desired to have the blanks in the account before delivered supplied. He wished to know to what day the interest on Mrs. Drake's mortgage was calculated, and noticed that interest was charged on the money he had borrowed from the 19th of August. And after further desiring an account of sums paid in the suit, he stated, that he did not include in them the expenses of the suit, in which, he stated, he was much obliged for the deductions Mr. Harper had so kindly caused to be made. The receipt of this letter was acknowledged, but the accounts not being completed, Captain Drake again, on the 7th of March 1840, pressed for a final statement, adding, "I shall much lament if any circumstance or expression should occur, which might tend to disturb the good understanding which has existed between us; but you must see, situated as I am, the absolute necessity of bringing this long protracted business to a conclusion." Mr. Harper being still, as he stated, unable (on account of proceedings still pending in the Master's office) to complete the account, afterwards, on the 2d of April 1840, in compliance with a renewed request of Captain Drake, sent another account, admitted to be incomplete, accompanied by a letter as follows:—"I am exceedingly sorry that I am not enabled to send you the account quite complete, but I send you the best I can, and immediately after Easter, I am assured, the whole business will be closed." The account sent at the time consisted of the account formerly delivered, with certain additional items, and at the foot of it was a memorandum as follows, viz.:—"Memorandum, that we have stated the above accounts to the best of our judgment and so far as the business has been completed, but of those matters still pending, we are unable to state the sums precisely, although we believe the sums stated will cover them; and we do declare, that the several sums charged as paid were actually and bonâ fide paid by us, and that the draft of Captain Drake, to pay which is allowed £547, 18s. as stated in the above account, has been paid by us. As witness our hands, 2d of April 1840." The first items in the additional account were £77, 2s. 8d., and £169, 8s. 10d. for bills of costs therein described. Mr. Harper states that he sent to Captain Drake the particulars of both these bills. Captain Drake denies that he ever received the first. Soon after this additional account had been sent, and on the 10th of April 1840 Captain Drake wrote to Mr. Harper as follows:—"Understanding that it is your intention to be in London in the course of next week, will you let me know when and where I can meet you, so as finally to arrange these protracted affairs. I should feel obliged if you would, when you come to town, bring with you all the receipts and vouchers necessary for the establishment of your accounts, and every other document connected with the estate. I feel gratified by the account you have transmitted me, in which I observe several items which [440] will require some little explanation when we meet, and which I shall be prepared to mention to you at that time."

After all this correspondence, and the long attention paid to the account by Captain Drake, and on the 15th of May 1840, the parties met for the purpose of going through and settling the account; and in the result, Captain Drake and Harper & Parry Jones signed a memorandum in the following words: "We have examined the account this day, and the several vouchers having been produced and delivered to Captain Drake, we allow the same, and acknowledge that it is correct."

The account thus signed is a debtor and creditor account, purporting to debit Captain Drake with several items, amounting in the whole to £9979, 16s. 3d. (nearly 10,000). Several of the items refer to bills, receipts, or other vouchers. One of them is a sum of £75, stated to be "paid agent's further charges (probable only), in obtaining Master's report and other matters." The credit side of the account consists of three items only—the sums amount altogether to £10,720, 11s. 2d., giving a balance of £740, 14s. 11d. in favour of Captain Drake. One of the three items on the credit side is expressed as follows:—"By allowed out of the several bills of costs, £183, 0s. 6d."

The petition, praying that, notwithstanding this settlement, the bills of costs may be taxed, and the account retaken, alleges, that the bills of costs are all of them taxable, and that they contain many charges which would be disallowed on taxation; and considering the situation in which the parties stood towards each other, the money received by Harper & Parry Jones for Captain Drake, and for which they were accountable to him, [441] and their claim to set off the amount of the bills of costs against the balance in their hands, it appears to me, that before the account was settled, Captain Drake was entitled to have all the bills taxed, in order that the true amount of the balance due to him from his attorneys might be ascertained. I consider that, under the circumstances, all the bills were taxable; and looking at the several items which are specified in the petition, and stated to be overcharges, I am of opinion that some of the items contained in the bills would be disallowed on taxation.

But the mere circumstance that bills of costs may contain items which would be disallowed or reduced on taxation, is not of itself sufficient to entitle the party to a taxation of a bill which has been settled and paid. As Sir Thomas Plumer said in Gretton v. Leyburne (Turn. & Russ. 412), "Items which would be disallowed do not amount to that fraud, which must be made out, in order to subject to taxation bills that have been so settled."

It has been argued in support of this petition, that a fraud was practised upon the Petitioner, and that the fraud is shewn, not only by the extravagance of the charges, but by the order for taxation, which, if acted upon, would, as to the costs in the suit, have been costs as between solicitor and client, to which the solicitors were not entitled; by the concealment of the order from Captain Drake, by which a still greater advantage was obtained over him; by his being called upon to settle the account without his having the protection of any legal assistance, and without his having had the means of ascertaining whether the charges were just or not.

[442] Amongst the bills sought to be taxed between party and party, are the bills which by the decree were ordered to be taxed between solicitor and client, and also some bills which are not noticed in the prayer of the petition. It is obvious that I have no authority to alter the effect of the decree, and that no relief can be given which is not prayed for. The question is, whether the Petitioner is entitled to have the costs in the suit taxed as between solicitor and client, and an ordinary taxation of the other bills mentioned in the prayer.

It is to be regretted that Captain Drake did not obtain legal assistance in the examination of the bills; but he certainly had the means of obtaining any assistance he thought proper. The account was settled in May 1840. Nine of the bills were sent to him in October 1839; and if he thought fit rather to avail himself of the assistance of Mr. Finch, who seems to have been an active man of business, though not a professional man, he cannot, I think, urge it as matter of complaint against Harper & Parry Jones, that he had not professional assistance. Those nine bills were delivered in ample time to admit of any investigation Captain Drake thought proper to institute. They were examined, though not in the manner they might have been; the amount was complained of, a deduction was requested; and ultimately a deduction of £183, 0s. 8d. was obtained, and Captain Drake afterwards expressed his obligation to Harper & P. Jones for this abatement. Communications in respect of the abatement took place between Mr. Finch and Messrs. Vincent & Sherwood, the town agents of Harper & P. Jones; and Mr. Pell swears, that in the course of them, he distinctly offered to get the bills in the suit taxed, if Captain Drake wished; and that he could do so, as there was an order directing such costs to be taxed. Mr. Vincent also states, that on [443] Finch endeavouring to obtain a deduction from the bills, he informed Finch that it would be more satisfactory to get the bills taxed, and urged Finch that the costs of the suit should be taxed, more especially as an order had been made for that purpose; and that Finch then disclaimed all wish to have the bills taxed, and, on a subsequent occasion, said, that Captain Drake would not hear of such a thing. Mr. Sherwood has also sworn that, in his presence, Vincent offered to get the bills taxed, and that Finch objected, although much pressed by Vincent to assent to the taxation. Mr. Finch has distinctly denied the statement of Pell, and has sworn that he did not know of the order for taxation till he was informed of it by Mr. Williams, some time after the account was settled.

On consideration of all the evidence, it appears to me much less probable that Vincent, Sherwood, and Pell should have committed direct perjury, than that Finch, who was not a professional man, should in some way have mistaken the nature of the communication which he received; and I think that, upon the evidence, I must consider that Mr. Finch, the agent of Captain Drake in this matter, was, before the 30th of January 1840, informed that there was an order to tax the bills in the suit, and that he objected to have them taxed, but desired rather to have the abatement which he obtained without taxation.

With respect to the delivery of the other bills, there is also a conflict of evidence; but, on the whole, I think the evidence shews that they were sent to Captain Drake some time before the meeting to settle the account. It appearing, therefore, that the account had been previously delivered to Captain Drake—that his attention had been previously directed to the items—[444] that there was no pressure on the part of Harper & P. Jones, who had, indeed, in their hands, money more than enough to pay their demand—that the settlement was (as in that state of things was to be expected) urged on by Captain Drake—that he had the bills of costs in his possession an ample time beforehand—that he might have had them all taxed, those in the suits under the order, the others upon application to the Court—that he applied for and obtained an abatement of £183 in a negotiation through his agent, who, in the course of it waived the taxation—it appears to me that there was no surprise or fraud practised upon him in the settlement, and that he cannot now be entitled to taxation, or to any account, unless it should appear that the overcharges are in themselves so extravagant and improper as, under the circumstances, to be considered fraudulent, or unless the charge of £75, stated to be a probable amount only, should be considered to affect the character of the account as a settled account.

As to the overcharges, I have not only considered the several items complained of, but have also obtained the assistance of an experienced clerk in Court in examining all the bills which were brought into the account. There are overcharges, but none such as can, with any propriety, be deemed fraudulent; and upon a careful examination of the bills, it appears that the sums overcharged, together with the sums charged in items which are questionable, do not, in the whole, amount to the sum of £183, which Messrs. Harper & Parry Jones voluntarily agreed to deduct from the amount of their bills.

The item of £75 is expressed in terms which shew that, at the time when the account was settled, it was not deemed by the parties that all transactions between them [445] were finally closed; but the same was retained, by consent, to answer particular costs noticed in the item stating the retainer: and under the circumstances of this case, and considering that the amount was settled in this way, because of the urgent request of Captain Drake, I think that the account cannot be considered unsettled with reference to anything but the sum of £75.

Messrs. Harper & Parry Jones may be required to deliver their bills of costs for obtaining the Master's report, and the other matters for which credit for the sum of £75 was taken in the account, and such bill may be taxed under the decree; and the present petition is dismissed, with costs.

On the petitions of Mrs. Drake and of Mr. Lloyd, her executor,

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS afterwards delivered the following judgment:—The first of these petitions prays, that Messrs. Harper & Parry Jones may pay certain sums of money alleged to be due from them: that an account may be taken of all sums of money received by them on account of Mrs. Drake, and of their application thereof: that Mr. Harper and Messrs. Harper & Parry Jones may deliver certain bills of costs, and that such bills may be taxed: that the amount which shall be found due may be paid, and that Messrs. Harper & Parry Jones may deliver up all books and papers belonging to the Petitioner.

The second petition is presented by the executor of Mrs. Drake, and prays the benefit of the former [446] petition, and that two other bills of costs may be taxed.

It appears that Mrs. Drake for some years employed Mr. Harper as her solicitor, and that she afterwards employed Messrs. Harper & Parry Jones in that character. During the employment, several sums of money had been received and paid for Mrs. Drake, by Mr. Harper alone, and also by Harper & Parry Jones; and accounts had been, from time to time, delivered, comprising statements of the monies received and paid, and also of the charges for business done. In June 1839 a decree was pronounced, under which Mrs. Drake became entitled to receive £187, 19s. 7d., and in August 1840 she executed a power of attorney to enable the London agent of Harper & Parry Jones to receive it. This money was accordingly received. She wished to have the money paid to her, and Harper & Parry Jones claiming a bill of costs amounting to £47, 15s. 10d., she did not dispute that, but desired to have the balance of £140, 3s. 9d. paid to her. Mr. Harper having expressed his willingness to pay it, application was made to their agents. Upon this application objections were made, and Mrs. Drake, being very naturally dissatisfied, employed another solicitor, who, failing to obtain the only sum then claimed, examined the former accounts of Harper and of Harper & Parry Jones; and in the result presented this petition, desiring to have all the accounts taken, and all the bills taxed.

It was objected to the petition, in the first instance, that it was multifarious, in praying relief against Harper separately, and also against Harper & Parry Jones jointly; but it not appearing to me that under the circumstances the objection was valid, evidence was [447] gone into upon the merits, and it appears that five several accounts had been delivered to Mrs. Drake by Mr. Harper, and three by Harper & Parry Jones. The accounts marked with the letters A to E are Mr. Harper's accounts, the accounts marked with the letters F to H are the accounts of Harper & Parry Jones. At the time when the petitions were heard, I stated my opinion that the accounts subsequent to F should be investigated, and the bills of costs there referred to taxed. The questions reserved arise upon Mr. Harper's accounts, and the first account delivered by Harper & Parry Jones. Mr. Harper alleges, that all his accounts were examined and settled by Mrs. Drake after due consideration, and his affidavit having been sworn and filed after the death of Mrs. Drake, has not been answered; so that the circumstances under which the alleged settlement took place, rest entirely upon his statement. Upon the first account which is marked A, a balance of £94, 5s. 1d. appeared to be due to Mr. Harper; Mrs. Drake was charged for costs to a considerable amount, and the amount of those bills of costs was claimed by her against the testator's estate. Mr. Harper says that the bills themselves were carefully gone through by the Master, and thereupon the costs were allowed to her in the suit, and in 1836 she took from Mr. Harper a receipt for the balance appearing to be due to him; and at this time no specific error in any of the bills comprised in those accounts is alleged; and under such circumstances, it does not appear to me that the account ought to be disturbed.

The second account, B, was delivered in the year 1834. In it Mrs. Drake is not charged with the amount of any bill of costs, and the balance of £158, 19s. 2d. was then paid to her; and no specific error being alleged, [448] I am of opinion that this account ought not to be disturbed.

The third account, C, was delivered in the month of December 1835, and Mr. Harper in his affidavit states, that in this account there are contained by mistake three items of £4, 7s., £6, 8s. 10d., and £5, 9s. 8d., which had been previously charged to Mrs. Drake. The relation of solicitor and client continued between Mr. Harper and Mrs. Drake. When the account was delivered, Mrs. Drake having the opportunity of examining it, there were three overcharges amounting together to £16, 5s. 6d. to her prejudice, and yet she signed it. The item of £4, 7s. is distinctly complained of by the petition as an overcharge, and although Mr. Harper states, that in the subsequent account between Mrs. Drake and Harper & P. Jones, Mrs. Drake has credit for the several items so erroneously charged, yet it does not appear to me that this voluntary offer, subsequently made by Mr. Harper, or Harper & Parry Jones, can entitle Mr. Harper to consider the account as finally settled at the time. It is now clear that the sum of £44, which Mr. Harper claimed to be due to him of the balance of this account, was, in fact, not due, but was an overcharge, by the sum of £16, 5s. 6d. at the least.

The next account, D, commences with the erroneous balance of £44, and ends with a sum retained by Mr. Harper towards his bill and stamps, and I think that it cannot be considered as an account finally settled. And with respect to the account E, the last between Mr. Harper and Mrs. Drake, the two last items are a sum of £57 retained towards a bill, and a sum of £57, 10s. 3½d. retained to pay Mr. Fraser Drake's debts, [449] and it does not appear to me that this can be considered as finally settled.

The next account, in order of time, is the first between Mrs. Drake and Harper & Parry Jones. It appears to have been settled and signed in March or April 1833, the balance appearing on the account was paid to Mrs. Drake; and it being discovered that two sums of £31, 9s. 7d. and £15 were erroneously charged, those sums were paid to Mrs. Drake, in addition to the apparent balance; and it being distinctly sworn that each and every of the bills of costs mentioned in this account was delivered to Mrs. Drake, and no error in them being specified, I think that the account must be considered as finally settled. The subsequent accounts appear to me to be open.

Refer it to the Master to tax Mr. Harper's bills of costs subsequent to those commenced in account A, and to take an account of his receipts and payments on account Mr. Drake, not disturbing the accounts A and B.
And refer it to the Master to tax the bills of costs of Harper & P. Jones subsequent to those mentioned in account F, and to take an account of the receipts and payments of Harper & Parry Jones on her account, not disturbing the account F.

[450] ROBINSON v. HUNT. Nov. 15, 16, 17, 1841.

Test of an annuity to A. and B., and to the survivor for life; and if A. should have any "children," then to be equally divided between them; but if A. should die "without lawful issue," then to A. and his heirs for ever. Held, that the children of A. took absolute interests in a perpetual annuity.

The testator, by his will, bequeathed to his brother Samuel Hunt an annuity of £50 to be paid by two half-yearly annuities of £50 each, and after his decease he bequeathed the same annuity to Catherine Hunt, the testator's sister-in-law, and Charles Hunt, the testator's nephew, to be equally divided between them during their lives, and to the survivor of them; and he then "charged his estate (excepting the land in his will described) for the due payment of the said annuities of £50 on the 5th day of April and 10th day of October in every year after his decease during their lives, or the life of the longest liver of them, his said brother, his wife, or his nephew, and in case of non-payment, thirty days after the said annuity should have been properly demanded, he authorised his said brother, during his life, to seize the said estate, and to receive the rents and profits until he should be paid the said annuity; and also, after his decease, the same power and authority to his said sister-in-law, or his nephew, during their joint lives, or the longest liver during his life." The testator then expressed himself as follows:—"And if my said nephew should have any children lawfully begotten, then the said annuity to be equally divided between them; but if only one child, then that child to receive the said annuity; but if my nephew aforesaid should die without issue lawfully begotten, then I will and bequeath the said annuity of £100, to be paid as aforesaid, should be given to my son Charles Westley, and to his heirs for ever."

[1] Samuel Hunt, Samuel Hunt the younger, and Catherine Hunt were all children of the testator, the latter being the last survivor. There were several children of Samuel Hunt the younger, and the question was, what interest they took in the annuity of £100. Pemberton, Mr. Kindersley, Mr. Bichner, and Mr. F. Calvert, for the several MASTERS OF THE ROLLS said, the only doubt seemed to be, whether the parent intended to create the nature of an estate tail; but he reserved judgment.

[17.] THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS said, that the decisions did not appear to him; but he thought in this case that the word "issue" ought to be read "such issue" meaning "children," and that the children took absolute interests in a perpetual annuity of £100 a year. (See Tweedale v. Tweedale, 10 Sim. 453, and Blewitt v. Roberts, 10 Ves. 491, and Cr. & Ph. 274.)

THE COURT—Declare the children of Samuel Hunt, the son, "entitled or acquired interests in perpetuity, in equal shares, as tenants in common, to or in the annuity of £100 bequeathed by the will of Charles Hunt, the testator."

[452] PERRY v. WALKER. (Ex relatione.) Nov. 18, 1841.

A pauper's notice of motion should be signed by his clerk in Court.

The court opened a motion on behalf of a party suing in forma pauperis. Pemberton, contra, objected that the motion had not been signed by the clerk in Court: Gardiner v. — (17 Ves. 387).

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS referred to Perry v. Walker (2 Keen, 665).

Mr. Glasse, as amicus Curie, stated that in a recent case of Baxter v. Pitcher the Vice-Chancellor of England had not followed that decision, and that in a subsequent case of Empringham v. Short (July 23, 1841) before the Lord Chancellor, his Lordship had restored the old rule.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale] said that, on the former occasion, he had acted on a certificate received from the Six Clerks' Office. He was, however, glad that the Lord Chancellor had thought fit to revive the old practice, which he was now bound to act on.

NOTE.—Since the abolition of the Six Clerks the solicitor of a pauper must sign the notices of motion; but if the pauper proceeds in person, the signature of the pauper himself seems now sufficient. (16th General Order, October 1842. See Ordinance Can. 212.)

[453] THE ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. THE SOUTH SEA COMPANY. Nov. 17, 18, 1842

[See In re Mason's Orphanage [1896], 1 Ch. 60, 596.]

Lease for 999 years of charity property, at a fixed rent, upheld, the arrangement appearing free from fraud, and for the benefit of the charity.

In a proper case, charity trustees have the power of alienating the charity property.

The object of this information was to set aside a lease of charity property, which had been granted for a term of 999 years, at a fixed rent of £45.

By an indenture dated in 1667, Margaret Taylor conveyed to Matthew Smalwood and other parishioners of the parish of St. Martin Outwich, in the City of London, as their heirs, "eight messuages, with a tenement, coal-hole, and premises, situate in Hammond's Alley, in or near Bishopsgate Street, in that parish," to be received of the churchwardens, and applied, with the advice and assistance of the parson and ancients of the parish who should have borne the office of churchwarden, upon certain charitable trusts, for the benefit of the poor of the parish; and as to some small sums for two sermons to be preached yearly.

By an indenture dated in 1725, the churchwardens, parson, and several other persons, being parishioners and trustees, in consideration of £135 paid them, demised the property to the South Sea Company, for 999 years, at a clear yearly rent of £50, with liberty to pull down the buildings and erect new ones. The lease contained a covenant, on the part of the lessees, to keep the buildings to be erected thereon in repair.

It appeared that the property was, at the time of making the lease, let to tenants at small rents, which, together, amounted to about £77 a year; but it was proved by the parish books, that the expenses for [454] repairs, rates, &c., paid by the landlords, were such as to reduce the average of the net rents received during the previous years to the sum of £24, 7s.

After obtaining the lease, the old houses were pulled down, and part of the South Sea House and other valuable buildings were erected on the site.

The particulars of this case being certified by the Charity Commissioners under 59 G. 3, c. 81, this information was filed in 1830, against the South Sea Company and other persons alleged to be in possession of the property; it submitted, that the lease ought to be set aside, and that the full rent ought to be accounted for; charged, that the rent in 1725 was greater than £45 a year, and that even if the reserved rent was the full value of the premises, the lease was a very improvident lease, by reason of the length of time for which the same was granted. It charged also, that it was a fraud and breach of trust on the part of the trustees, and it prayed that the lease might be delivered up to be cancelled, and that the Defendants might account for a fair rent.

The Defendants insisted on the validity of the lease, and stated, that so far from being improvident and improper, the arrangement was beneficial and advantageous to the charity; that the premises were at the time in a ruinous and dilapidated state.

and were situate in an obscure alley, having no thoroughfare or frontage to any principal street, and that it afforded no prospect of improvement.

At the hearing the parish books were produced, from which it appeared, that several meetings of the rector, churchwardens, and parishioners had taken place between the years 1720 and 1725, for the purpose of considering the best mode of disposing of the charity property.

One was held in June 1720 "to hear the proposal of a Mr. Carpenter to build upon the estate, who promised to give his proposal in writing within fourteen days." Another was held in October following, to consider whether it was for the interest of the parish to let the ground and houses on lease, and if so, what price to set thereon, and for what term of years; when it was agreed to make an offer to Mr. Gore to let it by lease for sixty-one years, he building thereon to the value of £1500 and upwards, he paying £35 per annum clear of all taxes, provided Mr. Gore returned his answer in two months.

Mr. Gore having given no answer, and the houses being very much out of repair, a committee was appointed in March following, for arranging with workmen to put the houses into repair in December 1721.

What became of this proposal did not appear, but another meeting took place on the 11th of March 1724, at which, as it appeared from the parish books, "Mr. Gore acquainted the vestry that he had some discourse with a committee of the South Sea Company, about taking a lease of the parish houses and ground in Hammond's Alley, and that the South Sea Company had made the following offer to the parish:—First, to take a lease of all the premises, at the yearly rent of £45 per annum, to be paid clear of all taxes and deductions whatsoever now due or hereafter to be laid on the premises; second, the lease to be for the term of 999 years; third, the rent to be paid half-yearly; fourth, to commence from Lady Day 1725. It was resolved n. d. c. that the vestry [456] agreed to the said proposals; and that Mr. Gore, Mr. Bedle, Mr. Martin, Mr. Knight, and Mr. Nichols, or any three of them be desired to attend and conclude this affair." It also appeared from the books that on the 10th of April 1724 new trustees of the property were appointed, and it was agreed, "that the said new trustees with the churchwardens should forthwith grant a lease of the said estate to the South Sea Company, pursuant to the agreement proposed and agreed on at the last vestry."

Mr. Turner and Mr. Blunt, in support of the information, contended that the case in question amounted to an absolute alienation of the property, and could not, on any principle, be supported. They asked that it might be set aside without making any allowance to the Defendants for their expenditure on the charity land.

Attorney-General v. Green (6 Ves. 451), Attorney-General v. Owen (10 Ves. 555), Attorney-General v. Brettingham (3 Beavan, 91).

Mr. Tinney, Mr. Lovat, and Mr. Bosanquet, for the South Sea Company, insisted on the validity of the lease, contending that there was no law or rule of this Court which prevented the absolute alienation of charity property, provided it were beneficial. That here the arrangement was fair and open, and free from all fraud, and was found to be one most beneficial to the charity.

That if the lease were set aside, allowance ought to be made by the charity to the Defendants for their permanent and lasting expenditure on the property, which would be manifestly destructive of the charity.

[457] Attorney-General v. Hungerford (8 Bligh. 437, and 2 Cl. & F. 357), Attorney-General v. Cross (3 Mer. 540), and Attorney-General v. Warren (2 Swan. 302).

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. J. Russell, for the executors of Mr. Mellish.

Mr. Lloyd and Mr. Bayley, for the Defendant Irving.

Mr. Kinderaley and Mr. R. D. Thompson, for the Defendant Simpson.

Mr. Turner, in reply.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS said, he must carefully look over the admissions before he decided the case.

Nov. 18. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. The object of this information is to set aside a lease granted by the trustees of a charity to the South Sea Company.

The lease, being for a term of 999 years at a fixed rent of £45 a year, is admitted to be an alienation of the property; and it is contended in support of the information, that in this Court it ought to be considered as void, if not simply because it is an alienation, yet because it is an alienation for want of sufficient consideration, and injurious to the charity.

It is the duty of the trustees of a charity so to manage and dispose of the property intrusted to them, as may best promote and maintain the charitable purposes of the founder.

[458] It is plain that, in ordinary cases, a most important part of this duty is to preserve the property; but it may happen, that the purposes of the charity may be best sustained and promoted by alienating the specific property. The law has not forbidden the alienation, and this Court, upon various occasions, with a view to promote the permanent interests of charities, has not thought it necessary to preserve the property in specie, but has sanctioned its alienation.

That which the Court might have done, upon its own consideration of what would have been beneficial to the charity, might have been done by trustees, upon their own authority, in the exercise of their legal powers; and however imprudent it may have been in trustees to take so great a risk upon themselves, and in other parties to contract with them and take conveyances from them under such circumstances; yet if upon consideration it should appear upon subsequent investigation, that the transaction was fair and beneficial to the charity at the time, it does not appear to be the duty of the Court to set it aside, merely because circumstances have occurred, which, at the time of inquiry and after the lapse of many years, it may be supposed that a greater revenue might have been derived from the specific property, than from the property substituted on the alienation complained of.

The Court must consider the original fairness and prudence of the transaction.

There is necessarily a great difference between the dealing of an individual with his own property, and the dealing of a trustee with trust property. The trustee is not permitted to act as he pleases, or upon his own view of what is best: he is to act as to be always [459] prepared to shew to the satisfaction of a Court of Equity that he has acted fairly and prudently in the administration of the trust, and for the benefit of the cestui que trusts. The difficulty of doing this after a great lapse of time is obvious; but if the difficulty is overcome, the trustees and those dealing with them are not to be charged as in the case of breach of trust, merely because there was an alienation of the specific property comprised in the trust.

In this case, the circumstances only appear from certain entries in the books of vestry; and having carefully examined them, I am of opinion that there was no fraudulent contrivance. It appears that the subject was discussed publicly, not only before the trustees, but before the clergyman and parishioners, who, from their position, were best qualified to consider what was most beneficial to the trust:—the mode of managing with the property was frequently discussed, and that the present one was not adopted until the others had all failed; nothing like fraud therefore be imputed: the property was of a nature likely to produce considerable difficulty in the receipt of rent; the tenements were small, and the rents irregularly received, there being instances of three or four years' arrears, so that the steady rental for the charity could not be relied on, and a considerable outlay for repairs had become necessary. In addition to this the clear rents received for many years before the transaction were greatly less than the rent obtained.

Taking into consideration the nature of the property, the difficulty in collecting rents, the outlay which had become necessary, and the other circumstances of the case, I think it may be reasonably inferred that a greater income was secured to the charity than any [460] ever received, or likely to be received; and, on the whole, without saying that the evidence is strong, I think I must conclude that the arrangement was prudent and beneficial to the charity.

If I thought it likely that further evidence or information could be produced, should be disposed to direct an inquiry before the Master; but as that is improbable, I think there is enough to warrant me in saying that the transaction was beneficial and the information must therefore be dismissed.

[460] KING v. BRYANT. Nov. 18, 19, 1841.

[S. C. sub nom. King v. Hammett, 11 L. J. Ch. 14; 5 Jur. 1052.]

A simple contract creditor who had instituted and prosecuted a suit for administration, in the face of information furnished by the legal personal representative (which turned out to be correct), that there were no assets for the payment of simple contract debts, was ordered to pay the costs of the suit.

This was a creditor's suit, instituted by the Plaintiff on behalf of himself and all other creditors of Mr. Hammett against the Defendant, his administratrix.

The intestate was indebted to the Plaintiff in the sum of £42, and to one Mrs. Tredy in the sum of £159, both being debts on simple contract. The Defendant, however, being pressed by Mrs. Tredy, gave her a warrant of attorney to confess judgment, and on which judgment was entered up. The intestate was also indebted £60 for rent, and his assets amounted to about £200.

The Plaintiff applied to the Defendant for payment of his debt, and was informed that the assets were insufficient, and an account was promised. The Plaintiff read his bill, and the Defendant before putting in her answer, remonstrated with the Plaintiff on the proceeding, and furnished an account, shewing the deficiency of the assets after payment of the rent and judgment debt. The Plaintiff, however, persisted in prosecuting his suit, and compelled the Defendant to put in her answer, which she made the same statement. The Plaintiff afterwards obtained an order for payment of a sum of £91, then in the Defendant's hands, into Court. He proceeded to obtain a decree, and had the accounts taken in the Master's office. The state of the assets turned out upon the Master's report, as represented by the Defendant, so that there appeared to be no fund for the payment of simple contract creditors.

The cause came on for further directions on the Master's report, which found no money due from the Defendant.

Mr. Kindersley and Mr. Lewis asked for the costs of suit out of the fund in Court. Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Glasse insisted, that the Plaintiff, having rashly prosecuted the suit, from which it was clear from the beginning that he could obtain no advantage, and having wholly failed, ought to pay the costs; Barker v. Wardle (Myl. & K. 818), Bluet v. Jessop (Jacob, 240), Anonymous (4 Mad. 273), Robinson v. Burt (1 Russ. 599), were cited.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. Where a creditor's suit is properly commenced and prosecuted by a simple contract creditor, and the assets are realized in the suit, he will be entitled to payment of his costs, although the estate is deficient for the payment of the specialty creditors. (Lechmere v. Brazier, 1 Russ. 72; Larkins v. Aston, 2 M. & K. 320; Barker v. Wardle, 2 M. & K. 818.) Every creditor has a right to have an account of the assets, but it does not follow that he is to be satisfied, out of the assets of others, against every expense which he may rashly and judiciously incur.

Here the suit was neither properly commenced or prosecuted. The Plaintiff has not fit to carry it on in the face of information as to the state of the assets which turned out to be perfectly correct, for the state of the assets, the existence of the simple debt, and the Master's report are not now questioned. The Plaintiff has, therefore, proceeded at his own peril, and the representations made before suit, and in his answer, turning out to be perfectly accurate, he must pay the costs of the suit. The Defendant must have her extra costs out of the fund, and the remainder will go to the judgment creditor.

[462] THE ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. PRETYMAN. Nov. 16, 17, 21, 1841.

[For subsequent proceedings, see 8 Beav. 316; 19 Beav. 538.]

Master of an ancient hospital held liable to refund fines, which, according to custom of his predecessors, he had received for renewals of leases. Discretion of the Court in limiting the enforcement of the strict rights of charities how regulated. Reference to the Attorney-General.

By a deed, dated in 1244, Simon de Roppell, "gave, granted, and by that present charter confirmed, in pure and perpetual alms to God and the Blessed Mary and to the Hospital of St. John the Baptist, which he had erected in his court of law for the perpetual support of thirteen poor persons as well in bed and food as clothing, and other things belonging to competent food and clothing, and of a chaplain there ministering and his household, all his land which he had in the Manors with all the appurtenances" and other property therein described, and he gave and granted to the Bishop of Lincoln and his successors, the right of patronage of said hospital, so that the Bishop of Lincoln, whosoever he was for the time being might appoint a fit chaplain warden of the said hospital, who might wear any religious habit according to the disposition of the said bishop, and should there perform service for the salvation of his soul, and of his wife Alice, and of his father, mother, and of his predecessor and successors, and of Hugh his son; and he gave "that the warden chaplain, once in the year, should render an account to the Bishop of Lincoln or to his attorney," and should be removed "if he should not conduct himself as it beseemed him, as well in spiritual as temporal matters;" and in case of the death of any of the poor persons, others were to be substituted by the chaplain with the consent of the bishop.

For a long series of years, the chaplain wardens had been in the habit of granting leases of the property at a rent of £32, taking, however, large fines for the renewals which they retained for their own benefit.

In 1817 the then Bishop of Lincoln appointed the Defendant, his son, to be chaplain warden.

In 1819 the Defendant renewed the lease for twenty-one years, reserving the rent of £32, and taking a fine exceeding £9000; he subsequently, in the years 1822, 1834, again renewed the lease for twenty-one years, taking fines of £2200, £1742, 10s., and which he retained for his own use, according to the custom of his predecessors, and he had received about £750 for timber.

[464] The Defendant out of the annual rent of £32 applied £24 to the use of the poor persons, and retained the remainder.

The building of the hospital had ceased to exist, and it appeared that no services were performed by the Defendant.

The property consisted of 874 acres of tithe free land, the annual value of which was admitted to exceed £1200.

The case having been investigated by the Charity Commissioners in 1839, information was filed in May 1839, to have it declared that the Defendant was entitled to the whole rents beyond the £24; to establish the charity on a new footing; and to make the Defendant account for his receipts in respect of the rents and timber. A transcript book containing a copy of the charter was in the possession of the dean and chapter, which they refused to produce to the Charity Commissioners without the assent of Pretyma, which he refused to give, but he stated by his evidence that the contents were well known, and easily ascertained from other sources, and that material advantage would have resulted from the production of the copy.

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Blunt, for the Attorney-General, asked that the Defendant might be decreed to pay the amount of the fines and timber money with interest, which together amounted to about £13,700; or at least, that he might be decreed to the charity for the full annual value of the property until the expiration of the lease in 1855. They further asked that Pretyma might pay the costs; and that dean and chapter [465] might not have costs, on the ground of their refusal to assist in the investigation of the matter.

Mr. Kindersley and Mr. Loftus Wigram, for the Defendant Pretymán, contended, that in cases of this kind, where parties had erroneously followed the practice of their predecessors, the Court was inclined to act leniently. Brenthwood School case (1 Myl. & K. 376), Attorney-General v. Corporation of Exeter (Jacob, 448), Attorney-General v. Leachbury (3 Myl. & K. 647). That it would be ruin to the parties to make them find that, which, having every reason to believe their own, they had spent; and that, if liable, the Court or the Attorney-General ought under the circumstances to prevent the strict rights of the charity from being enforced.

They argued that, under the stat. 32 H. 8, c. 28, the masters of hospitals had the same power of taking fines on renewals as bishops.

Mr. Faber, for the Bishop of Lincoln.

Mr. Barlow, for the dean and chapter.

Mr. Pemberton, in reply.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. This case must, in a great degree, depend on the conduct of the Defendant: I will therefore read his answer, in order to satisfy myself on that point. It is however a great mistake to suppose that the Court has any discretion in determining the right of a charity. The discretion is only in considering how far that right [466] is to be enforced. These sums of money, upon all doubt, belong to the charity; but whether it is expedient and proper, in the exercise of that discretion to which Sir Thomas Plumer adverted, in the case cited, and to which discretion I have myself very often resorted to enforce the full right, must, in this as in all these cases, be the subject of serious consideration.

I have always considered, that where a party has, quite innocently, possessed charity property which ought to have been applied according to the directions of the Court, and has so continued for a number of years, until by some incidental circumstance he has been apprised of the erroneous application, if he then comes forward, I give every facility to the future due application of the trust money, it is by no means an improper exercise of the discretion of this Court to save him as much as is possible from a by-gone account. I have very frequently acted on that principle, which I consider for the benefit of charities in general; for by acting on that principle, great facility has been afforded in realizing charity property, which otherwise might not have been recovered from misapplication. The promptitude of the Defendant to set in setting the matter right, is an important element to be considered in the exercise of that discretion; if there has been a resistance to the establishment of the right or a concealment of the evidence, which concealment would lead to the presumption that there may have been more previous knowledge than is admitted, it becomes much more difficult thing to give to a Defendant the benefit of that discretion.

It is not to be forgotten, also, that instances have occurred in cases of this description in which the Court, however hard it might think the case, has not thought [467] right to act on the discretion which it sometimes thinks fit to exercise. There is a case in which Lord Eldon did not think fit to exercise it himself, but referred the matter to the Attorney-General, and in that manner obtained from that public officer, who was prosecuting for the Crown, the benefit of his opinion upon the matter. I have read over this answer, and see what ought to be done in this case.

Nov. 17. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS said he had examined the answer, and that he thought, under the circumstances, the more lenient course proposed by the counsel for the information might be pursued in this case, and that the Defendant ought to be charged with the rack rent, after deducting the reserved rent of £32 from the sum of the Commissioners' report down to the expiration of the leases.

It was afterwards found that the amount to be paid by the Defendant would, according to this principle, amount to so considerable a sum, that the Defendant would be utterly unable to pay it, and the case was, after some, not very hostile discussion, referred to the consideration of the Attorney-General. (See The Attorney-General v. Brettingham, 3 Beav. 91.)

[468] PAINE v. HYDE. Nov. 24, 25, 1841.

A testator gave a legacy to A. in the event of B. dying unmarried, but upon express condition that A. should within three years from the testator's death, to the executors all monies due from him to the testator. Held, that the condition was substantially performed by a payment after the expiration of the three years and that the legacy was payable.

In this case the testator, by his will, gave the income of his residuary estate to Catherine Paine during her life, if she continued unmarried. If she married, he gave her only an annuity of £30, and gave the residue of his estate to the children of Thomas Hyde by his wife Hannah; but in case Catherine Paine died unmarried (which event happened), he directed his trustees to transfer sums of £600 consols each one of four persons, viz., John, Edward, Thomas, and George Fowle; but in the event of the death of either of them, then he directed the trustees "to pay, assign, or transfer the said legacy of him so dying, unto and equally amongst such of his children as should be then living, when and so soon as the youngest of such children should attain the age of fourteen years;" and to pay, assign, and transfer the residue of his estate unto such person as Catherine Paine should appoint, and in default of her appointment (which happened), to the children of Thomas Hyde by Hannah his wife. He then expressed his will to be, "that the legacies given to them, the said John, Edward, Thomas, and George Fowle, were given to them subject to and upon this condition, that they, respectively, and their respective heirs, executors, and administrators, should, within three years next after his the testator's decease, well and lawfully pay or cause to be paid unto the testator's trustees and executors, all debts or moneys as should or might be due or owing by or from them or any of them at the time of his decease." And he declared that nothing in his will contained should invalidate or make void the securities which he held for [469] the repayment of a loan due to him from Edward, Thomas, and George Fowle.

The testator died in January 1800.

Thomas and George Fowle were indebted to the testator in the sum of £1900, which was not paid until January 1804. Edward and Thomas were also indebted to the testator in the sum of £1900, and were bound to secure the reinvestment of £6400 consols, which sums were not repaid and reinvested until May 1806. George Fowle was also indebted to the testator in the sum of £345, which was not repaid until May 1806; so that, in effect, the monies were not repaid within the three years from the testator's death, as required by the will.

Edward, Thomas, and George Fowle afterwards died in the lifetime of Catherine Paine and she died unmarried in January 1840.

The legacies were now claimed by the children of Edward, Thomas, and George Fowle, who presented a petition in the cause for payment.

Their claim was opposed by the persons entitled to the residuary estate, on the ground that the condition (viz., payment of the debts within three years next after the testator's death), had not been performed, and that upon the context of the will, taken in connection with the words in which the condition was expressed, it appeared that the testator intended a strict performance.

Mr. Kindersley and Mr. Purvis, in support of the petition. This is a simple condition, not of a conditional limitation, and there is no gift over; in such case the [470] Court will not declare a forfeiture where the condition has been substantially performed. Thus, in Simpson v. Vickers (14 Ves. 341, 348), cited in On Legacies, pp. 664, 667. Mr. Simpson bequeathed to his brother Michael a sum of money to be paid within six calendar months after his (the testator's) decease, upon his executing to the executrix a release of all claims and demands; and if he refused to do so, the testator revoked the bequest, appointing his sister Elizabeth sole executrix. It seemed that Michael did not give the release within the time prescribed; nevertheless Sir W. Grant declared him to be entitled to the legacy, releasing all demands.

It is a general principle of the Court, that it will relieve against a forfeiture.

occasioned by the mere non-payment of money within a particular time; Cage v. Ruel (2 Vent. 352); as in the case of mortgages, or of a forfeiture of a lease for non-payment of the rent, though forfeited at law, the Court will give relief, on payment of the arrears of rent; Lowat v. Lord Ranelagh (3 Ves. & B. 24): so where there is a gift to a person, provided he shall marry with consent, the Court construes the condition as in terrorem only.

The condition does not apply to the Petitioners, who are the children, for the testator says, "the legacies given by me to them, the said Edward, Thomas, and George Fowle, are given to them upon this condition," &c. This condition, therefore, does not apply to the children.

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Beavan, contra. [471] Where a condition is precedent, he bequest will not take effect, unless the condition is literally performed. Here there is no question as to forfeiture, but a bounty was intended by the testator upon a particular condition, and unless the condition were performed, the legatee was to receive no legacy. In Davis v. Thomas (1 Russ. & Myl. 506) a party had a right to purchase an estate within five years, in case he regularly paid his rent. He did not comply with these terms, yet applied within the five years to repurchase, on tendering the rent due. What the Master of the Rolls said in that case is very applicable to the present; he says, "In all cases of the payment of money where penalty or forfeiture is introduced for the purpose of security, there a Court of equity will relieve against the penalty or forfeiture, upon the ground of full compensation by giving interest. But where there is no stipulation for penalty or forfeiture, but a privilege is conferred, provided money be paid within a stated time, were the party claiming that privilege must shew that the money was paid accordingly; as in a case of interest reserved on a loan at 5 per cent., with a proviso that 4 per cent. will be accepted, if paid within a limited time after it becomes due; in the case of a covenant for the renewal of a lease, on the payment of a certain sum at a stated period. Here it is admitted that the rent was not duly paid at the stipulated times, and no fraud, surprise, or accident is alleged; and the Plaintiff is therefore not entitled to the repurchase which he claims by this bill, and the bill must be dismissed with costs." This decision was affirmed on appeal. The same principle was acted on in Perry v. Meddowcroft (ante, 197). In Burgess v. Robinson (Mer. 7) a legacy was given, to be paid as soon as the legatee arrived in [472] England, or claimed the same, provided the claim was made within three years. It appeared that one of them came to England at the end of four years subsequently to the testator's death, after which, being informed for the first time of the will, he claimed the benefit intended for him by the testator; but Sir W. Grant, Master of the Rolls, determined against the title, observing, that the testator having imposed on a legatee a condition, with which he had not complied, although the non-compliance was the effect of the latter's ignorance of the provision, yet the consequence must be that he was not entitled to the legacy.

The case of Simpson v. Vickers (see Tulk v. Houlditch, 1 Ves. & B. 248, 259) is accurately stated in Roper: there was no such decision as that stated; the point decided was on the will of Mrs. and not of Mr. Simpson, and the condition in the will was if the legatee "refused or declined" to execute a release, and which it did not appear he had done; but it was there decided under the will of Mrs. Simpson, that the devise failed upon his non-performance of the condition stated in her will within the time specified.

The condition is applicable to the children, who take in substitution, for every provision attaching to an original legatee is applicable to the substituted legatee. If legacies were given free of legacy duty, the substituted legatee would take, discharged of legacy duty. The words, "the legacies given by me to them," viz., to the testator, are merely descriptive of the particular legacy, for the testator, in the preceding passage of his will, describes the subject of his gift to the children as "the said legacy of him dying," viz., of the parent. If the legatees had neglected to pay until the present day, [473] could they claim the legacies? The Petitioners ought to pay the costs of this petition, the neglect of the party having occasioned the question.

Mr. Willcock, in the same interest.

Mr. Kindersley, in reply. The gift to the children is a substantive gift, and the performance of the condition does not attach to them, but to the parents, the respective heirs, &c.

Nov. 25. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale], after stating the bequest and condition, said: The testator, by his will, has given a great number of legacies, some of which he directed to be paid at particular times; and as to many of his legacies, he directed that they should not be paid until after the expiration of three years from the time of his death. He directed the executors to get in the monies due to him, as soon as convenient after his death; and he declared, that the securities given by Edward, Thomas, and George Fowle were not to be invalidated by anything in his will. But on considering the whole will, it does not appear to me to throw any further light upon the testator's intention, as to the time limited for the performance of the condition, than is expressed in the statement of the condition itself.

The legacies were contingent upon the death of Catherine Paine, unmarried; and it was wholly uncertain whether she would marry or not, and at what time she would die; she might have died unmarried within three years after the testator's death. It was equally uncertain, whether the Fowles would survive her or not; and if she had died unmarried within the three years, the legacy might have become vested in the Fowles, or in [474] the children, before the expiration of the time appointed for the performance of the condition; and, looking at these circumstances, and considering the words in which the condition is expressed, I think that it is to be regarded as a condition merely for payment of money, in which the time limited has not, by the Court, been deemed to be of strict obligation; and that it was substantially performed by payment of the debts, although the money was not paid until after the expiration of the time limited in the condition.

I am therefore of opinion, that the Petitioners are entitled to the legacies which they claim, and also to the costs of the application.

When the testator in his gift to the children of Fowles, in the event of the original legatee's dying, describes each legacy as the legacy of him so dying, he does not mean to speak of the legacy as vested in him, but merely as a legacy which he had given to his children, if he had not died; and the legacies described as given to the children in the clause expressing the condition, were only contingent legacies, which, upon the deaths of the legatees in the lifetime of Catherine Paine, became incapable of being performed by the legatees, and in fact became contingent legacies to the children. If the will be construed strictly, they do not apply to the legacies given to the children, but to the legacies given to the legatees, consisting of the sums which in another event would have been given to the legatees. The testator may have meant otherwise, but it is not necessary to decide the point.

[475] HOLFORD v. PHIPPS. Feb. 9, 1840.

Trustees who unsuccessfully resisted the claim of the assignee from the cestui que trust, to have a term merged, held entitled to trustees' costs.

This case, which is reported 3 Beavan, 434, now came on to be spoken of in the minutes of the decree. It was contended on behalf of the Defendants' trustees, that they were entitled to trustees' costs.

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Piggott, for the Plaintiff.

Mr. Lloyd, contra. The Defendants throughout have insisted that they were trustees for the Plaintiff; there is, therefore, no ground whatever for giving them any other than ordinary costs as between party and party. They are not entitled to assume the character of trustees, merely for the purpose of obtaining extra costs.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. A term was vested in the Defendants in trust for securing a jointure to Mrs. Crespigny. By dealings between Mrs. Crespigny and the Plaintiff, the term became the property of the Plaintiff.

by that course of dealing, to which the Defendants were not parties, the trustees held the term in trust for the Plaintiff. The fact, however, was not made out up to the time of the hearing of the cause. The consequence was, that the Defendants were right in denying that they were trustees for the Plaintiff, until it was shewn by other evidence that they were no longer trustees for Mrs. Crespigny. Acting, therefore, from that time, as trustees for the Plaintiff, they ought to be allowed trustees' costs.

See Sherratt v. Bentley, 1 R. & M. 655; Norway v. Norway, 2 Myl. & K. 278.

[476] PROUDFOOT v. HUME. Nov. 26, 1841.

Right of a Plaintiff to have money in the Defendant's hands paid into Court, not proceed on admissions in the answer, made in reference to an equity raised by the bill, and not in reference to an independent equity stated only in the answer.

Under a will and a deed executed subsequent thereto, both being dated in 1815, Plaintiff was entitled to one-fifth part of the residuary estate of the testator.

This bill was filed against the executors, who were also trustees of the deed, for a general account of the testator's estate, and for payment to the Plaintiff of his proportion thereof.

The Defendants, by their answer, set up a settled account and release executed by the Plaintiff, whereby it was ascertained that the share of the Plaintiff amounted to the sum of £865, 19s. 3d., and he released them from all claims and demands, however, except from the amount so found due. The answer of the Defendant, one of the executors and trustees, further stated, that the said sum was treated and considered by the Plaintiff as an ascertained and liquidated sum, and that the Plaintiff expressly desired that the executors and trustees would retain the balance in their hands at 5 per cent., which he Hare agreed to do; and he further said, "that after the date and execution of the said indenture of release, the said sum of £865, 19s. 3d. was treated and considered by the said Plaintiff and Defendant as ascertained and liquidated sum in the hands of the Defendant, belonging to the Plaintiff, due and owing to him;" and that the Defendant Hare had, "from time to time made payments to the Plaintiff on account thereof, which payments amounted to a large sum in the whole."

[7] It was now moved, on behalf of the Plaintiff, that this sum might be paid into Court.

J. S. Bell, in support of the motion. There is sufficient admission to entitle the Plaintiff to an order for payment into Court; Mortlock v. Leathes (2 Mer. 491); and the Defendant may shew by affidavit what payments are to be deducted; Anonymous (1359).

J. James Parker, contrâ. The equity of the bill is for a general account against the Defendants as executors. The answers deny that equity, and state a case of a settled account, in respect of which the admission is made. The Plaintiff cannot rely on equity not alleged by his bill.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. The bill, as now framed, asks for relief in a case of an open and unsettled account. If the bill had sought relief on the footing of a settled account, I would, after calling on the Defendant to specify by affidavit the payments alleged to have been made, have made an order. That is the case here; the Defendant, instead of admitting an open unsettled account, has avowed by which it appears that there was a settled account. I think on this I cannot make the order. If I were to make the order at present, it would be in the Plaintiff's admission of the release, and which his bill does not admit.

The Plaintiff may amend his bill by setting out the release, and asking relief accordingly; he may then apply again to the Court.

[478] MORRALL v. SUTTON. Nov. 20, 26, 1841.

[S. C. 5 Beav. 100; 14 L. J. Ch. 266; 9 Jur. 697; 1 Ph. 533; 41 E. R. 735.]

Bequest of leaseholds, after prior life-estates, to A. B., her executors, administrators, and assigns, during the term of her natural life. Held, on the context, to give life-estate only.

The question in this case was, whether Sarah Calcott the younger, in the events which had happened, took an absolute interest or a life-estate only, under the terms of the testator's will, in certain leasehold premises.

The testator Edward Lloyd, by his will dated in 1789, amongst other things, expressed himself as follows. "I give and bequeath unto Ann Elizabeth Waring, Sarah Calcott the elder, and Mary Spencer, all my leasehold estate in Gloucestershire, held under the Dean and Chapter of Bristol; to hold to them for and during their joint natural lives, and the life of the longer liver of them, but subject nevertheless to, and charged and chargeable with, the following annuities (that is to say), one annuity of £20 a year to Esther Jerginson during her life, and with one other annuity of £20 a year to Sarah Jerginson, daughter of the said Esther Jerginson, during her life, and with one other annuity of £10 a year to Mrs. Addenbrooke; which several annuities I do hereby direct to be charged on my said estate in Gloucestershire, and to be paid half-yearly, as the rents of the said estate can be received, without any deduction for taxes or otherwise.

"And from and after the decease of the said Ann Elizabeth Waring, Sarah Calcott, and Mary Spencer, I give, devise, and bequeath my said leasehold estate in Gloucestershire (subject to the said several annuities as aforesaid) to the said Sarah Calcott the younger, if she shall be then living, her executors, administrators, and assigns, subject to the said annuities charged thereon, [479] during the term of her natural life. And if the said Sarah Calcott the younger shall die in the lifetime of the said Ann Elizabeth Waring, Sarah Calcott the elder, and Mary Spencer, leaving any lawful issue of her body, that shall be living at the decease of the survivor of them the said Ann Elizabeth Waring, Sarah Calcott the elder, and Mary Spencer; then I give, devise, and bequeath the said leasehold premises, from and after the several deceases of the said Ann Elizabeth Waring, Sarah Calcott the elder, and Mary Spencer, to such child or children of the said Sarah Calcott the younger as shall be then living, to be equally divided between them, if more than one, share and share alike; provided that if any child of the said Sarah Calcott the younger shall be then dead, leaving issue then living, such issue shall be entitled to the same share, as his, her, or their parent would have been if then living, equally between them if more than one. But if the said Sarah Calcott the younger shall die in the lifetime of the said Ann Elizabeth Waring, Sarah Calcott the elder, and Mary Spencer, or either of them, without leaving any lawful issue of her body that shall be living at the decease of the survivor of them the said Ann Elizabeth Waring, Sarah Calcott the elder, and Mary Spencer, then I give, devise, and bequeath all my said leasehold estate in Gloucestershire after their several deceases (but subject to the said annuities to Esther Jerginson widow, and her daughter Sarah Jerginson), to the said Thomas Jerginson the son and the said Charles Morrall, their executors, administrators, and assigns, for all the then residue of my said leasehold interest therein, in equal shares and proportions.

"And it is my will, and I do hereby require, that the person or persons who shall be possessed of the said leasehold estate by virtue of this my will, shall renew the said lease as often as occasion shall require, and not permit or suffer the same to be forfeited or become void, and that the expense of renewing the same shall be paid by and out of the rents and profits of the said premises, at the time of renewing thereof, without prejudice to the said annuitants; and that the several persons entitled to the rents of the said estate, except the said annuitants, shall pay a proportion of such expense, according to the amount of their respective estates and interests in the said premises; and if any or either of such persons interested (except as aforesaid) shall refuse to pay a proportionable share thereof as aforesaid, that the persons in possession of the said premises may detain and deduct the same out of the estate."

Sarah Calcott the younger married Sutton; she survived Ann Elizabeth Waring, Sarah Calcott the elder, and Mary Spencer, and she died in January 1838, and she made such a disposition of the property as, it was admitted, would entitle the Defendant thereto, provided she had been entitled to an absolute interest.

The question therefore was, whether under the above-mentioned bequest, Sarah Calcott the younger, who survived Ann Elizabeth Waring, Sarah Calcott the elder, and Mary Spencer, and died without having had any issue, took an estate for life, or an absolute interest.

Mr. Pemberton, Mr. Kindersley, and Mr. G. Russell. In the event which has happened there is a gift to Sarah Calcott, her executors, administrators, and assigns, during the term of her natural life; and the argument on the other side will be, that the words "during her life" are inconsistent with the previous absolute gift to S. C., her executors, &c., and must therefore be struck out; but the rule is, that words in a will are not to be rejected, [481] unless you are unable, by possibility, to give them a rational construction, Chambers v. Brailsford (19 Ves. 653). Here we contend, that there is no necessity for rejecting any of the words, for as there were no trustees interposed, it was convenient to give her the absolute legal interest for the purpose of surrendering the old lease, in order to obtain a renewal, though her beneficial interest was limited to her for her life only; it was necessary also to enable her executors to retain any proportion of the fines advanced by her for the benefit of those in remainder.

Again, it is a rule of construction, that where gifts are inconsistent, the latter prevails. If any words are to be rejected, they must be the words "executors, administrators, and assigns." S. C. therefore took for life only.

Mr. Tinney and Mr. Dixon, contra, contended that S. C. took an absolute interest. The general intention must prevail, and no words must be rejected if it can be avoided. There was a general intention in favour of S. C. the younger and her issue, but her issue would be excluded in case of her surviving the tenant for life, unless she took an absolute interest. If any words are to be rejected, they must be the words "during the term of her natural life."

In Doe dem. Cotton v. Stenlake (12 East, 515), there was a devise to one and her heirs during their lives, and the latter words were rejected. So in Reese v. Steel 2 Simons, 233, where the devise was to A. for life, and to her heirs the issue of her body for their lives; and in Spry v. Bromfield (7 Mees. & W. 545; and see 9 Sim. 324, and 10 Sim. 94, 224), [482] where the devise was "to J. B.'s wife and children, and which children at the death of their mother shall inherit the same jointly during their lives."

If she took the whole legal interest in trust for the purposes of renewal, then why was not the same extent of interest given to the previous tenants for life? But it is plain that she did not take an absolute interest for that purpose, for the annuities were charged upon the leasehold.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS. If the legatee took an absolute interest, then the bill must be dismissed; but if she took for life only, the question as to the fines paid for the renewals must then be disposed of.

I think I had better give the case some further consideration.

Nov. 26. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale], after stating the will, said: Sarah Calcott the younger survived Ann Elizabeth Waring, Sarah Calcott, and Mary Spencer, and afterwards died without having had any issue. Under these circumstances, the question upon this very confused and inaccurate will is, whether she took an estate for life only, or an absolute interest in the leaseholds devised.

The events contemplated by the testator were:—

1. Sarah Calcott the younger dying in the lifetime of the preceding tenants for life, with or without children.

2. Her surviving the three tenants for life.

[483] If she died in the lifetime of the three, leaving children who should be living at the death of the survivor of the three, these children were to take.

If she died in the lifetime of the three, or either of them, without leaving any child, there was a gift over.

If she survived the three tenants for life, then, after the death of the three first tenants for life, the testator bequeathed the leasehold estate (subject to the annuities to Sarah Calcott the younger, her executors, administrators, and assigns, subject to the annuities charged thereon during her natural life. And it is upon the construction of this clause that the question depends.

Prima facie the words in which the clause is expressed are inconsistent; the executors and administrators of Sarah Calcott could have no interest in an estate limited to her for life only.

And the argument, on the one hand, has turned upon the possibility of attributing a meaning to the words "executors and administrators," which may be consistent with the limitation for life, and, on the other hand, upon the possibility of attributing to the words "during her natural life" a meaning consistent with the gift of an absolute interest; and each party has contended, that if the words be irretrievably inconsistent, such of them as are repugnant to the interest which is claimed should be rejected.

In a case like this, it is impossible to come to a conclusion entirely satisfactory. We cannot reason upon what the testator might have done, if the case had occurred to him. A will so inaccurately expressed does not afford the means of clearly ascertaining the general [484] intention; and the mode in which the residuary clause is expressed, affords no evidence of the intention of the testator in the particular clause; and what is still more unfortunate is, that neither of the only two constructions which can be put upon the words, will have the effect of making every part of the clause clear and consistent.

The Plaintiff contends that the words "executors and administrators" have a special operation in securing the legatee as tenant for life a proportion of the fines which might have to pay on renewal, and moreover that the words "during her natural life" occurring at the end of the sentence, are entitled to great weight.

The Defendants contend that the words "during the term of her natural life" should be annexed exclusively to the immediately preceding words, "subject to the annuities charged thereon," so as to intimate no more than that the legatee's taking an absolute interest was, during her life, to keep down the charges.

There are objections to both these views of the case; but, on the best consideration I have been able to give to it, and as I own, without being able entirely to satisfy myself, it appears to me that the interpretation in favour of the Plaintiff is the most probable, and most consistent with the rules of construction, and with the rest of the bequest; and I think that the declaration must be that Sarah Calcott the younger took only an estate for life.

NOTE.—The cause was afterwards reheard before the Master of the Rolls, and his Lordship remained of the same opinion as to the construction. (See 5 Benv. 41.) The parties have however since appealed to the Lord Chancellor.

[485] EVANS v. WILLIAMS. Dec. 2, 1841.

The production of a writ of attachment for want of answer with the sheriff's return is sufficient evidence to ground the traversing order.

Mr. W. M. James moved for the traversing order under the 21st and 22d G. O. Orders of August 1841. (Ord. Can. 170.)

The Defendant was in the custody of the sheriff for want of answer.

The only evidence which was produced was the writ of attachment, and the indorsement on which (being the sheriff's return) it appeared that the sheriff had seized the Defendant under an attachment for want of answer.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. You may take the order.

[485] FRY v. MANTELL. Dec. 2, 1841.

An answer directed to be taken off the file, on the ground of the misnomer of the next friend of the infant Plaintiff.

Taking an office copy of an answer, not knowing of an irregularity in its title, is not a waiver.

The bill in this case was filed by Alfred Fry, an infant, by Jonathan Simmons, next friend.

In the heading of the answer, the next friend was named Jonathan Symmonds. Mr. Headlam, on behalf of the Plaintiff, moved to take the answer off the file, on ground of the irregularity in the title. He cited Griffiths v. Wood (11 Ves. 62), Cope v. Parry (1 Mad. 83).

[486] Mr. Rolt opposed the motion on two grounds:—

Firstly. That the mistake was only in the name of the next friend, which was material; and that there is no error in the name of the Plaintiff, as in Griffiths v.

Secondly. That the Plaintiff, by taking an office copy of the answer, had waived the objection. He cited Sidgier v. Tyte (11 Ves. 202), and Pieters v. Thompson (G. Rep. 249).

Mr. Headlam, in reply.

Dec. 2. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. I am of opinion that the answer must be taken off the file, and that the irregularity is fatal. I think it is necessary to name the next friend correctly; and the Plaintiff having discovered the error by means of the office copy, and not having taken the copy knowing the error, I think he cannot be held to have waived the irregularity. (See Yates v. Jacob, 223.)

[487] TANNER v. ELWORTHY. ELWORTHY v. TANNER. Dec. 3, 1841.

Where the tenant for life of leaseholds in settlement, being under no obligation to renew, obtains an extension of the term, he is a trustee, for those claiming under the settlement; and the fact of the settlement containing a special provision that a particular renewal shall enure to the benefit of the trust, does not prevent the application of this general rule.

Leaseholds were settled on A. B. for life, with remainder to his wife for life, with remainder to such child or children as he should appoint, and in default amongst them equally. A. B. renewed the leases in his own name, and by his will confirmed the settlement, and gave all "his freeholds and leaseholds" to his son, and a legacy to his daughter; he died, having other leaseholds besides those settled. Held, that the will was not an execution of the power; and, secondly, that the daughter was not to be put to her election.

This cause came on upon original and cross-bill. The former was filed to have it declared that certain leasehold estates for terms determinable on lives were subject to the terms of a settlement made in 1783, and the cross-bill to obtain from the Court a positive declaration.

In 1783 the leasehold property in question, which was called "The Hole" and "The Hole" was held on lease for a long term of years, determinable on several lives, of which Andrew Elworthy was one. This property had been for a series of years granted under similar leases, but contained no covenant for renewal.

The settlement dated in 1783, and made on the marriage of Richard Elworthy (the father of Andrew Elworthy) with Jane Luxton, the leasehold property was conveyed to them in trust for the husband for life, with remainder for the wife for life, with remainder to the children as the husband should appoint, and in default between them equally. A provision was made by the settlement, that if Richard Elworthy should be minded to procure a new lease in the name of a child of the marriage, in lieu of that of Andrew Elworthy, then the trustees were to surrender the old lease for the purpose, and it was agreed that such new lease should be held upon the trusts of the settlement.

There were two children of the marriage, viz., the Defendant Richard Elworthy the younger, and the Plaintiff Elizabeth, the wife of Jonathan Tanner.

After the death of Andrew, Richard obtained new leases of The Hole property, a term determinable upon the death of Richard Elworthy the younger; and he also, on the surrender of one of the old lives on the Yeo property, obtained a renewal for a term of years determinable on the decease of the Plaintiff Elizabeth Tanner.

These leases were taken in his own name, without reference to the settlement, and were not assigned to the trustees.

Richard Elworthy the elder died in 1805. By his will he confirmed his settlement "in favour of his wife," and he gave a legacy of £1000 to the Plaintiff his daughter. He also gave, devised, and bequeathed all his freehold and leasehold messuages, tenements, and hereditaments, with their and every of their rights, members, appurtenances, and all his estate and interest therein respectively, unto trustees, in trust, and for the benefit of his son Richard Elworthy, his heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns; and he gave the residue of his personal estate on certain trusts to his son Richard.

The testator had at his death other leaseholds besides those in settlement.

[489] After the testator's death the legacy was paid to the Plaintiff, and the leases were subsequently renewed upon a surrender of the old term.

Until 1831, when she died, the widow retained possession of the property.

The original bill insisted that these leases were now held on the trust of the settlement of 1783, and that no appointment of the property having been made, the same belonged to the Plaintiff and Defendant in equal moieties, as the only children of the marriage.

Dr. Pemberton, Mr. Girdlestone, and Mr. Teed, junior, for the Plaintiff. The settlement, where a trustee, or any person having a partial interest in leasehold property, renews the extended term is subject to the trust of the settlement. (See Giddings v. Giddings, 3 Russ. 241, and the cases in the note to Taster v. Mander, Ambler (2d ed.) 668.) The will is no execution of the power, and there is no election, for the testator had a leasehold property which satisfies the bequest of "leasehold messuages," and he expressly confirms the settlement; Rancliffe v. Parnell (6 Dow 149); and to give effect to the trusts of the settlement cannot be considered as a claim against the estate of the testator, Coleman v. Jones (3 Russ. 317).

Mr. George Turner and Mr. W. H. Clark, for the Defendant Elworthy.

Provision was made for the case of a renewal by inserting the life of a child of the marriage in lieu of that [490] of Andrew Elworthy. The parties having thus provided that the benefit of a particular renewal should enure to the benefit of the trust, it excluded all other renewals, which the tenant for life might make at his own cost and risk.

Secondly, the will of the testator, being executed according to all proper forms required by the power, is a due execution in favour of the Defendant; it expressly refers to the settlement containing the power, which is sufficient, for although the will does not state that it is made in execution of a power, yet, if it plainly refers to and comprises the subject of the power, it will be deemed a good execution, Hughes v. Gall (1 Russ. & Myl. 515, but see Hughes v. Turner, 3 Myl. & K. 666).

Thirdly, the Plaintiff must be put to her election between the benefit taken under the will and her interest in this property; for the property was vested in the Plaintiff, and he always treated it as his own, and to deprive the Defendant would be to defeat the will of the testator. The Plaintiff, having received her legacy, must be considered to have made her election.

Mr. Hallett, for a trustee.

Mr. Pemberton, in reply.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. A temporary and partial interest in this property seems to have been given by the settlement to Richard Elworthy elder, and being in possession of a partial interest in a leasehold property, he procured for himself the grant of reversionary leases therein. The first question is, whether [491] according to law, as administered in this Court, he could do that for his own benefit. According to the general rule, it is admitted, as it could not fail to be, that he could not take an enlarged interest for his own benefit, but must hold it for the benefit of the persons entitled under the settlement, and to the extent of the legal interest so acquired, he must be considered a trustee for all parties interested under the settlement. However, it is said, that this general rule ought not to apply in this case, because there was a special contract, providing for the surrender during the life of Andrew Elworthy. If there had been a special contract, from which the Court could not fail to infer, that that which was the subject of the settlement and which was wearing itself out should not be renewed, I should agree in that argument. But there is nothing in this settlement which tends to that conclusion; and I am clearly of opinion that the interest acquired by Richard Elworthy the elder must be considered as acquired by him in trust for the purposes of the settlement.

The next question raised here is, whether his power of appointing to the children has been executed by his will. He made a will dated the 17th of July 1801. At that time, it appears from the evidence now before me, that he had freehold property, that he was possessed of a life interest in the leaseholds in question under the settlement, in addition to the whole legal interest therein which he had procured to be granted to him; and he had besides an absolute interest in other leasehold property, which he held for the residue of a long term of 200 years.

Under these circumstances, he made his will, and gave £1000 in trust for his daughter; he then gave his freehold and leasehold estates for the benefit of his [492] son Richard, and in the commencement of his will he notices the settlement, in order to say that he confirms it. In that state of things I think it is impossible for anyone to suppose that there was an execution of the power. He might have referred to the power, or he might have been in such a situation, as not to be able to use the word "leasehold," without raising the necessary inference that he intended to execute the power; but from the mode in which he has referred to the settlement, and as he had other property upon which the will could operate, I am of opinion that this is not an execution of the power.

Then it is said there is a case of election. I am of opinion there is no case of election, nor any plausible foundation for the argument that there is.

I must make a declaration that the leaseholds are subject to the trusts of the settlement, and that the Plaintiff Mrs. Tanner and Richard Elworthy are entitled to the property in equal moieties. If the Defendant has expended money in paying fines, or heriots, no doubt one half of that expense must be paid by the Plaintiff, who has obtained half the benefit. I am of opinion that the Defendant must pay the costs of the original bill; and as to the cross-bill, which was quite unnecessary, it must be dismissed with costs.

[493] ALLEN v. BONE. Dec. 10, 11, 1841.

[See Crossley v. Crowther, 1851, 9 Hare, 384.]

A suit instituted by a solicitor without authority, dismissed on motion, with costs of the suit and of the motion, as between solicitor and client.

This was a motion, made on behalf of the Plaintiff, that the bill might be dismissed, with costs to be paid by the solicitor; on the ground that it had been instituted by him without any authority having been given for that purpose by the Plaintiff.

It was admitted that no authority in writing had been given.

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Cankrien, in support of the motion, cited Wiggins v. Peppin (2 Beav. 403), and Wright v. Castle (3 Mer. 12), and asked for the costs of suit and of the motion, as between solicitor and client.

Mr. Kindersley and Mr. Glasse, contra, argued, that if there had not been any authority, at least, that there had been an acquiescence in the proceedings, which bound the Plaintiff; and secondly, that the Plaintiff was not entitled to costs as between solicitor and client, as he repudiated that relation between him and the solicitor.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale] (without hearing a reply) said: It is the duty of a solicitor to obtain a written authority from his client before he commences a suit. If circumstances are urgent, and he is obliged to commence proceedings without such authority, he should obtain it as soon afterwards as he can. An authority [494] may however be implied, where the client acquiesces in and adopts the proceedings; but if the solicitor's authority is disputed, it is for him to prove it, and if he has no written authority, and there is nothing but assertion against assertion, the Court will treat him as unauthorised, and he must abide by the consequences of his neglect.

Here the solicitor has failed in proving his authority, and the bill must be dismissed with costs, as between solicitor and client (Wade v. Stanley, 1 Jac. & W. 675), to be paid by the solicitor. He must also pay the costs of the motion as between solicitor and client. (Reg. Lib. 1841, A. fol. 203.)

[494] BROOKS v. PURTON. Dec. 17, 1841.

A second order to amend, obtained as of course after an answer has been put in, is irregular, though the first has not been acted on.

Where an application is made at the Rolls to discharge an order of course, obtained in a Vice-Chancellor's cause, the Court can only consider the regularity of the order as an order of course, and will not enter into the merits.

The rule is general, that the Court will not, on an application to discharge an order of course, for irregularity, sustain it as an order obtained adversely on merits.

This was a motion to discharge a second order to amend the bill, obtained at the Rolls as of course.

On the 4th of August one of the Defendants put in his answer and another Defendant put in a plea; and on the same day the Plaintiff obtained at the Rolls an order of course to amend, he undertaking to amend within three weeks.

This order was not acted on, and the Plaintiff on the 24th of November obtained at the Rolls a second order [495] of course to amend his bill, without prejudice to an injunction, and undertaking as before, to amend within three weeks.

The cause was attached to the Court of the Vice-Chancellor Knight Bruce.

Mr. Chandless now moved to discharge the second order, on the ground that by the Thirteenth Amended Order of November 1831 (Ord. Can. 8), a Plaintiff after "an answer has been filed," can only obtain one order of course to amend; and that any further order to amend must be obtained upon special application, supported by the requisites stated in the Thirteenth Order. He argued also, that a Plaintiff might amend without prejudice to an injunction, but that under the second order of 9th May 1839 (Ord. Can. 135), he must undertake to amend within a week, and not within three weeks, as has been done here.

Mr. Romilly, contrâ. The first order to amend was not acted on, and till acted on was a mere nullity, and therefore the Thirteenth Order does not apply. A Plaintiff may obtain a further order to amend at any time before the Defendant has answered the amended bill; Wharton v. Swann (2 Myl. & K. 362), and the Plaintiff may obtain a second order notwithstanding his first undertaking; Nicholson v. Peile (2 Beav. 497). The order to amend without prejudice to the injunction is quite regular; Ferrand v. Hamer (4 Myl. & Cr. 143); and the second order of the 9th May 1839 gives to the Plaintiff the right to an additional order to amend.

[496] Mr. Chandless, in reply.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. In this case it appears, that after the answer had been put in, the Plaintiff obtained an order of course to amend the bill, undertaking to amend within three weeks. He afterwards, on the 24th of November, obtained a second order of course to amend his bill, undertaking as before to amend within three weeks. The Thirteenth Order seems express upon the point. The Plaintiff is at liberty, after an answer has been filed, to obtain without notice one order to amend, "but no further leave to amend shall be granted after answer, unless" in the way there pointed out, and which therefore must be obtained on a special application, and not as of course. According to the letter of this General Order, what was done was in contravention of it. It is said that the order is not to be construed literally, and that it does not mean one order to amend, but one order taken advantage of and acted on, and on which the bill has been amended. I have looked in vain for such construction of the order, and I think there is no authority for it.

It is said that the second order of 9th May 1839 gave a right to do what has been done in this case; and that the leave to amend, thereby given, was in addition or something superadded to the 13th Order. I cannot acquiesce in that argument, and I do not think that such is the proper construction, or the true intention of this order. It was intended to prevent the effect which an order to amend was supposed to have on the common injunction. The only question is, how many orders to amend may be obtained of course after answer; and plainly according to the 13th Order, there can be only one.

[497] There was another argument, that if I were to discharge this order, it would be more inconvenient to the Defendant, as the Plaintiff would afterwards obtain the same order upon a special application: but I have no discretion. This being a cause attached to another branch of the Court, I cannot go into the merits, but can only judge of whether the order was regularly obtained as of course. I must observe also, that the rule which was acted on in this Court by Lord Cottenham, to the satisfaction of everybody, was this, that where an order had been obtained as of course, and an application being made to discharge it, it appeared, on discussion, that though irregularly obtained as an ex parte order, it could be sustained on the merits, the Court, whatever might be the merits, must discharge the ex parte order, leaving the party to make an application on the merits.

This application must be granted with costs.

[497] CLARKE v. CLARKE. Dec. 21, 22, 1841.

The fifth order of 1 W. 4, c. 36, s. 15, requiring a party in custody, &c., to be brought to the Bar of the Court, is satisfied by bringing him before the Judge at his private residence.

The Defendant was arrested under a commission of rebellion on the 13th of October 1841, and on the 14th of October (it being in the Long Vacation), he was taken before the Master of the Rolls at his Lordship's private residence, and was then turned over to the Fleet.

The Defendant not having put in his answer, Mr. George Turner now moved, under the 1 W. 4, c. 36, s. 15, rule 2, to take the bill pro confesso against the Defendant.

[498] Mr. Dixon, contra. By the fifth rule, the Plaintiff ought to have brought the Defendant to the Bar of the Court within thirty days from the time of his being arrested. The thirty days expired on the 12th of November, and as the Defendant was never brought to the Bar before that time, he is now entitled to his discharge out of custody, and the bill cannot therefore be taken pro confesso against him. Taking a party to the private residence of a Judge, is not a bringing to the Bar of the Court.

Mr. G. Turner, in reply.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. The order in this case was made by me in the Long Vacation for the convenience of the prisoner and all other parties. My impression certainly is, that wherever a Judge of this Court is, there is his Court; I think that, for a century and more, it has been considered that the Court of a Judge of this Court is the place where he administers justice. If the order had been made here in my private room, could any such objection prevail?

I have no doubt on the subject; but as two other cases occurred during the Long Vacation, I will make some inquiry.

Dec. 22. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS said, he thought he had authority to make the order at his house, and therefore, that the order for taking the bill pro confesso must be made. (Affirmed, 1 Phillips, 116.)

NOTE.—The Defendant was afterwards brought before the Court of Queen's Bench by habeas corpus. The Court, on the 24th of January 1842, remanded him, deciding that he could not controvert, by affidavit, the fact stated on the warrant "that he had been brought to the Bar of the Court."

[499] COCKELL v. BRIDGEMAN. Dec. 8, 23, 1841.

Bill by indorsee against the acceptor of a bill alleged to have been mislaid, lost, accidentally destroyed, for payment or an indemnity, dismissed with costs, the loss &c., not being sufficiently proved.

Held, also, that the proof of payment by the indorsee to the holder, and the delivery up to him of the bill, coupled with the admission of the acceptor, that he had paid, and the usual affidavit of the Plaintiff upon filing his bill of the loss, was not sufficient to entitle the Plaintiff to an enquiry.

This bill was filed by the alleged holder and indorsee of a lost bill of exchange against the acceptor, for payment of the amount due upon the bill, upon giving proper indemnity to the acceptor.

It appeared that the Defendant was the acceptor of a bill of exchange for the sum of £62, 10s., drawn by and made payable to Mr. Ryan.

Mr. Ryan indorsed the bill, and before it became due, it came into the possession of the Plaintiff, who paid it over to Messrs. Hodgson & Burton. On the bill becoming due, it was presented by Messrs. Hodgson & Burton for payment, and was dishonoured. The amount was subsequently paid by the Plaintiff to Messrs. Hodgson & Burton. These facts were proved in this cause.

The Plaintiff by his bill alleged, that frequently since the bill became due, he had required payment thereof from the Defendant, but that since the 23d May 1838 (the bill having become due on the 18th), he had been unable to find the bill, although he had made diligent search for it, and that the same was now either mislaid, or lost, or had been accidentally destroyed.

The Defendant admitted that the Plaintiff had frequently required payment of the bill without producing it, and had alleged that the bill was mislaid or lost, save as aforesaid (i.e., as the Plaintiff alleged it); the Defendant did not know, and could not [500] set forth, as to his belief or otherwise, whether the Plaintiff had been unable to find the bill, or whether he had made diligent search for it, or whether the bill had been mislaid or lost, or had been accidentally destroyed. The Defendant by his answer also admitted that he had never paid it, or any part of it.

The Plaintiff's bill was accompanied by the affidavit of the loss of the bill of exchange.

In this state of the pleadings both parties went into evidence, and the Plaintiff did not produce any witness, nor offer any evidence to prove his allegation, that he had made diligent search for the bill, that he had been unable to find it, or that the bill was mislaid or lost, or accidentally destroyed.

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Elderton, who appeared for the Plaintiff, asked for an inquiry before the Master as to the loss of the bill, and contended that the affidavit of the Plaintiff, the admissions of the Defendant and the evidence in the cause furnished a sufficient foundation for the inquiry.

Mr. J. Russell, for the Defendant, contended that the bill ought to be dismissed with costs, the Plaintiff having failed to prove the most material allegation.

The authorities will be found referred to in the judgment.

Dec. 23. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. The affidavit was filed with such a bill as this, is no evidence in the cause that the instrument [501] It is required (East India Company v. Boddam, 9 Ves. 466) not as evidence of the loss, but as a security for the propriety of jurisdiction. The Defendant by his answer, admitted the loss; and the Plaintiff, being put upon proof, al-

the hearing, that no proof can be given of such a loss as he has sustained. A loss may be more or less susceptible of proof, according to circumstances. In some cases it may be clearly and distinctly proved; in other cases, it may be reasonably inferred from circumstances, and every case must, to some extent, depend upon its own circumstances. In the case of Walmsley v. Child (1 Ves. sen. 344), Lord Hardwicke said, that in this Court, "there is no other rule of evidence upon the payment of money upon a loss, than there is at law, but that in all cases at law, except in one, the party may be remedied on proof at law, just as he may here, provided reasonable evidence is given of the loss; Courts of law not requiring any more than Courts of Equity, strict and positive evidence of the loss; which, as it is generally occasioned by negligence, is seldom capable of being given; but both admit evidence arising upon circumstances, and upon that the party is entitled to recover."

In this cause there is no evidence, either direct or circumstantial, of the loss; and I am therefore of opinion, that the Plaintiff is not entitled to a decree.

In the case of Stoke v. Robson (3 Ves. & B. 51), which was a case of lost deeds, alleged to have been stolen from a mortgagee, the Defendant did not object to an inquiry at the expense of the Plaintiff, and an inquiry what had become of the deeds was directed; and the Master having reported that the deed was not to be found, the Plaintiff obtained a decree. (19 Ves. 385.) This was a bill of foreclosure, [502] the deeds having been stolen from the mortgagee, represented by the Plaintiff.

Smith v. Bicknell (3 Ves. & B. 51, note) was a case of redemption, and the deeds were alleged to have been stolen from an executor of the mortgagee, and an inquiry was directed, what deeds were delivered to the mortgagee, and what was become of the same title-deeds.

Neither of these were cases in which the jurisdiction was changed by the loss of the deed.

Here, the loss not having been proved, would have led to a non-suit at law.

The Plaintiff failing, not upon any question of law, but from the imperfection of his evidence, which may be supplied on another occasion, I think that the proper course is to dismiss the bill with costs, without prejudice to any other bill which the Plaintiff may be advised to file. (This case was affirmed on appeal by Lord Lyndhurst, C.)

[503] SMITH v. JEYES. Dec. 9, 10, 23, 1841.

To entitle one partner to an order for an injunction and receiver, against his co-partner, he must either shew a dissolution, or facts which, if proved at the hearing, would entitle him to a decree for a dissolution.

Where a partner does acts inconsistent with the duty of a partner, and of a nature to destroy the mutual confidence which ought to subsist between partners, and makes it impossible that the business can be conducted in partnership with benefit to either party, the Court will decree a dissolution before the expiration of the term for which the partnership was entered into.

The transactions of partners with each other cannot be considered merely with reference to the express contract between them. The duties and obligations arising from the relation between the parties are regulated by the express contract between them, so far as the express contract extends and continues in force; but if the express contract, or so much of it as continues in force, does not reach to all those duties and obligations, they are implied and enforced by the law; and it is often matter to be collected and inferred from the conduct and practice of the parties, whether they have held themselves, or ought or ought not to be held, bound by the particular provisions contained in their express agreement. When it is insisted that the conduct of one partner entitles the other to a dissolution, the Court must consider, not merely the specific terms of the express contract, but also the duties and obligations which are implied in every partnership contract.

This was a motion for an injunction and receiver, by one partner against his co-partner.

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. J. Parker, in support of the application.

Mr. Kindersley and Mr. Wright, contra.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS. The Plaintiff and Defendant in this cause are attorneys and solicitors. In the year 1835 they formed a partnership with each other, under the provisions of an indenture dated the 29th day of May 1835. It was stipulated that the partnership should continue for ten years, but for certain causes enumerated in the deed, either party was to be at liberty to determine the partnership, by notice, at an earlier period. The Plaintiff alleging that the Defendant by his conduct, on the 21st day of August last, given cause for dissolution of the partnership, gave a notice of dissolution on the 21st day of August last, and has filed this bill, for the [504] purpose of having it declared that the partnership was dissolved by the effect of the notice, or if need be, to have the partnership dissolved by the decree of this Court; and he now moves to have a receiver appointed to collect the partnership effects, and an injunction to restrain both parties from resigning them.

The Plaintiff is not entitled to the order for which he asks, unless he has shown that he had a right to dissolve the partnership, by notice under the deed, or has shewn facts, which, if proved at the hearing, would entitle him to a decree for dissolution.

One cause of dispute between the parties has been the amount of debts or monies which have been left outstanding. The Plaintiff complains that the Defendant did not brought in capital as he ought to have done, and has diverted some sum of money from the partnership account, or retained them for his own use; and in answer to these charges, the Defendant alleges, that if the Plaintiff had exacted himself to get in the outstanding debts, as he might and ought to have done, there would have been no occasion for additional capital; and further, that if the Defendant, has at any time retained in his hands partnership monies, and applied them to his own use, such monies have been less in amount than the sum of money to which he would have been entitled under the deed, if the outstanding debts had been collected by the Plaintiff, as they ought to have been.

Upon the affidavits given in evidence on this occasion, it does not appear that the Plaintiff has been guilty of any such neglect or supineness as the Defendant charges him with, in the collection of outstanding debts. There does not appear to me to be any-[505]-thing in the conduct of the Plaintiff, in that respect which would justify any deviation, on the part of the Defendant, from the course of duty which he ought to have pursued towards his partner.

The transactions of partners with each other cannot be considered merely in reference to the express contract between them. The duties and obligations arising from the relation between the parties are regulated by the express contract between them, so far as the express contract extends, and continues in force; but if the express contract, or so much of it as continues in force, does not reach to all those duties and obligations, they are implied and enforced by the law (Crawshaw v. Collins, 12 M. & W. 226); and it is often matter to be collected and inferred from the conduct and dealings of the parties, whether they have held themselves, or ought or ought not to be bound by the particular provisions contained in their express agreement. When I have insisted, that the conduct of one partner entitles the other to a dissolution, we must consider, not merely the specific terms of the express contract, but also the duties and obligations which are implied in every partnership contract; and upon the facts produced on the occasion of this motion, it appears to me that the conduct of the Defendant, Mr. Jeves, has been such as to make it impossible that the business can be conducted in partnership with benefit to either party. The neglect to account for the £54 received from Liverpool in August 1840; the application of the £54 received from Eliason to the payment of his private debts; the refusal to sign office checks; the refusal to sign a check for the proctor's bill, and the transmission of the proctor's letter to the creditors, however [506] few, of the creditors of the partnership, with a letter of his own, expressed as to be manifestly injurious to the partnership, and his conduct as $556 remitted to the partnership for the purpose of making a specific payment, appear to me to be all of them inconsistent with the duty of a partner, and of a nature to destroy the mutual confidence which ought to subsist between them. These acts, and others referred to in the affidavits, are not disproved or satisfactorily explained by the Defendant; and being such as, if proved at the hearing, would, in my opinion, entitle the Plaintiff to a dissolution, appear to me to be sufficient to entitle him to the order for which he now asks.

Order for injunction and receiver granted.

[506] ARTHUR v. HUGHES. Dec. 23, 1841.

A fund ascertained was remitted from abroad by an executor to a person in England, to distribute between the legatees. The Court determined the rights of the legatees, without having a legal personal representative before the Court, the assignee being a party to the suit.

The testator resident abroad, gave a legacy to A., "or in case of his decease, or at his decease, to be equally divided amongst his children." He gave other legacies in similar terms to B., C., &c., and he directed these sums to be paid to the above persons, then residing in Wales, and he appointed executors in trust to send them to the respective individuals within six months. Held, that the parents took absolute interests.

The testator who was resident in New South Wales, bequeathed as follows:—"I do hereby give and bequeath to my brother Rees Arthur, or in case of his decease, or at his decease, to be equally divided amongst his children, the sum of £1280. I do also give and bequeath to my sister [507] Mary Arthur, the sum of £1100. I do also give and bequeath to my sister Jane Arthur, the sum of £1100. I do also give and bequeath to my sister Ann Arthur, the sum of £1100; in case or at the death of any of my said sisters their respective sums to be equally divided amongst their children. These legacies all to be paid in good and lawful money of Great Britain, out of my goods and chattels to the above-named persons now residing in Wales in Great Britain, and born in the parish of Sanderson, county of Carmarthen; and lastly, as to all the rest, residue, and remainder of my goods and chattels of what kind or nature whatever, I give and bequeath to the Rev. Thomas Hassell and Stephen Williams, whom I do hereby appoint my sole executors, in trust to send the above-named sums out of the colony to the respective individuals within six months after my death, of this my last will and testament."

Thomas Hassell alone proved the will in the Supreme Court of New South Wales, and he set apart the sum of £4500, being the total amount of the four legacies, and he paid it to the Defendant Thomas Hughes, with directions to apply it to or for the benefit of the parties entitled to the said legacies under the said will.

The four legatees survived the testator, and the question was, whether they took the legacies with remainder to their children, or absolutely.

The stock had been transferred into Court.

The bill was filed by Rees Arthur and Mary Arthur and her husband against Thomas Hughes and the other parties interested; but no personal representative of the testator was made a party to the suit.

[508] Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Rolt, for the Plaintiffs, and Mr. Sidebottom in the interest, contended that the parents took an absolute interest. The legacies were to be paid "to the above-named persons then residing in Wales," and the above sums were to be sent "to the respective individuals within six months after my death," and therefore the testator intended payment to be forthwith made to the legatees. They submitted that it was not necessary to have the legal personal representative of the testator before the Court, as the fund was ascertained and paid.

Mr. Faber having appeared for the consignee of the money in Court, THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS said he thought that sufficient.

Mr. Kindersley and Mr. Heathfield, contra, then contended that the parents took for life only, with remainder to their children, the words "or at his decease," &c., ought not to be rejected.

Mr. Pemberton, in reply.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. The case is far from clear from doubt, but on the whole I think the parents take an absolute interest.

[509] In re LAW. Jan. 11, 12, 13, 1842.

A petition under the 1 W. 4, c. 60, to obtain a transfer of trust stock from the names of the surviving trustees into the joint names of such trustees and of a new trustee duly appointed, is properly presented by such new trustee.

Mode in which a petition presented under an Act of Parliament, by which the Court derives its jurisdiction, ought to be intituled.

This was a petition under the 1 W. 4, c. 60. It appeared, that in the year 1839, certain sums were standing in the names of Joseph and Thomas Price, and a Mr. Bowman, as trustees of a settlement; and that the only person beneficially interested therein was an infant, whose father Francis Law had, under the terms of the settlement, a power of appointing new trustees.

In 1839 Mr. Bowman, the active trustee, having died, Francis Law duly appointed George Law a new trustee in his stead. George Law, having been appointed trustee, applied to Joseph Price and Thomas T. Price to concur in the transfer of the stock in his name. A great deal of discussion took place upon this, and ultimately Joseph Price and Thomas Price refused to make the transfer without an order of the Court.

In consequence of the refusal, this petition was presented by Mr. George Law under the authority of the above Act, after the expiration of the thirty-one days mentioned in the sixteenth section, and prayed that a person might be appointed to transfer the stock into the joint names of the surviving trustees and Mr. George Law.

The petition was intituled simply "In the matter of Law."

Mr. Tinney and Mr. G. S. Law, in support of the petition.

[510] Mr. Pemberton, contra, contended, first, that the petition ought to have been intituled "In the matter of the 1 W. 4, c. 60, and in the matter of the particular trust," and not "in the matter of Law."

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS said, the petition had better stand over to inquire as to the practice.

Jan. 13. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. I thought that it was quite the usual practice, in cases of this description, to insert the title of the Act of Parliament. (NOTE.—This was always required by Sir John Leach when M. R.) I am told that there have been instances in which it has not been done, and the question having been brought forward before the Vice-Chancellor of England, he has overruled the objection. However, I believe that in almost all cases it is done. That seems to be considerable reason for doing it, but having been told that the Vice-Chancellor of England has overruled the objection when taken, I must hear the petition, reserving the consideration of that question.

The petition then proceeded.

Mr. Pemberton then objected, secondly, that the request ought to have been made, and the petition presented, by the person beneficially entitled to the stock, and not by a new trustee.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS. Several objections have been unfortunately raised to this petition. The title of the petition is merely "In the matter of Law," not noticing in any way the statute which gives the Court the jurisdiction, and not noticing [511] in any way the sort of business or matter in which the Petitioner Mr. Law is at all concerned. I have looked at the Act of Parliament, and I cannot say that the Court has not jurisdiction because the petition is thus headed, though it is manifestly quite contrary to what is the usual course of proceeding, and it is beside very inconvenient. The convenience of stating upon the title of the petition the matter to which the petition relates, and the foundation of the jurisdiction which the Court is to exercise in such cases, is very manifest. There is no suit or other matter pending in which the Court has obtained jurisdiction: and it would, therefore, be very convenient to state it, though, as I said before, I do not think the Court has not jurisdiction because of the omission in the title.

Mr. Tinney. It is a mere slip.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS. I take it to be so, but I think it is a slip which ought to be corrected; and that it would be convenient to state it as being both in the matter of the settlement, and in the matter of the Act of Parliament.

The next objection which is taken to this petition is this, that there is no jurisdiction to make a transfer, except at the instance of a person beneficially interested. I think that there has been a sufficient refusal here, and that a refusal to the application of a newly appointed trustee does bring the case within the Act of Parliament.

The next objection made is, that the refusal was a reasonable refusal, and such a refusal as the Court would sanction. [His Lordship then referred to the circumstances of the case, and said], I cannot say there is reasonable cause for refusal in this case.

[512] On the whole, I think I must make the order which is here required. Though I think that the Petitioner is entitled to the order without amending the title of the petition, yet it is necessary to keep up a regular and distinct mode of stating these matters; and the title of the petition ought therefore to be amended, and when amended, let the order be made for the officer of the Bank of England to make the transfer.

[512] WRIGHT v. MAUNDER. Jan. 19, 1842.

The forty-seventh section of the Insolvent Debtors Act (1 & 2 Vict. c. 110) is directory only. So that although the assignee does not strictly comply with the manner, &c., of selling real estate, as directed by the creditors, the contract is not void.

This suit was instituted by the assignees of an insolvent debtor, against the purchaser of a portion of the insolvent's real estate, for the specific performance of his contract.

By the forty-seventh section of the above-mentioned Act it is enacted, "that the assignee or assignees of the estate and effects of any such prisoner, shall, with all convenient speed after his or their appointment, use his or their best endeavours to receive and get in the estate and effects of such prisoner, and shall, with all convenient speed, make sale of all such estate and effects; and if such prisoner shall be interested in or entitled to any real estate, either in possession, reversion, or expectancy, such real estate, within the space of six months after the appointment of such assignee or assignees, or within such other time as the said Court shall direct, shall be sold by public auction, in such manner and at such place or places, as shall, thirty days before any such sale, be approved, in writing under their hands, by the major part in value of the [513] creditors of such prisoner entitled to the benefit thereof, who shall meet together, on notice of such meeting published fourteen days previous thereto in the London Gazette," &c.

It appeared, that at a meeting of the creditors held in September 1839, in pursuance of the requisition of the above clause, it was resolved, that his real estate should be sold by auction in two lots, by the person and at the time and place therein mentioned; and it was further resolved, that there should be one reserved bidding for each of the said lots, and that the sum of £325 should be the sum fixed at the said reserved bidding for the first of the said two lots.

The assignees accordingly caused the insolvent's real estate to be put up to sale, and without such reserved bidding; and the Defendant became the purchaser of the first lot for the sum of £310, being £15 less than the amount of the reserved bidding agreed upon by the creditors. The purchaser, having subsequently discovered the resolution of the creditors as to the reserved bidding, refused to complete his purchase, unless the creditors sanctioned the sale, at a meeting to be called for that purpose. In consequence of his refusal this bill was filed by the assignees for a specific performance.

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Shebbeare, for the Plaintiffs. The assignee is the full legal owner of the insolvent's estate; it is absolutely vested in him by the Act, and he is directed to receive and get it in with all convenient speed, and sell it; the remaining part of the forty-seventh section of the Act is merely directory and applies only as between the assignee and creditors, in the same way as [514] in Piercy v. Baker (1 M. & K. 4), where it was held, that in a suit by the assignees of the estate of a bankrupt or insolvent, it is not competent to the Defendant to object that the suit has been instituted without the consent of the major part of the creditors as required by the Bankrupt and Insolvent Acts.

The sale is not invalidated, though the assignees, if they have acted improperly, will be responsible to the creditors; the fact, however, is, that the creditors do not object to the conduct of the assignees.

Mr. Kindersley and Mr. Parry, for the Defendant. The Defendant is a willing purchaser, and will complete his purchase, if another meeting of the creditors be called to confirm the sale; he has been advised that without such confirmation he will not obtain a good title. An assignee is simply a trustee; and so he is considered in the forty-fifth section, which vests the property of the insolvent in his assignees or assignees in trust for the benefit of his creditors. If a debtor vested property in a trustee upon trust to sell as he should direct, the sale would be void, unless the trustee strictly followed the directions given. The assignee cannot sell without a previous meeting of the creditors to approve of the manner and place of sale. It is true, that in a suit instituted by the assignees, a Defendant cannot object that it is brought without direction of the creditors; but here a meeting of the creditors has actually been called, and the assignees have acted in direct contravention of the directions given: the case is quite different.

The object of the forty-seventh section of the Act is to give the creditors a controul over the sale; and the [515] words "in such manner" include the price at which the estate is to be sold: the mode of sale, viz., by auction, is expressly provided for.

If the construction contended for by the Plaintiffs be correct, the assignees might take on themselves to sell an estate worth £1000 for £500, and the creditors would lose the security of the land, and retain merely the personal security of the assignee for the deficiency.

Mr. Pemberton, in reply. The words of the Act are merely directory. The creditors are to fix the manner and place of sale; suppose they directed that the sale shall be by A. B., at a particular place at one o'clock on a given day, could it be contended that if A. B. died in the interim, or sent his clerk, or if the sale were postponed till two o'clock, or took place in a neighbouring room, that the sale would therefore be void, and that no subsequent confirmation could make it valid? There is a great difference between the case of an insolvent's assignee and a trustee for sale. The price is not included in the "manner" of the sale. If the words were negative it might be difficult to hold that they were only directory; yet where the question was as to the authority of the assignees to bring a suit without consent similar words have been held so.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. It is not alleged that the assignee has in any way deviated from the resolutions of the creditors, except in one respect which was this; the creditors directed that there should be a reserved bidding of £325, but the assignee sold the property to the Defendant for £310. In this state of circumstances, it is alleged by the Plaintiffs, that the sale was valid, and that the contract which was then entered [516] into was a good contract, and ought to be performed; on the other hand, it is alleged by the Defendant, that the deviation from the directions of the creditors is fatal to the contract; and that the contract was invalid, in consequence of there being a deviation from the directions contained in the creditors' resolution, the assignee having sold for £310, when the resolution had directed a reserved bidding at £325; this is the only question in dispute between the parties in this cause. The question undoubtedly depends on the nature and effect of the enactments contained in the Act of Parliament. Is the effect of the such, that any deviation whatever from the resolutions of the creditors, directing the manner and the place or places of sale, is to invalidate the contract, or is the effect merely this, that the assignee is to be responsible to the creditors for such deviation, and that the creditors are to have relief against the assignee, personally, in case the deviation has been productive of any injurious consequences to the estate? Now considering what has been decided upon the other question in the case which has been cited, and the form and nature of the enactments which have been referred to in this case, it does appear to me, that the section in question of the Act is merely directory, and if the words had been much stronger than they are, I do not know whether they would have enabled the purchaser to avoid the contract which he has entered into; but taking them as they are, merely a direction that the assignees (whose principal duty is to realize the property) should sell in the manner and at the time directed by the creditors, I cannot think that the proper construction of these words is this: that if they deviate in any way, even in the slightest particular, such deviation is to invalidate any contract they may enter into. That the deviation here complained of should invalidate the contract, one can hardly conceive; if it were to do so, the purchaser would, on every occasion, be entitled to call upon the assignees to shew that they had strictly complied with the minutest particulars. It does not appear to me to be the intention of the Act of Parliament, or the meaning of the words in which the Act is expressed.

No doubt there may be cases in which a deviation may be attended with such circumstances, as would induce a Court to say, that a purchaser shall not avail himself of his contract; because there may be circumstances from which you must necessarily infer collusion between the assignee and the purchaser; but in a case like the present, where nothing of the sort is imputed, or even suspected, and where the deviation is such as here took place, I think there is nothing from which I can infer that the contract is invalid. If the assignee has misconducted himself, or has not exercised a due discretion, he remains answerable. I may observe, that I am inclined to think that the reserved bidding must come within the expression, the "manner" of selling, and that therefore there has been a deviation from the manner directed; but still the deviation is of such a sort and nature, that I cannot come to the conclusion that it invalidates the contract. The contract, therefore, must be decreed; and there being no other objection to the title, declare that the contract is to be performed, and refer it to the Master to approve of a conveyance if the parties differ.

I do not think I ought to charge the Defendant with the costs of the suit. This is to me to have been a new question; and as there was really a deviation, I ought to make the decree without costs.

[518] SALMON v. TURNER. Jan. 22, 1842.

case, where a subpoena is served on a Defendant before the bill is filed (the cause being an injunction cause).

In this cause the subpoena was served on the 11th, and the bill was not filed till 17th afterwards, viz., on the 13th. The cause was not an injunction cause.

Kindersley and Mr. Hallett moved to discharge the subpoena for irregularity, on the ground that the subpoena ought not to have issued, until the bill was filed; for by the 4 Ann. c. 16 it is enacted, that no subpoena on the process of a Court of Chancery shall issue till after the bill is filed with the proper officer, and a certificate thereof brought to the subpoena office, except in cases of bills for injunctions, waste, or stay suits at law commenced.

Pemberton, contra.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS. Where a party is served with a subpoena before the bill is filed, I thought the practice was, that he goes to the Six Clerks' Office, and finding no bill on the file, he is entitled as of course to a subpoena for the costs. (Hinde, 77.) I never knew of such an application as the present.

The case stood over until the next seal; and the Plaintiff (as I have been informed) conceiving his proceeding to be irregular, abandoned the motion.

[519] SHEFFIELD v. SHEFFIELD. Jan. 28, 1842.

In an Exchequer suit, the Plaintiff after an order nisi to dismiss, filed his replication and took no further steps. Held, that it was reasonable that the Exchequer practice should now be applied to this case, in regard to dismissing the bill for want of prosecution.

This bill was filed in the Exchequer, and the Defendant having answered obtained an order nisi to dismiss the bill for want of prosecution, whereupon the Plaintiff, on the 17th of April 1841, filed a replication, since which, no proceeding had been taken on the part of the Plaintiff.

By the 5 Vict. c. 5, s. 2, the suits in the Exchequer were transferred to the Court of Chancery, there to be carried on and prosecuted, and dealt with, and decided, according to the practice of that Court, in the same manner in every respect as if such suits and matters had been originally commenced in the said Court of Chancery; and it was provided, that in case it should appear to the Court of Chancery to be just and expedient, that any suit or suits, matter or matters, so transferred to the said Court of Chancery, should be wholly or partially carried on, according to, or regulated by the then present practice of the Court of Exchequer, or that any question or questions arising in the same suit or suits, matter or matters, should be decided with reference to the then present practice of the said Court of Exchequer, it should be lawful for the said Court of Chancery to make such order or orders in relation thereto as to the said Court of Chancery shall seem meet.

It was now moved, on behalf of the Defendant, that the Plaintiff's bill might stand dismissed out of this Court for want of prosecution, with costs, unless the Plaintiff should appear upon such motion, and should undertake, according to the late practice of the Court [520] of Exchequer in equity, to examine his witnesses in the Vacation, and bring his cause to a hearing in next Easter term, not being hindered by the Defendant, and that publication should pass on the first day of next Easter term; and in default of the Plaintiff examining his witnesses, and bringing his cause to a hearing as aforesaid, then that the Plaintiff's bill should stand dismissed with costs without further motion. (2 Fowler, 29.)

Mr. Heathfield, for the motion, argued that this case, being after replication, did not come within the General Orders of the Court of Chancery of 1828. And that if the Chancery practice was to prevail in this case, it would be necessary for the Defendant to dismiss the bill under the old Chancery practice, whereby more than a year would elapse before the Defendant could be relieved from this suit. He urged that this was, therefore, a proper case for acting according to the Exchequer practice, as was asked by this motion.

The Plaintiff did not appear.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale] thought the application reasonable, and made the order.

[521] PARSONS v. GROOME. Jan. 29, 1842.

The assignor, though party to the cause, must, under the General Order of April 1841, be served with the petition for a stop order.

Mr. Rogers, on an application for a stop order, suggested that it was now unnecessary to serve the assignor, who was a party to the cause, as the General Order of April 1841 (Ord. Can. 161) directs, that persons applying for stop orders should not be required to serve the petition upon the parties to the cause; but,

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale] said, he considered it necessary to shew the assignment, and that the assignor had an interest; and that the assignor ought to be served with a petition presented by the assignee alone.

[521] READ v. SMITH. Feb. 1, 8, 1842.

The Forty-seventh Order of August 1841 is applicable to all cases in which the debts being under the consideration of the Master, and established before him, the costs may be added to the debts, and included in the report. It is not, however, applicable to cases, in which either the Master has reported upon the debts, or the proceedings are in such a state that he cannot open them for the purpose of adding the costs to the debt.

Where a creditor had established his debt, and the Master had issued his warrant on preparing his report previous to the orders of August 1841 coming into operation, but made his report after that period, held that the creditor was not entitled to his costs under the Forty-seventh Order.

The question was whether, under the circumstances, a creditor was entitled, under the 47th Order of August 1841 (Ord. Can. 177, n.(a)), to have the costs of establishing his debt. By that order, "A creditor who has come in and established his debt before the Master, under a decree or order in a suit, shall be entitled to the costs of establishing his debt."

[522] It appeared that the creditor had proved his debt, and that the Master had issued his shew-cause warrant, and the warrant on preparing his report, previous to the Orders of August 1841 coming into operation (26th November 1841); but the creditor made his report subsequent to that time.

Mr. Bacon contended, that the creditor was entitled to have his costs of establishing his debt added to his debt; for, by the 51st Order of August 1841, it was ordered, that the foregoing orders shall take effect as to all suits, whether now depending or after commenced on the last day of Michaelmas term 1841," so that the orders were retrospective. The 47th Order in terms applies to all cases in which a creditor comes in and established his debt.

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Little, contra. The effect of the construction contended would be, to give to all creditors, however long ago they may have proved their debts, the costs of proving, even to those who have received payment; and the Master would, in all cases, be compelled to review his report as to every debt. This cannot have been the intention of the framers of the orders. Again, it would be impossible to ascertain the amount of the costs: for, by the 67th Order of April 1828 (Ord. Can. 117), it was ordered that the Master shall not receive further evidence as to any debt depending before him, after issuing the warrant on preparing his report. It would be necessary to have further evidence to enable the Master to tax the costs, which the Master is by this General Order prevented receiving. The word "has" in the 47th Order must be read "shall," otherwise it will not apply to future cases. The cases were evidently those in-[523]-tended. They referred to a case of Spencer v. Wigram, before V.-C. Wigram, December 8th, 1841, in which His Honor held, that a creditor who had proved his debt previous to the Orders of August 1841 coming into operation, is not entitled to interest thereon under the 46th Order.

Mr. Bacon, in reply. The Master requires no further evidence, in order to tax the costs. It is unnecessary to argue whether the order is retrospective in a case where the matter has been finally settled, and when the Master must open his report; but the matter was open until the Master had made his report, which was not done until the orders had come into operation.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS said, he would make inquiry as to what had been done in the other case.

[524] 8. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. The question reserved is, whether the creditors who have established their debts in this cause, are, under the terms of the orders of August last, entitled to the costs of establishing them; and it is to be shewn that they are not, because, at the time when the orders came into operation, the state of the proceedings in the Master's office was such, that the Master was precluded from receiving any new charge or evidence. I think that the order is applicable to all cases, in which, the debts being under the consideration of the Master and established before him, the costs may be added to the debts and included in the report; and that it is not applicable to cases in which, either the Master has reported upon the debts, or the proceedings are in such a state, that he cannot open them for the purpose of adding the costs to the debt.

[524] GREEN v. MAITLAND. Jan. 22, 24, 26, Feb. 10, 1842.

A consignor who has purchased goods on account and at the risk of his correspondent and delivered them to the carrier, has no right, by reason of a variation of the accounts between him and his correspondent, or of a disagreement between them, to depart from his duty and deliver them to another person; and a party taking from the consignor with notice of the circumstances is subject to the rights of the correspondent.

Mr. Kindersley and Mr. Rolt, for the Defendants Messrs. Maitland, moved to dissolve the injunction obtained in this case; first, on the ground that the Plaintiff had suppressed material facts on obtaining it; and, secondly, on the merits.

There was a cross-motion for a receiver.

Mr. George Turner and Mr. Lewin, for Gibbes, Bright & Co.

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Prior, for the Plaintiffs.

The circumstances of the case are fully stated in the judgment of the Court.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. In this case I have read the affidavits and the answer of Robert Forsyth Maitland. There are two motions, one to dissolve an injunction which was obtained ex parte, the other is a motion, made upon notice, by the Plaintiffs, for the appointment of a receiver; and having regard to the allegations and evidence upon which the motion to dissolve the injunction, the opposition to the appointment of a receiver are founded; considering also the situation of Messrs. Gibbes, Bright & Co., and the knowledge which they appear to have possessed, at the time when they became interested in the cargo of the "Jamaica," I am of opinion, that the order to be made on this occasion depends upon the merits, as [525] they appear in the evidence now before me, between the Plaintiffs and Messrs. Maitland. I do not think that Messrs. Gibbes, Bright & Co. can be considered as purchasers for valuable consideration without notice of the transaction between the Plaintiffs and Messrs. Maitland; or that the injunction was so obtained as under the circumstances of this case to deprive the Plaintiffs of their right to maintain it, if there are sufficient merits proved.

The case is as follows:—In and before August 1841 the Plaintiffs carried on business in London, under the firm of Green, Meares, & Richards. The Defendants Robert Forsyth Maitland and Edward Maitland, carried on business as merchants in London, and at Montreal and Quebec in Canada, under the firm of R. F. Maitland & Co., the Defendant R. F. Maitland being the partner resident in London.

Various dealings had taken place between the two firms. Amongst other transactions, the Defendants the Maitlands had, on account of the Plaintiffs, purchased and paid for the cargo of a ship called the "William Salthouse," in respect of which there was some arrangement that the Plaintiffs should accept bills for the Maitlands to the amount of £2000, and the Maitlands had placed in the hands of the Plaintiffs an amounting to about £3500, which the Plaintiffs were to get discounted, on the account and for the use of the Maitlands.

In the month of September 1841 the Plaintiffs alleged that the Maitlands were greatly indebted to them; and on the 8th of September, the first letter relating to the transaction in respect of which the present dispute arose, was written by the Plaintiff to [526] Edward Maitland in Canada. The Plaintiffs were the owners of a ship called the "Cheverell," which they were about to send to Canada for a cargo of flour. The letter was expressed as follows:—"Per 'Cheverell.' The above vessel belongs to ourselves, leaves us this day for Quebec, where it has been arranged with senior, that she shall load a cargo of flour (of Canada fine flour), perfectly sweet and sound, which we request may be put on board with all possible dispatch. In giving you this order, we do not limit you at all as to the price you are to pay, but we trust that it will be purchased on the most favourable terms, ruling, at the time you receive this order." And after desiring the vessel to be loaded with timber, if flour could not be procured, the letter proceeded:—"We refer you for all other particulars relating to this transaction to your Robert Forsyth Maitland, with whom we have concluded the arrangements, and you will please advise us in due time as to insurance," &c.

The communication, made to Edward Maitland by Robert Forsyth Maitland on the subject, is dated the 18th of September, and is as follows:—"Green & Co. have ordered a full cargo of Canada fine sweet flour by the 'Cheverell,' and I hope you will be able to purchase it at credit. What Green suggests is this, that you shall value on him for the account of the cargo, per 'William Salthouse,' in drafts not less than sixty days' sight; and with the proceeds you can purchase the cargo ordered. The great difficulty, I apprehend, is your being able to negotiate the bills, unless you do so through Dunscomb or some other friend. Green and I wish particularly that you should not make any draft on Green, Meares, & Richards on account of the cargo per 'Cheverell,' we having promised Meares, to keep him in humour, that this shipment should come [527] as a remittance by Green, who will see your drafts in order for the cargo per 'William Salthouse,' &c. From this letter it is apparent that the intention of the parties to the arrangement was, that the shipment by the "Cheverell" was to come as a remittance, and that the Plaintiff, Mr. Green, in connection with the shipment, agreed, that he would see the drafts in order for the cargo by the "William Salthouse."

It does not appear what were the circumstances which gave rise to this particular arrangement; what were the difficulties which had arisen respecting the drafts for the cargo by the "William Salthouse," or why seeing those drafts in order, was connected with the intended shipment by the "Cheverell." But the arrangement between the Plaintiffs and Robert Forsyth Maitland seems to have been, that the shipment by the "Cheverell" should come as a remittance, and that the drafts for the cargo, per "William Salthouse," should be duly attended to.

The order appears to have been accepted upon the terms agreed upon by Edward Maitland, who, on the 28th of October 1841, wrote to the Plaintiffs as follows:—"We addressed you on the 27th of September; and by last steamer, we had the pleasure of writing a few lines to your Mr. Green, whom we requested to inform you, that we had received your much-esteemed favour of the 8th of September, advising us to be despatched to our address at Quebec your ship the "Cheverell," to load a cargo of flour for your account and risk; and we have to assure you, that it has received most particular attention." He then states his regret that the "Cheverell" had not arrived, and further, that he had made certain purchases in execution of the order, and he then proceeds:—"When we last ad-[528]-dressed you, we stated, that we did not propose drawing on you for the 'W. S.'s' cargo: we however had cause for this determination, and have now to beg your honour to following drafts at sixty days' favour. Alexander Simpson." And he then states the particulars of the cargo to the amount of £2000.

This letter shews, what is confirmed by other circumstances, that some doubt or question had been made whether Maitland should draw for the £2000 for the "William Salthouse's" cargo, and that the drafts were drawn pursuant to the arrangement between the Plaintiffs and R. F. Maitland. By a letter of the same date, Edward Maitland desired his partner in England to take care that the bills were cashed on presentation, and in a few days afterwards (2d of November), after cashing the bill, he expressed himself thus: "which you will of course see protected by presentation against cargo of 'W. S.'"

It is, I think, apparent, that the acceptance of the £2000 bills, though to be set off against the cargo of the "William Salthouse," and however arising upon former arrangements between the parties, was agreed to or understood by Mr. Green, in consideration of the intended execution of the order of the 18th of September, for the shipment of a cargo of flour by the "Cheverell."

There is some obscurity about the transaction: some reason, perhaps, to think that something which passed between Mr. Green and Mr. Robert F. Maitland was not fully communicated at the time to Mr. Meares, who, for some reason, was to be kept in humour; but upon the face of the letters themselves the agreement seems to be such as I have stated.

[529] The "Cheverell" not having arrived in Canada, Edward Maitland to some extent, executed the Plaintiffs' order for a cargo of flour, by shipping it on board the "Jamaica;" and by a letter dated the 17th day of November 1841, addressed by him to the Plaintiffs, he expressed himself thus: "After having given your vessel three days longer, ere making any decided move, we secured freight on board the 'Jamaica,' for your port, and the flour, 1265 barrels, leaves the place for Quebec to-night, and we hope she will get away from Quebec on the 22d or 23d. The cost of this flour will be about £2300 currency, on board at Quebec, or about £180 sterling: you will therefore effect such insurance on the shipment as you may think necessary for your own safety," &c. On the 23d of November Edward Maitland wrote another letter to the Plaintiffs, confirming his letter of the 17th of the same month (received the 18th December), and further stating as follows:—"Our Quebec house write us that they do not think the 'Jamaica' can get away before the 24th or 25th, so be governed accordingly; we shall inclose invoice and bill of lading our next."

At the time when these letters were written, Edward Maitland having purchased the flour, pursuant to the order and his own letter of the 28th of October, for the account and risk of the Plaintiffs, had placed it on board the "Jamaica," at the risk of the Plaintiffs; the voyage was to be performed at their risk, and they were advised to effect insurance, and informed that the invoice and bills should be enclosed in the next letter. Under these circumstances, the Plaintiffs had the strongest reason to think that the flour was shipped and delivered to the master of the "Jamaica" for their use, and that the property was theirs.

[530] In the meantime, disputes had arisen between the Plaintiffs and Robert Forsyth Maitland, respecting the account between the two firms; and the Defendant R. F. Maitland says, that the Plaintiffs had intimated an intention to refuse accept the expected drafts on them for £2000, on account of the cargo per "William Salthouse," and also threatened proceedings in bankruptcy; and to avert such proceedings, the Defendant R. F. Maitland assigned to the Plaintiffs certain property by way of security, and entered into certain covenants, and in consideration of which the Plaintiffs agreed to take up certain bills with their own money, and that receiving certain remittances, they would, when presented, accept a draft in favour of the Maitlands for the sum of £2000.

The instruments by which this arrangement was carried into effect, were dated the 11th of November; after which day the Plaintiffs accepted the bills drawn by Edward Maitland for £2000, on account of the cargo per "William Salthouse."

The Plaintiffs allege that they accepted these bills on the credit of the flour intended to be shipped by the "Cheverell," and which was in fact shipped by the "Jamaica." The Defendant R. F. Maitland says, that they were accepted on the credit of the security given by the deeds of the 11th of November. I do not present and upon the evidence now before me, see any reason to think, that the arrangement made in November was intended to supersede the order for the flour, to alter the arrangement, under which the order was given; although the Plaintiffs might, in the month of November and with reference to the state of the account, think it proper to demand and obtain some further security.

[531] Notwithstanding this arrangement made in November, the state of account between the two firms has continued to be a subject of dispute; and several complaints are made by the Defendant R. F. Maitland, as to the conduct of the Plaintiffs, in respect to the bills to the amount of £3500, which the Plaintiffs would get discounted for the Maitlands, and in respect of other matters. Mr. E. Maitland appears to have been dissatisfied with the conduct of the Plaintiffs, and to disapproved of the transaction relating to the intended shipment of flour, by the "Cheverell." He thought it necessary to use great caution, which might have been perfectly proper, if openly and fairly done.

As I have stated, he, on the 17th of November 1841, wrote to the Plaintiffs, and told them to effect such insurance as they might consider necessary for their own safety, and in a letter, dated the 23d of November, he said they should enclose invoice and bill of lading in their next; leaving, therefore, the Plaintiffs to expect, that the bill of lading would be made out and delivered to them; but on the same 17th of November, in a letter to his partner, and without giving the Plaintiffs any warning or notice, he expressed himself as follows:—"I shall, for your government, make out the bills of lading to order, and they will be sent to you to hand over: I take this precaution, in case any unpleasantness has occurred, in which you can command the destination of the parcel, and in this case, see to the insurance, as they might omit to cover it." And although, in his letter to the Plaintiffs of the 23d of November, he had given reason to expect that his next letter to them would enclose the invoice and bill of lading, yet, in fact, his next letter to the Plaintiffs was itself enclosed in a letter addressed to his partner, dated the 26th of November, in which he expresses himself as follows:—"I [532] now enclose a letter for G. M. and R., open for your perusal, enclosing invoice of the flour per 'Jamaica,' which you will seal and deliver, if all is going on comfortably with them; and if not, you can retain it as well as the bill of lading sent from Quebec by ship, and by this ship blank indorsed to you, which you can also hand over if you see proper. The amount due, in cash, here on the 22d of November, is £2298, 17s. 11d. currency, or £1889, 10s. 1d. sterling."

The bills of lading arrived in the month of December 1841. The ship "Jamaica" arrived with its cargo on the 1st of January 1842. R. F. Maitland & Co. indorsed the bill of lading to the Defendants Gibbes, Bright & Co., under circumstances, which appear to me to make it necessary to impute to them a knowledge of the transactions between the Plaintiffs and Maitland & Co. They were informed of circumstances, which, in my opinion, were sufficient to shew the interest, and the full extent of the interest, which the Plaintiffs had in the flour. The Plaintiffs filed their bill on the 5th of January, and obtained the injunction which it is now sought to dissolve.

The question is, whether, under the circumstances, it is clear that Messrs. Maitland, by sending the bill of lading to order and indorsing it to them, were enabled to give to Messrs. Gibbes, Bright & Co. a title to the cargo; and I am of opinion that I cannot come to that conclusion.

The cargo was purchased for the Plaintiffs by Maitland & Co., who accepted and executed the order, and instructed the Plaintiffs to insure for their own protection. It is admitted that no circumstances, entitling the Messrs. Maitland to stop the goods in transitu, have [533] occurred; there is no bankruptcy or insolvency of the Plaintiffs, but disputes have occurred between the firms as to the state of the accounts between them.

If the state of the accounts is material in the consideration of the question between the parties, they must be taken before the question can be determined.

No instance has been cited, in which the consignor of goods, having purchased them on account and risk of his correspondent, and having undertaken the duty of consigning them to the person on whose account and risk the purchase was made, and having given notice of their delivery to the carrier, has been held entitled, by reason only of the variations of a general account between the partners, or of circumstances unpleasant or uncomfortable taking place between them, in the absence of insolvency, to depart from the duty which he had undertaken, and deliver the goods to another person.

I apprehend that there may be circumstances, in which the purchaser may not acquire an absolute property in the goods which have been shipped on his account and risk; there may still be some condition to be performed, some act to be done, without which, according to the dealing between the parties, the purchaser may not be entitled to have the goods actually delivered to him. But, in such a case, the nature of the condition and the right to require its performance ought to be shewn by contract, or to appear from the circumstances.

As this case appears upon the evidence now before me, I do not find any sufficient reason to conclude, that the Maitlands were entitled to impose any condition on [534] the delivery of the flour to the Plaintiffs, and it appears to me that the injunction must be continued till the right can be determined.

[534] GARDNER v. M'CUTCHEON. Jan. 31, Feb. 1, 8, 16, 1842.

[See Dean v. MacDowell, 1878, 8 Ch. D. 355. Cf. Aas v. Benham [1891], 2 Ch. 244.]

The master of a ship is bound to employ his whole time and attention in the service of his employer, and semble, that a custom allowing such master to trade on his private account during the voyage, cannot be maintained.

The master and part-owner of a ship purchased goods during the voyage, which in answer stated were purchased out of private property and the profits of private trade during the voyage, but the Court considering there were strong grounds for thinking that the goods were purchased with partnership property, or with money for which the Defendant was accountable to the partnership, and that they belonged to the partnership, restrained him from receiving the goods.

Affidavits were filed in support of an application for an injunction, to restrain the master and part-owner of a ship from taking possession of goods claimed by him as his private property, and by the other partners as partnership property; and which the Defendant put in his answer, and several affidavits were subsequently filed on both sides. Held, under such circumstances, and on such an application that the answer could only be treated as an affidavit.

This case came on upon several motions, the particulars of which are fully detailed in the judgment of the Court.

Mr. Pemberton, Mr. George Turner, and Mr. J. Anderson, for the Plaintiff.

Mr. Spence and Mr. J. H. Palmer, contra.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. This case came on upon a motion to restrain the Defendant John M'Cutcheon from receiving certain wools, which were consigned by him to the Defendants Magniac, Smith & Co., and upon other motions the object of which, on the part of the Plaintiffs, is to have the wools or the proceeds thereof secured, until the question between them and M'Cutcheon, which is to be decided in this cause, can be determined, and the objects of which, on the part of M'Cut[535]-cheon, is to obtain for him the disposition of the wools, or the proceeds thereof at this time.

Mr. M'Cutcheon was part-owner and master of the ship, "Jean," with which he sailed from England in 1838, on a voyage to the Eastern seas; and after carrying on an extensive trade in several ports, and employing the ship on freights on several occasions, he sold her at Sydney, in August 1840. About or soon after the time of the sale of the ship, he made large purchases of wools, in part of which Messrs. Hunter & Co. had an interest. Those wools were sent to England; some of them were on board the "Caledonia," others on board the "Minerva," and the rest on board the "Spartan," and were consigned to the Defendants, Magniac, Smith & Co.

The Plaintiffs and the Defendant M'Cutcheon, being the co-owners of the ship "Jean," and all the owners being interested in the common adventure, the Plaintiffs insist, that the wools in question were purchased with partnership property, and on a partnership account, and they therefore claim the wool as property belonging to the partnership.

The Defendant, on the other hand, insists, that besides acting as master of the ship, and trading on the joint account, he had a right to trade, and did trade, on a separate and private account; that such private trading was profitable, and that he purchased the wool with his own effects.

The Defendant M'Cutcheon was master of the ship and partner in a trading adventure, and as a general rule, there can, I apprehend, be no doubt, that the master of a ship is bound to employ his whole time and attention in the service of his employers; and that a [536] partner in trade has no right to employ the partnership property in a private speculation for his own benefit.

The Defendant, however, alleges, that there is a custom, which makes it lawful for him to carry on such private trade, as he did in this case; and moreover, that the Plaintiffs well knew that he did carry on his private trade; and acquiesced in doing so.

Before the ship departed, the Plaintiffs, as managing owners, agreed to charter her to Thompson, Roberts & Co. of Batavia, merchants, under an agreement, which provided that the ship was to proceed, with all convenient speed, to Batavia, with leave to proceed therefrom to a port in China, and thence to Batavia; the whole earnings up to the time of her arrival there, to be for the benefit of the owners; and on her arrival there, on being reported ready, she was to be at the disposal of Thompson, Roberts & Co., for a limited time, on certain terms; and the ship was to be for the benefit of all cabin passengers, and the owners were to have no interest in her, except rice when purchased for joint account.

Mr. M'Cutcheon had authority to employ the ship, either in freighting her on charter-party, or trading on adventure; and on the 20th of April 1838 the Plaintiffs gave him the charter-party they had entered into with the agents of Thompson, Roberts & Co., and they expressed themselves as follows:—"We have to request that you give us, as often as you can, particular accounts of your receipts and payments, and all the information you can give us; and on the expiration of your charter-party, you can find that you can do better, by employing her solely on 'owners' account, give you liberty to do so, and to retain in hand sufficient funds for that [537] purpose; but we would caution you against speculations, and at all times prefer a safe charter;" and after referring to the length of the intended voyage, the letter ended: "In case a favourable opportunity should offer for disposing of the ship, we have given you a power of attorney to enable you to do so."

The Defendant says, that when the ship sailed, he took with him on the voyage descriptions of property, consisting of preserved viands, wine, beer, spirits, hams, trinkets, clothing, and divers other goods, wares, merchandizes, and articles belonging to himself, together with his own nautical instruments, amounting in value altogether to £900 or £1000. An insurance to the amount of £400 was effected on his nautical instruments and other personal effects. On the 31st of October 1838, and again in January 1840, he desired this insurance to be renewed.

It is not necessary, for the purpose of disposing of these motions, to trace minutely the progress of the ship, or to consider each separate transaction. The ship was employed by M'Cutcheon, sometimes in freighting or charter, sometimes in trading. He says, that he carried on some trade on his own private account, and that his transactions were carried on whilst the ship was chartered, with leave of the Plaintiffs; but he does not allege, that he alluded to his private trade in his correspondence with the Plaintiffs, otherwise than as I shall hereafter notice.

On the 4th of October 1838 he was at Manilla; he had some flints on board, and on the 11th of that date he says, "The flints have turned out an expensive and unsuccessful speculation; and my cheese and hams were not much better." He desires to be understood from [538] this, that his partners knew that he carried out the cheese and hams on a trading speculation, for his private benefit, and that as they had no objection they must be taken to have consented.

On the important adventure, which he says was a private dealing, of which he is desirous to take the sole benefit, took place in the winter of the years 1839-40.

On the 17th of October 1839 he was at Hong Kong, in China, and wrote to the Plaintiffs, as follows:—"Dear sirs, I had this pleasure on the 24th ult. from Mr. [539] [redacted], enclosing shipping document per 'Jean' and 'Mouritean,' wherein I declare every penny in my possession (save and except a solitary sovereign); I arrived at Macao Roads on the 13th inst.;" and after speaking of his voyage, and that he had anchored at Hong Kong the day before at noon, he says, "I lost no time in writing to our mutual friends, Messrs. M'Vicar & Co., but I am sorry to say that it can be done here peremptorily at present. The present cargo will realise a very small profit indeed, unless a certain spec. answers from this to Manilla, which I shall gladly jump at, and sell my rice there, take on board coarse sugars (ballast), about 150 tons, more or less, return here, fill up with tea, 'by hook or by crook' for Sydney, and when there, you may depend I shall turn the 'Jean,' into a money-making machine, as possibly can," &c.

The letter, written by M'Cutcheon to the Plaintiffs, can only be construed as being to an adventure to be engaged in on the joint account; it could not have been understood to mean that the speculation which he announced was to be on his private account, that he was to employ his time as master which was due to the [539] joint interest, and the ship, which was the common property of all, for his own peculiar profit.

Being in China, he wanted the means of making a profitable speculation in China by the purchase of teas to be afterwards sold at Sidney. The means by which he was to obtain or purchase the teas are but obscurely hinted at, but from the tea "hook or crook," which he uses, it may be inferred, that there was something in the intended transaction, which was not in all respects, consistent with the regular course of trade in the countries where he was trafficking. If he meant to import opium into China, contrary to the laws of that country, and by means of the opium to obtain an investment of tea, it can hardly be supposed that he at the same time meant to inform his partners, that a speculation in itself illegal and hazardous was meant for his own benefit at their risk.

Not long after the date of this letter, he took the ship to Manilla, he there purchased a quantity of opium, he took it to Tong Koo Bay, in China, there sold it, and purchased a large quantity of tea.

Whilst taking in the tea, and on the 15th January 1840, he wrote to the Plaintiffs, stating that the "Jean" was chartered by Jardine, Matheson & Co. of Hobart Town and Launceston; and, further, expressing himself as follows: "I have this day taken on board the first of our tea cargo (namely 100 chests), I insure the sugar and the entire freight here with friend Burn, and as I fully intend selling the ship, either at Hobart Town or Sidney, I leave the management of the insurance entirely to you, together with my £400 on private effects, conditional on the vessel is not sold."

[540] The Defendant left Tong Koo on the 25th February, and on the following day, he wrote from Macao Roads to his partners as follows:—"I sailed yesterday from Tong Koo, and anchored here this morning with a full ship, and upwards of 200 tons in the cabin (of the cargo). Indeed, had I not stowed the latter, the ship would not have stowed the tonnage agreed on as per charter-party, which would have been a serious loss to us, as the entire chests or boxes shut out would have been thrown on my hands. Although the 'Jean' has now in her bottom 90 tons of stone, and 100 tons sugar in bags, she is still quite crank. Inclosed you have of lading for sugars, &c., which are covered by our mutual friends, M'Vicar & Co. who will forward you the policies with copy of the 'Jean's' account, &c.; in case of accident, I have authorised them to insure on my private investment, and draw on you for the amount of premium which you will please duly honour."

The Plaintiffs have produced the bills of lading mentioned in this letter, and the policies of insurance therein referred to, and which were afterwards forwarded by M'Vicar & Co.

There is nothing in the bills of lading, or in the policies, from which it can be inferred that the Defendant had any separate property or interest in any goods. The expression, "my private investment," seems to refer to the private effects mentioned in the former letter of the 15th of January, and in the policies which he had effected and desired to be continued. And it does not appear to me, that the letter of February can be considered as conveying any information to the Plaintiffs that the Defendant was carrying on a private and separate trade for his own benefit.

[541] The letter alludes to the tonnage agreed to be taken by the charterers, leaving it to be understood that the goods mentioned in the bills of lading were stowed in places to which the charterers were not entitled. From the letter it might be collected that the charterers were entitled to the whole vessel, and that the Defendant leave to carry his own merchandize, which he stowed in the cabin, and that was at his own disposal.

This letter is erroneously set forth in the Defendant's answer, and, as stated, was furnished to the Defendant's counsel the means of supporting a very able and ingenious argument on the behalf of the Defendant; the letter itself, when properly considered, does not warrant the argument; and having now considered all the letters, it is alleged that the Defendant communicated his private dealings to the Plaintiffs, and have come to the conclusion, that upon the evidence now before me, it does not that the Plaintiffs ever were informed by the Defendant that he was carrying on a separate trade for himself.

It appears to have been with the produce of the teas purchased at Tong Koo Bay, that the wools in question were purchased at Sidney.

It has indeed been argued, that the Defendant might have had credit of his own, and might have purchased the goods with which he traded on that credit; but as there is no evidence of that, I can attach no weight to the argument, and if I ought, at this time, to consider the teas as partnership property, I think that I ought also to consider the wools to be partnership property. The Defendant's case rests entirely on his answer. He says distinctly, in substance, that he took out private [542] property for the purpose of private trade; that his doing so was known to and disavowed by the Plaintiffs: that he carried on private trade accordingly; that private dealings were profitable; and that he employed the money derived from profits, as he had a right to do, in the purchase of the wools, which are therefore his own. He has produced two witnesses, who have stated that the custom of trade justifies such dealing.

On the other hand, the nature of the case, the facts proved, the particular effects set out by the Defendant on his preparation for a long voyage, and his correspondence appear to me to tend to an opposite conclusion.

As to the alleged custom of trade, I could not, even if it were uncontradicted, but if it is not, pay much attention to it on the present occasion. The master of a ship is an agent bound to give all his time and attention to his principal; in this case the duty of the Defendant, as master, was, when the ship was employed on a trading voyage, to act for the common benefit of the owners, and when the ship was chartered, to obtain freight on the best terms he could for the owners, free from all bias of separate interest in himself, or of leave given to himself by the owners to trade for himself; and I think that it will be very difficult to support a custom, which, if legal, as alleged, would entitle him to trade for himself separately, when it was his duty to trade to the best of his ability for the joint interest of himself and the other owners, and would give him a discretionary power to place his own interests in competition with the joint interest, an option to give the advantage to himself, whenever he pleased, without the knowledge of his co-owners, and without giving them notice of his proceedings in this respect; a custom also which would make it valid for a person in the relation of co-owner or partner, having full control over the ship which was partnership property, to employ it at the risk for his private benefit. I cannot, on the present occasion, assume that there is such a custom; I can well conceive that the master of a ship, undertaking a long voyage, and necessarily taking out provisions or private effects of some value, which require change, may not be precluded from parting with those effects for others, in that respect carrying on some trade, and if this were the sort of custom alleged, it would deserve more attention on this occasion; but the Defendant claims something beyond this, and taking all the evidence into account, I cannot rely on the alleged custom: and it appears to me that there are strong grounds for thinking that the wools were purchased with partnership property, or with money for which the Defendant was accountable to the partnership, and that they belong to the partner-

The evidence in this stage of the cause, and taken in the form in which it is now before me, cannot be conclusive; but such is the impression which I have received from a consideration of the answer and of the affidavits.

I am of opinion that I must attend to the affidavits. The application is in effect to prevent the Defendant from getting possession of partnership property in order to apply it to his own use. Affidavits being filed in support of the application, the Defendant put in his answer, and several affidavits have been subsequently filed on both sides. Under such circumstances, and on such an application, I am of opinion that the answer can only be treated as an affidavit.

The Defendant complains that, in the events which have happened, money has been paid to him on account, and that he is deprived of the means of setting himself free by being prevented from taking possession of the wool. I have no means of knowing how this may be; nothing which may be done will prevent him from claiming any credit in account, to which he may be entitled, and, on the whole, I am of opinion, that the injunction against M'Cutcheon must be granted, and that the injunction against his consignees Messrs. Magniac, Smith & Co. ought not to be dissolved.

It will be well, if the parties, without any prejudice to their respective rights and claims, can agree upon a satisfactory mode of converting the property, and bringing the net proceeds into Court to await the final decision.

[545] STUBBS v. MOLINEUX. Feb. 11, 21, 1842.

A reference was made to the Master as to a partnership and several other matters, and the parties were to produce all papers, &c., relating thereto; the Defendant was called on by the Master to produce the papers relating to the partnership, having made default, the Master certified that he had been summoned to produce all the papers relating to the matters in question, and had not produced any. A certificate was ordered to be taken off the file for irregularity, and a four-day order founded thereon was discharged.

By the decree, it was referred to the Master to take an account of the personal estate of the testator, and of his debts and legacies, in the usual form, and to take account of the share of the business (known as the firm of "Stubbs & Hancock") stock-in-trade, book debts, leases, and premises thereunto belonging, bequeathed to the Defendant Edward Stubbs by the will of the said testator, bearing date the day of August 1832; and to enquire and state to the Court of what particulars the same consisted, and to what amount or value at the death of the testator, and of what particulars the same now consisted, and what was the present amount or value thereof, and to certify whether the legacies given by the testator were charged thereon. It was ordered, that the Master should enquire and state to the Court, what had been made, since the death of the said testator, by the Defendants; and parties were to produce before the Master upon oath, all deeds, books, papers, writings in their custody or power, relating thereto.

On the 27th of November 1841 a warrant was taken out for the Defendants to produce and deposit in the Master's office, all books, papers, writings, and documents belonging to, or connected with the co-partnership of Stubbs & Hancock.

This was attended before the Master on the 30th of November, when the Defendant alleged that the decree had been improperly drawn up in his absence, and the Master extended the time for depositing the books, [546] papers, writings, and documents in his office until the 3d day of December 1841.

The Defendant did not however produce them within that time, and the Master on the 9th of December certified, that the Defendants Richard Molineux and Edward Stubbs had been duly summoned to bring into his office all deeds, books, papers, writings in their custody or power relating to the matters in question in this suit, that they had not, nor had either of them brought into his office any of such books, papers, and writings, although duly summoned for that purpose. On the 9th day (the 9th of December), and upon this certificate, the Court ordered, that the Defendant Edward Stubbs should, within four days after personal notice, produce upon oath, all books, &c., "relating to the matters in question in this suit," or in default thereof, the serjeant-at-arms should apprehend him for contempt.

It was now moved, that the order of 9th of December 1841 should be discharged, and that the Master's certificate, on which the order was grounded, might be taken off the file.

Mr. Craig, in support of the motion.

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Rolt, contra.

Kemp v. Wade (2 Keen, 686), was cited.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale] said, that the certificate was taken off the file, and the four-day order discharged. The Master had certified

De-[547]fendant had been summoned to produce all the documents relating to the matters in question, and had not produced any. This was not the case, as he was only called on to produce those relating to the partnership, his disobedience therefore related to those alone.

party obtained an order on motion, the other side not appearing, but the service of the notice of motion, though regular, was supported by an imperfect affidavit. Held, that he could not subsequently verify the service, and that a new notice of motion must be given.

On a former seal day a motion had been made for opening biddings, and the order had been made upon an affidavit of service of the notice of motion.

The order could not however be drawn up, in consequence of the affidavit of the service of notice of motion not being regular in form; it shewed that the notice of motion had been served on the parties, and not on the clerk in Court. (NOTE.—This affidavit has since been altered; see Ord. Can. 214, 215.)

Mr. Bolt now produced a second affidavit made since the last seal, shewing that the notice of motion had really been properly served on the clerk in Court, and he asked that the order might now be drawn up, but

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale] refused the application, saying that the order having been irregularly obtained on a former day, on an informal affidavit, it could not now be set right in the absence of the other parties, and that a new notice of motion must therefore be given.

[548] INMAN v. WHITLEY. Feb. 21, 1842.

Defendant by his answer admitted that he had in his possession "divers books of account." Held, that the particulars were not sufficiently specified to enable the Court to make an order for their production.

It was a motion for the production of documents stated in the Defendant's answer. It is not necessary to state the object of the suit.

The Defendant by his answer admitted that he had in his possession "divers books of account, containing sundry private accounts of the said John Inman, respecting his monies and his receipts and expenditure in respect thereof," and after stating circumstances relating to their materiality, he stated, that they did not relate to any of the matters in question in this suit: that they were wholly immaterial to the subject of this suit, and he submitted he was not bound to set forth the titles of such books, or any description thereof further than as aforesaid, or to make the same.

B. Chapman now moved for the production of these books amongst other documents.

Freeing, contra.

No objections were raised to the production; first, that the books in question were sufficiently specified; and secondly, that they did not relate to the matters in question.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. I do not think that I can order the production of these books, for the terms in which they are specified in the answer, are too uncertain to found an order for [549] their production, describing them in a manner as to enable the Court to enforce its order.

It is not necessary to decide another point argued, whether the Plaintiff has a right to have the books more accurately described, it must be brought before the Court in another shape, viz., by exceptions for insufficiency.

and Christian v. Taylor, 11 Simons, 401. In Phelps v. Olive, 25th of March 1835, Sir C. C. Pepys refused to order the production of documents described as "a bundle of papers marked G."

[549] MICHELL v. MICHELL. Feb. 26, 1842.

Portions for children, held raisable during the life of a tenant for life, out of reversionary term.

The costs of raising portions is payable out of the estate, and not out of the portion. A life-estate in realty was created by a deed in 1787. The estate was sold and invested in 1821 in consols. The tenant for life died on the 9th of December 1841. Held, that her executors were not entitled to an apportionment of the dividends under the 4 & 5 W. 4, c. 22.

By the settlement made on the marriage of Mr. and Mrs. Michell in 1787, estates were conveyed to the use of Mr. Michell during the joint lives of himself and his wife, with remainder to Mrs. Michell for life; but in case Mr. Michell should survive his wife, then to him during the joint lives of himself and the children of the marriage, and from and after the decease of the survivor of Mr. and Mrs. Michell, to trustees for 1000 years, to be computed from the death of the survivor of them, upon the trusts declared; and after the expiration or sooner determination of that term, and until thereafter and the trusts thereof, to the use of the first and other sons of the marriage in tail, &c., &c.

The trusts of the term were declared to be, that in case there should be no more child, other than [550] an eldest, the trustees should, "at any time or after the decease of the said Charles Michell, by mortgage, sale," &c., of the hereditaments comprised in the term, or with and out of the rents, issues, and profits thereof, raise for the portions of the younger children, the sums aftermentioned; that is to say, if there should be one, the sum of £10,000, to be paid at such age and time as Mr. Michell by deed or will should appoint, and in default of appointment, to the younger son at twenty-one, and to a daughter at twenty-one or marriage, "if it should first happen after the decease of the said Charles Michell." If there should be two, three, or more children respectively, £12,000, £15,000, or £20,000 were to be respectively raised, to be paid at such ages and times as Mr. Michell should appoint, and in default of appointment, to be paid to, and be considered vested in, the younger sons at twenty-one, and daughters at twenty-one or marriage.

The settlement contained a proviso for accruer, and a power for maintenance after the decease of Mr. Michell, "out of the rents, issues, and profits" of the hereditaments "not exceeding the yearly interest of the portion of such children, at the rate of 3 per cent., "in the meantime and until his portion should be payable." The trustees were to permit the person or persons entitled, except upon the determination of the term, to receive the residue of the rents.

There was also a power for the trustees "after the decease of Charles Michell, to advance any part of the portion to any such son as aforesaid, not exceeding one-fifth of the portion.

The settlement contained a power for the trustees to sell the estates, and to invest the produce in other [551] estates, to be settled to the same uses; and, in the meantime, to invest the produce in Government or real securities.

Pursuant to that power, the estates had been sold for £23,080, and the proceeds were subsequently, in 1821, invested in £29,400 consols.

There was issue of the marriage several children, all of whom attained the age of twenty-one years in the lifetime of their parents.

Mr. Michell died, Margaret, his widow, survived him, and died on the 9th of December 1841 having received the dividends down to July 1841.

One of the younger children who was of age now presented a petition in the Court for having £20,000 raised for the portions, with interest from the father's death.

The questions were, first, whether the portions were raisable from the death of the father, or from the commencement of the term of 1000 years, which commenced upon the death of the survivor of the husband and wife. In the former case, interest would be payable from the death of the father.

Secondly, whether the executors of the widow were entitled to have an apportioned share of the dividends on the consols; and thirdly, whether the fund was to bear the costs of raising the portions.

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Hull, for one of the younger children, and Mr. Tinney, Mr. Willcock, Mr. Turner, and Mr. Faber, for parties in the same interest, contended, that though the term was reversionary, yet the trust [552] was distinct, that the portions were to be raised on the death of the father alone; Smyth v. Foley (3 Y. & C. 142), Codrington v. Lord Foley (6 Ves. 364).

That the settlement having been made prior to the Act of 4 & 5 W. 4, c. 22, there could be no claim, by the widow's representatives, for an apportioned share of dividends. That the fund must bear the costs, otherwise less than £20,000 would be raised for portions.

Mr. Shapter, for the executors of the widow. It is said that there can be no apportionment, because the 2d section of the statute 4 & 5 W. 4, c. 22, applies only where the payment becomes due "under any instrument that shall be executed after the passing of the Act," but in Re Markby (4 Myl. & Cr. 484), the Lord Chancellor seems to have considered "the instrument executed after the passing of the Act," to refer, not to the instrument settling the estate, but to the lease or other instrument, creating or evidencing the rent or other yearly payment. He even entertained the question of right to apportioned rents claimed by the executors of a tenant in fee against the heir at law; and disallowed the claim, not because there was no settlement made after the passing of the Act, but because the letting of the estate was not by instrument executed after the passing of the Act.

Mr. Kindersley and Mr. Pirie, for the heir, said they could not maintain the third point.

[THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS. I think that very clearly against you.]

[553] A discretion is given to the trustees to raise the portions "at any time or times after the decease of the father," which they did not exercise in the widow's lifetime.

The term does not take effect until the death of the surviving parent, and the Court leans against raising portions on a reversionary term, for if the particular tenant were to live long, the estate might be swallowed up to answer the portions and years of interest. Clinton v. Seymour (4 Ves. 440), Stevens v. Dethick (3 Atk. 39).

The words of the Act, "instrument that shall be executed after the passing of the Act," must clearly apply to the instrument of settlement. In Re Markby there was only a letting from year to year.

[THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS. Yes, it was quite sufficient in that case to say that there was no lease in writing.]

Mr. Kimpton, for trustees.

Mr. Pemberton, in reply.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. There is certainly some obscurity in the settlement. The portions are to be paid to sons at twenty-one, and to daughters at twenty-one or marriage, whichever event should first happen after the death of the father; but the term out of which they were to be raised was to commence only upon the death of the surviving parent. [554] The only possible way of answering the clear intention would be by raising the portions out of the reversionary term. The Court is always reluctant to raise portions in that way: but when it is necessary, in order to satisfy the intention of the settlement, it must be done. The portion must be raised with interest from the father's death. There can be no apportionment in favour of the widow.

[554] KIRKMAN v. ANDREWS. Feb. 10, 23, 1842.

Plea on information and belief of Plaintiff's bankruptcy. Held regular.

This was a plea for want of parties, on the ground that the Plaintiff, having become a second time bankrupt without having obtained his certificate, or paid a dividend of 15s. in the pound, was not, for that reason, entitled to sue without making his assignee a party to the suit.

The plea stated that the Defendant "was informed and believed" that the Plaintiff had become bankrupt in 1821 (stating in succession the facts upon which the bankruptcy rested), and that he had obtained his certificate; and that he had again become bankrupt in 1827 (stating the facts as before). That the second commission had not been superseded, and that the Plaintiff had not obtained his certificate thereunder, and that no dividend, or a dividend or dividends less than 15s. in the pound had been paid; and the Defendant submitted that the assignee under the second bankruptcy was a necessary party to the suit.

[555] Mr. G. Turner and Mr. W. J. Taylor, in support of the plea, cited Fenke v. Pratt (1 P. Wms. 592), Govel v. Armitage (2 Anstr. 412), Ex parte Lees (16 Ves. 474), Meux v. Smith (11 Simons, 410), and before the Lord Chancellor on appeal in March 1841.

Mr. Chandless, contrà. The plea is informal; it ought to state the bankruptcy positively; being stated on information and belief only, the fact of information and belief, and not of the bankruptcy, is in issue; secondly, the bankruptcy is not well pleaded, the facts to support its validity not being distinctly stated in succession; thirdly, the plea is double, it raises the issue of no certificate, and no dividend, or a dividend of less than 15s. in the pound. He referred to Redesdale, 236, Drew v. Drew (2 Ves. & B. 160), Small v. Atwood (Younge, 449), Tarleton v. Hornby (1 Y. & Col. 172, 333).

Mr. Turner, in reply. An allegation on information and belief is sufficient in an answer, and consequently in a plea, to put the fact stated in issue, and that is all that is required. When a fact is not necessarily within the personal knowledge of a party a statement on his information and belief is sufficient.

[THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS. Would it not have been more correct pleading for the Defendant to say he had been informed and believed, and averred the fact to be]

The fact being put in issue, the present allegation amounts to the same thing. The plea is not double; all the facts lead but to one point, viz., that the assignee is a necessary party.

[556] THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS said he would reserve the consideration of the objection of the plea being on information and belief, but he was of opinion that the averments as to the bankruptcy were sufficient, and that the plea was not open to the objection for duplicity, as the facts stated led to the single point, viz., the necessity of the assignee being present. This was important, because the account asked by the bill ought to be rendered in the presence of all persons interested.

Feb. 23. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. Several objections were taken to the form of the plea; they were all disposed of except one, by which the Plaintiff insisted that the plea was bad, because the Defendant, instead of alleging the facts directly and positively, only stated his information and belief that the facts were as alleged.

It was argued that the Defendant, by his plea so framed, did not put in issue a fact, but only his information and belief that such facts were as he alleged; and, in support of the argument, the case of Small v. Atwood in the Exchequer (1 Younge & Col. 39) was cited; and the intimation of Lord Redesdale's opinion in his book of Pleading, and the case of Drew v. Drew (2 Ves. & B. 162), were referred to.

As the facts stated in an answer upon the information and belief of the Defendant are held to be sufficiently put in issue, and as the allegations in a plea, however positively stated in the plea itself, are, if the statements relate to the acts of others sworn to only upon the belief of the Defendant; and as the facts alleged in this [556] plea are the acts of others, and do not appear to be facts necessarily or probably within the knowledge of the Defendant, I wished to enquire, whether any distinct authority upon the subject, in this Court, could be found, but I have not succeeded in finding any.

Lord Redesdale, stating that the averments in a plea ought in general to be positive (Pleading, 297), refers to a case in 3 Atk. 590, in which the question whether an averment upon belief would be good did not arise; and he observes, that the averments of facts not within the immediate knowledge of the Defendant, it might man improper to require a positive assertion. He adds, "unless however the averment is positive, the matter in issue appears to be not the fact itself, but the Defendant's belief of it;" and he then says, that the Defendant's conscience is saved by the nature of the oath administered. In Drew v. Drew (2 V. & B. 162), which was a case of negative plea, Sir Thomas Plumer says, "Where a person is speaking upon oath to acts not his own, but done by others, it is sufficient if he states them upon belief."

These being all the authorities cited, and I am unable to add any others, it can freely be said, that the rules of the Court of Chancery require a Defendant to plead affirmatively facts which are not within his knowledge; and it is difficult to comprehend, why a statement of fact upon belief in an answer should put the fact itself in issue in answer, and not in a plea.

The fact itself must undoubtedly be clearly and distinctly stated; there must be something distinctly averred, by which the Defendant may be bound, and [558] upon which the Plaintiff may join issue; and in order that the plea may be good, the facts must be clearly and distinctly stated, to which the Defendant binds himself and upon which the Plaintiff may join issue, must be such, that if they are true, there will be a defence to the bill, or constitute a reason why the Plaintiff should not be permitted to proceed with the suit, in the Court or in the manner and form in which it is commenced; I apprehend, that in all cases where affirmative facts are pleaded, the burthen of proving the facts is upon the Defendant who alleges them in his defence, or for his defence. A Defendant who swears that he believes a fact which he knows to be true, may be indicted for perjury; and I think that a Defendant, who, by answer swears that he believes a fact proper for his defence to be true, sufficiently puts that fact in issue, and takes upon himself the burthen of proving it. And on the whole I think the plea must be allowed.

See Pool v. Pool, Younge, 331, and 2 Van Heythuysen, 96, where the plea of perjury is on information and belief.

[558] BAMPTON v. BIRCHALL. March 10, 14, 1842.

For subsequent proceedings, see 5 Beav. 67, 330; 1 Ph. 568; 41 E. R. 749.]

It was given to file a double plea to an ejectment bill, viz., not heir; and, secondly, by the Statute of Limitations.

The Plaintiff in this cause was the assignee under the insolvency of Thomas Standish, or Stanley, deceased, who took the benefit of the Insolvent Debtors Act in 1792, and was alleged to have been the heir at law of Sir Frank Standish, who died in 1712. The Plaintiff, claiming in right of the heir, by his bill, prayed [559] a decree that he was entitled to the estates of which Sir Frank Standish died seised, and for such relief, discovery, and accounts, as he might be entitled to in right of the heir, and by virtue of the title which he claimed in that character.

The Defendants alleged, first, that Thomas Standish, or Stanley, was not the heir of Sir Frank Standish; and, secondly, that even if he were such heir, the Plaintiff's claim for relief was barred by the Statute of Limitations.

A motion was now made, that the Defendants might be at liberty to plead those matters as several pleas to the bill.

G. Turner and Mr. Elmsley, in support of the motion.

Pemberton and Mr. Johnson, contra, for the Plaintiff.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS said, that permitting such a plea would certainly be to the defence; but the difficulty was, that the defences seemed inconsistent: first, that the Plaintiff was not heir; and, secondly, that he was heir, but was barred by the Statute of Limitations. His Lordship added, that he would give the matter further consideration.

On the 14. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. If the Defendants can plead singly, that Thomas Standish, or Stanley, was not heir of Sir Frank Standish, and the Plaintiff should take issue on the plea, and succeed, the Defendants would be precluded from pleading [560] the Statute of Limitations; and the Plaintiff having, in the case supposed, established his claim in right of the heir, would succeed in the suit, notwithstanding a good defence to which the Defendants might be legally entitled.

And although I apprehend that the Defendants might plead the Statute of Limitations singly, and fail in maintaining it, without precluding themselves from the defence of "no heir;" yet, in the case thus supposed, it would be necessary for them, either to apply to the Court for leave to plead "no heir" after failure of the first plea, or to make the defence by answer, at the risk of being obliged to give the discovery, and set out the accounts to which the Plaintiff has no claim, otherwise than in right of the heir, which is in question.

I think that the question, whether the Defendants should be allowed to plead double pleas, depends upon the nature of the case, and the convenience which may attend one or other course of proceeding.

I have not succeeded in finding any instance in which two several pleas of the kind now proposed have been permitted; but, on consideration, I find no reasonable objection to them.

Each of them may be a good defence to the bill. If Thomas Standish, or Stanley, was not heir, the Plaintiff has no title. If the right in which the Plaintiff was accrued at such a time, and was so neglected that the Statute of Limitations bars the remedy, the Plaintiff cannot recover; and in pleading the Statute of Limitations it is not necessary to admit that the Plaintiff has, or ever had, any title.

[561] And it appearing to me that it would be no disadvantage to the Plaintiff and a great convenience to the Defendants that the defences should be put in the form of pleas, in order that their validity may be considered before a discovery is enforced, I think that leave must be given to plead as desired.

The Defendant must, however, pay the costs of the application.

[561] DAY v. CROFT. Nov. 4, 1841.

An additional legacy (though not so expressed) held subject to the same incidents as the original legacy.

A testator gave a legacy to a feme covert for her separate use, and by a codicil gave to her a further annuity in addition. Held, that the latter was subject to the restriction for her separate use.

The testator, by his will, gave and bequeathed to each of the persons to whom annuities were by that his will given, a legacy equal to one half-year's annuity, and he desired the legacies to such several annuitants to be paid as soon as convenient after his decease. And he gave and bequeathed among other annuities, one annuity or yearly sum of £300 to his sister Mary Day, the wife of William Claughton Deane, for and during the term of her natural life. And with respect to such annuities and legacies as were thereinbefore by him given to females, it was his positive and expressed will and meaning, that they should not be subject or liable to the power, control, or disposal of any husband, but should, at all times, be and remain as a provision for them, for their respective sole and separate use and benefit, without power of anticipation.

[562] The testator made several codicils to his will, and by the second codicil thereto, bearing date the 2d day of September 1836, he bequeathed, "in addition to the legacies given by his will," to each of his sisters £100 a year "for their several lives."

This was a petition presented by Mrs. Mary Day for payment to her of the annuities and the legacy. It appeared that she had been for some time living apart from her husband.

The husband insisted that the second annuity given by the codicil, was not given for the separate use of his wife.

Mr. George Turner and Mr. L. Wigram, in support of the petition, contended that the additional annuity had the same quality as the original annuity, and belonged to the Petitioner for her separate use, independent of her husband. Mayne v. Maynard (1 Ves. jun. 279), Crowder v. Clowes (2 Ves. jun. 449), Long v. Day (3 Ves. 286, n.), Cooper v. Day (3 Mer. 154), Chatteris v. Young, (1) cited in Cooper, 760.

Mr. Willcock, contra, for the husband. There is a marked distinction made by the testator between the annuity given by the will and that given by the codicil; the former is expressed to be given for her separate use, the latter is not subject to restriction. The marital right of her husband is not therefore excluded as to gifts by the codicil.

[63] THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. I am of opinion that the annuity given by the codicil is subject to the same restriction as that given by the will. The will having given an annuity of £300 a year for the Petitioner's separate use, the codicil gives an additional £100; the result is, that he has given to her £400 a year subject to the restriction for her separate use; the husband is therefore excluded.

[5] In re NICKELS' PATENT. Feb. 1, 15, 29, March 27, 30, May 31, June 5, 1841.

petition and practice in correcting clerical errors in letters patent, the proceedings in obtaining them, and in the enrolment.

The object of this petition was to correct a clerical error which had occurred in the proceedings in obtaining letters patent, and consisted in substituting the word "recovering" for the word "covering."

In March 1838 Mr. Nickels petitioned the Queen for a patent for "improvements in machinery for covering fibres applicable in the manufacture of braid and other fabrics." In the petition, declaration, notice, and in the Solicitor-General's report, the word "recovering" was properly stated; but a clerk in the Secretary of State's Office introduced, by mistake, in the Queen's warrant the word "recovering" instead of "covering," this error was adopted in the subsequent proceedings, namely, in the Queen's Signet Bill, the Privy Seal Bill, and in the enrolment, and also (as stated in the petition) in the letters patent themselves; the evidence, however, was ambiguous in the letters patent. In the specification the word "covering" was used.

[64] The Queen's warrant had, by command of Her Majesty, been recently issued, and the following memorandum had been written thereon:—

The word 'recovering' in the seventh line of this page was erased, and the word 'covering' in the same line was inserted in the presence of Her Majesty and by Her Majesty's command.

Whitehall, 23d January 1841.

NORMANBY."

The Queen's Bill, into which also the same error had extended, had also been issued, and the following memorandum made thereon:—

The word 'recovering' in the third line of this bill was erased, and the word 'covering' was inserted in the presence of Her Majesty and by Her Majesty's command.

Whitehall, 23d January 1841.

NORMANBY."

R. II.—15*

The Queen's Bill was deposited with the proper officer at Her Majesty's Signet Office; and the signet transcript (the Signet Bill) thereof was deposited with Her Majesty's officer the Lord Privy Seal; but the Privy Seal Bill was, as usual, in the custody of the Master of the Rolls.

The petition prayed "that the proper officer from the Privy Seal Office might be allowed to make the alteration, in accordance with the Queen's Bill, and that the exemplification or enrolment of the letters patent might be corrected according to the transcript of the Queen's Bill.

The petition (which was signed by the Solicitor-General, as signifying his consent to it on behalf of the [565] Crown) came on, in the first instance, ex parte; but the Master of the Rolls, having been informed that the Petitioner had commenced an action at law against the London Caoutchouc Company, for the infringement of the patent, and that the London Caoutchouc Company were prosecuting a writ of scire facias for the repeal of the patent, directed that notice of the petition should be given to the London Caoutchouc Company, who were to have leave, if they thought fit, to shew cause why the prayer of the petition should not be granted.

Feb. 15, 29. The petition again came on for hearing, when it appeared that the Petitioner had, in June 1840, filed a bill against the company, complaining of an infringement of his patent "for covering;" and that a motion made in August 1840 for an injunction had been ordered to stand over, the Plaintiff being allowed in the meantime to bring his action at law. The Petitioner commenced such action in November 1840, which was still pending, and in January following he was served with a writ of scire facias at the suit of the company to repeal the letters patent.

Mr. Tinney, Mr. Dixon, and Mr. Corrie, in support of the petition.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS said he must hear the other party first, in the way of shewing cause against granting the prayer of the petition.

Mr. Pemberton, Mr. Kindersley, and Mr. Hindmarch, for the company. When a party applies to the discretion of the Court for an indulgence, he must shew that he makes the application at the earliest moment, and he must state fairly and without reserve all the material facts connected with his case. If anything is withheld, the Court will refuse to interfere.

In this case the Petitioner has suppressed several material facts; first, he has not in any way, explained when the error in the letters patent, if any exists, was discovered; the explanation, such as it is, applies only to the enrolment. Again, he does not appear whether the error has been corrected in the Signet Bill, or how the Queen's Bill was altered, and the Court is bound to satisfy itself that all the proceedings anterior to the enrolment have been properly corrected. Nothing is said by the affidavits as to the letters patent themselves, or whether they contain the error. There is something behind unexplained. We call upon the Petitioner to produce the letters patent, in order that it may be seen whether the error is contained in them, or whether they are the original, the enrolment is a mere copy, and it is proposed to alter the copy without correcting the original.

The Master of the Rolls has no authority to make any alteration in the enrolment. The Lord Chancellor himself derives his authority under the Privy Seal Bill, which is in the nature of a writ and cannot be altered after it has been acted on. Writs cannot be altered after they have been served, and if they are resealed they would be considered as new writs. The Lord Chancellor has strictly followed his authority, and if a new authority be given to issue letters patent in a different form, they must be resealed before the enrolment can be altered.

Where a patent is in controversy, it cannot be altered so as to prejudice either the litigant parties. The object of the alteration is to defeat the proceedings. [567] defence of the Respondents; and the parties ought to have proceeded under the 5 & 6 W. 4, c. 83, s. 1, and not in the present mode.

They referred to the 18 Hen. 6, c. 1, to shew that the patent must be dated the day of the delivery of the warrant to the Lord Chancellor; to the 27 H. 8, c. 1, and 57 G. 3, c. 63, as regulating the course of proceedings for passing letters patent; to the 3 & 4 Ed. 6, c. 4, explained by the 13 Eliz. c. 4, to shew that an exemplification of the letters patent might be given in evidence, without producing the letters patent themselves under the Great Seal. They also referred to Ex parte Hoops (6 Ves. 68).

The Weavers' Company v. Hayward (3 Atk. 362), Leigh v. Leigh (2 Bing. N. S. 464, and Dowl. P. C. 650), Glen v. Wilks (4 Dowl. P. C. 322), Galloway v. Bleadon (1 Man. & S. 247), Wynne v. Thomas (Willes, 563), Lord Pembroke v. Lord Jeffereys (1 Salk. 52), Id.'s Pr., Webster on Patents, Beames's Orders, 76.

Mr. Tinney, Mr. Dixon, and Mr. Corrie, contra. The objections are two, 1st, to the jurisdiction of the Court, and 2dly, that the Court will not, in its discretion, exercise its jurisdiction. The cases of In re Redmund (5 Russ. 44), and In re Sharp's Patent (3 Beavan, 245), and other authorities (1) prove the jurisdiction of the Master of the Rolls to correct clerical errors like the present.

(1) Cases in which, upon search directed by the Master of the Rolls, it was found that amendments had been made.
